

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

THE design of this work is to afford an annual record of the proceedings of the British Parliament, together with an examination of the principal topics discussed in that assembly, and of the manner in which its functions are performed.

The wealth and power of Great Britain—the rank which she holds in the scale of national intelligence—and the freedom of speech for which her legislative assemblies have been so long celebrated,—render British history a matter of no ordinary interest and importance; and for this history the two Houses of Parliament must supply the most authentic as well as the most instructive materials.

It is surprising, therefore, that the debates of the British Parliament have never yet been arranged for the purpose of examination or reference;—that they are only to be found in the chaotic miscellany of daily reports;—and that they have been subjected to no periodical comment more systematic or accurate than the brief and hurried remarks of a newspaper editor.

The conductors of the present work have endeavoured to supply this remarkable deficiency in our periodical literature, and if they have only in a moderate degree succeeded in carrying their design into execution, they will have produced a work as novel as it is important. Some now living remember the sensation produced by the first appearance of the ANNUAL REGISTER; and if that work was deemed to have formed an epoch in the annals of literature, it is hoped that the present will be esteemed at least as striking an accession to the means of diffusing political knowledge.

In the first place, all the debates on a given subject, after having been carefully revised and collated, have been collected under the general head to which they respectively belong; nothing being omitted but mere conversations, of no interest except at the moment of utterance; such as discussions regarding the day or hour at which a given debate should be entered on, questions of order, and the like.

ADVERTISEMENT.

At the end of the debates, is a careful examination, as well of the measures discussed, as of the arguments adduced on both sides of the question, and of the conduct of Parliament with reference to the matter in hand.

Of these critical essays it is not for the conductors of the work to say much ; but they can safely affirm, that they are and will be exempt from vehemence or invective, and impartially directed to what ought to be the only end of legislation—not the predominance of a particular party, sect, or portion of the community—but, the greatest happiness of the greatest number.

A Prefatory Treatise on Political Fallacies indicates the spirit and principles in which the debates have been examined. This treatise may be not unuseful to those who wish to form an estimate of the amount of talent and knowledge actually assembled in the two Houses of Parliament, and by degrees may have the effect of ridding the debates of a set of arguments almost always irrelevant, and but too generally delusive.

To foreign nations, particularly France and the United States of America, the whole will afford a view of British affairs, more clear, comprehensive, and authentic, than any which can be obtained elsewhere.

Such is the present work, and such its claims to public favor.

Even if feebly executed, it cannot be of mean assistance to the progress of knowledge and improvement ;—but as neither expence nor labour have been spared to its completion, the conductors are not without hopes that the execution may in some degree correspond with the design.

The difficulty and extent of the undertaking have doubtless rendered unavoidable, at the outset, many defects, but for these it is hoped some allowance will be made, when it is stated that the work was not projected until July last, and that in every future Session the conductors will have the advantage of nearly a whole year for the preparation of the materials it may afford.

The work will in future appear on the first of January in every year.

POLITICAL FALLACIES.

A MAN will read to little purpose the debates of legislative assemblies, if he be not able pretty readily to detect the bad reasoning to which the members of most of those assemblies, as at present constituted, are, perhaps, more prone, than the rest of the community. In lieu, therefore, of formal preface, we shall in the following compendium, present our readers with an instrument, which will, we trust, enable them at once to discover and expose those fallacies, the prevalence of which has but too much contributed to retard political improvement; and to this instrument we shall make frequent reference in our examination of the ensuing debates.

To the inexperienced or unreflecting, two questions will here naturally present themselves;—Is it true, that the deliberative assemblies which are said to contain “the collected wisdom of the nation,” can be even more prone to bad reasoning than other portions of the community? and if so,—What are the causes of this unhappy tendency?

That the position in question is true, will but too plainly appear to any one who may apply to the debates in the ensuing volume, the test which we are immediately about to furnish; and will be believed, a priori, by all who are acquainted with the structure of our parliamentary system.

With respect to the causes which contribute to the production and prevalence of bad reasoning, the following seem to be the principal:

Weakness of intellect;

Imperfections of language; and

The sinister interest of the individual who errs:—

By a sinister interest, we mean an interest attaching to an individual or a class, incompatible with the interests of the community:—for there are two sets of interests which affect every member of society;—those which are confined to himself; those which attach to him in common with others; that is to say, as a member of the community:—and we call those which are confined to himself, sinister, when they operate in a direction contrary to those which attach to him as a member of the community.

Thus, every man, as a member of the community, has an interest that taxation should be as light as possible; but if he derive an income out of taxes, and this income is proportioned to the amount of the taxes, he has an interest confined to himself, that taxation should be as heavy as possible, provided it do not extend to the destruction of the subject-matter of taxes.

If, out of taxes to the amount of 10 per cent. upon all property, he derives an income of 500*l.* a-year, but would derive 1000*l.* a-year from taxes to the amount of 20 per cent.,—supposing him to pay the respective rates of taxation out of each rate of income,—he would be tempted, in the proportion of 800 to 450, to sacrifice to the interest confined to himself, the interest which attaches to him as a member of the community. Here, therefore, is an interest confined to the individual himself, which is clearly sinister to, that is, incompatible with the interest of the community.

To prevent the sinister interests of an individual or class of individuals from operating detrimentally on the interests of the rest of the community, ought to be the great object aimed at in the formation or reformation of every government.

With those who assert, that mankind are not actuated in the main with a view to their private interest, we can have no reasoning in common: still less with those, who admitting the fact in the case of ordinary individuals, claim for the ruling few an exemption from the common lot of humanity. This is not the place to enter into the proofs of the existence of a principle of action, the predominance of which is attested by the mere existence of laws;—every one who violates a law, does, by so doing, prefer his private interest to his interests as a member of the community;—but the man, who from his own observation has not ascertained the existence of this powerful principle of action, is as weak or as ignorant as he who laments its predominance. The well-being of every individual, and thereby of society at large, is produced by the preference of self: in its strict meaning, self-interest is the mainspring of human action; it is the principle which apportions exertion to the necessities for which it is required, and rescues us from a helpless dependence on other beings. Imagine that condition of things, in which, not the principle of self-interest, but its opposite,—the preference of the public good to private,—should generally obtain: the consequence is as absurd in supposition as it would be disastrous in reality. “Every man shift for all the rest, and let no man take care for himself,” says the drunken sailor* in Shakspeare’s Tempest. The objection ought to be, not that self-interest exists and predominates, but that our political institutions have not been so framed as to make it conduce to the benefit of the community as well as to that of the individual, or at all events, that it has not been prevented from operating in a direction opposed to the interests of the community; for that its operation may be so directed or controlled by political institutions constructed to such an end, cannot reasonably be doubted.

With respect to imperfections of language,—that which is mainly instrumental in causing bad reasoning, is, the number of appellatives which beg the question; that is, appellatives, which in addition to the idea of the object which they profess to name, raise up also, as inseparably connected with it, some accessory idea of praise or blame. Thus, among the terms which designate the objects of moral and political science, such words as piety, generosity, prudence, improvement,—present the object, in conjunction with ideas of approbation;—these may be called, laudatory, or eulogistic terms: such words as superstition, prodigality, avarice, innovation,—present the object in conjunction with ideas of disapprobation;—these may be called vituperative, or dyslogistic terms. Such words as creed, disposition, arrangement, change,—present the object singly, unassociated with any sentiment either of approbation or disapprobation, and these may be called neutral terms. As the immediate end of reasoning is commonly to ascertain whether the thing which is the subject of discussion be good, bad, or indifferent, it is obvious that neutral terms ought alone to be employed by those who desire to arrive at the truth. They who employ terms eulogistic or dyslogistic, assume thereby the point in debate, and supersede altogether the process of reasoning. Terms of this kind are not simple, but compound: they include a proposition in themselves: the mere word affirms the quality of the thing it is used to designate, and thus, when the quality is the matter in discussion, it begs the question.

By weakness of intellect we mean, in this place, incapacity to follow logical deductions, whether that incapacity be occasioned by want of instruction, want of practice, or want of inclination.

Now, of the three causes of bad reasoning which we have just specified and explained, the sinister interest of the individual disputant is, to an incalculable degree, the most fertile and fatal source of error and delusion. Weakness of intellect may be aided by instruction, by practice, or the discovery of motives for desiring the attainment of truth;—the imperfections of language may be guarded against and remedied by habits of rigid investigation;—but sinister interest opposes to the reception of truth an obstacle almost as insuperable as it is extensively-prevailing. The bias which it communicates to the intellect of the individual exposed to it, leads him, often unconsciously, to embrace and receive with disproportionate regard all arguments which tend to support this interest, and to overlook or undervalue all which make against it;—to find a useful ally in every imperfection of language;—to acquiesce in established opinions as in established abuses;—to deprecate enquiry, and even to sneer at any exertion of the thinking faculty.

To what extent the members of the British Parliament are exposed to the action of sinister interest, is fully understood by those who are aware that these members conduct, subject to no immediate check, the expenditure of an immense fund raised by taxation:—subject to no immediate check, because they are neither elected nor removable by the people whom they are said virtually to represent, but in considerable numbers avowedly purchase their seats, while a majority of them, are indisputably placed in the House by about 180 powerful families, who either in possession or expectancy have a direct interest in a prodigal expenditure of the public money, and as far as possible, in appropriating it to their own purposes. We say, not elected, even by those who vote, because according to the ordinary experience of human nature, the candidate or his friend may be affirmed to have it in their power to compel a vote, so long as they have it in their power to make the voter expect evil at their hands if he votes one way, and good if he votes another; and this power they clearly have wherever the open mode of conducting suffrage enables them to ascertain with precision which way a vote has been given

When it is affirmed by the defenders of this system, that it "works well in practice;" all that they can mean, if they mean any thing, is, not, that there are no abuses under it, no unjustifiable expenditure of the public money, no sacrifice of the interests of the many to the interests of the few, but that England enjoys a greater degree of prosperity than some other countries; as Russia, Germany, or Spain. It remains, however, for them to shew that this prosperity is the result of our Parliamentary system, and not the result of that publicity of discussion, and comparative freedom of the press, which by some lucky accident,—not by law, but contrary to law, and to the standing orders of Parliament,—has always existed for us while it has been denied to the rest of Europe, and has established here, a tribunal of public opinion, to which Parliament itself is, in the long run and to a certain extent, compelled to defer.

But it is the co-existence of this unacknowledged power with a frame of Government the members of which are exposed to the action of a powerful sinister interest, that renders the use of fallacies more necessary to the British Parliament than to any other deliberative assembly. In countries where freedom of the press and public discussion do not exist, the interests of the many are openly and unhesitatingly sacrificed by force to the interests of the few: the people have it not in their power to require reasons, and no reason is given but the supreme will of the ruler. In England, on the contrary, these ends can only be attained by fraud. In consequence of long established habits of public discussion, the people are too mindful of their own interests, and too strong, to allow them to be openly violated: reasons must be given, and reasons sufficient to satisfy or deceive a majority of the persons to whom they are addressed. Now as it is impossible by fair reasoning, with reference to the avowed ends of Government, to justify the sacrifice of the interests of the many to the interests of the few, and as we have shewn that the members of the British Parliament are placed in a position which must induce them more or less to attempt this sacrifice, it follows that for effecting this purpose they must have recourse to every kind of Fallacy, and address themselves, when occasion requires it, to the passions, the prejudices, and the ignorance of mankind.

Having therefore, in tracing the causes of bad reasoning, prepared the reader to expect no small portion of it in the ensuing debates, we shall proceed at once to enumerate and expose the various Political Fallacies which are still perseveringly repeated, and still exercise but too powerful an influence on the human understanding.

For the purpose of assisting the memory, for we are not satisfied with the logic of the arrangement, we shall class these Fallacies under four heads.

Fallacies of Authority; which are advanced with the view of superseding all exercise of the reasoning faculty.

Fallacies of Danger; in which it is proposed to repress discussion by exciting apprehension.

Fallacies of Delay; the object of which is to postpone discussion, with a view of eluding it altogether.

Fallacies of Confusion; the object of which is to perplex and mislead, when discussion can no longer be avoided.

And first, of Fallacies of Authority.

Whenever a matter in debate is such, that relevant arguments on the subject in debate would be within the comprehension of the debaters, he who in lieu of relevant argument refers to authority, is chargeable with the imputation of Fallacy, and by pursuing this course, virtually admits one of the two following positions; either, That the principle of utility, i. e. the greatest happiness of the greatest number, is not the proper standard for judging of the merits of the question; or, That he does not himself possess any powers of reasoning to which he can safely trust.

Without at present entering into any analysis of authority, or specifying the few occasions on which it may be proper to appeal to it, we may assume generally, that in a legislative assembly scientific or professional opinion, upon subjects with which the debaters may excusably be found unacquainted, is the only authority entitled to serious consideration. Even here it must be ascertained, and considered to what extent the party consulted is exposed to the influence of any sinister interest which may either blind his judgment or induce him to pronounce an opinion which he does not entertain; as a lawyer when called on to give an opinion about reforms in law, or a priest about reforms in the church. The professional or scientific man, however, has always the motives, and the motives generally lead him to the means of obtaining accurate knowledge in his trade or calling; and with regard to probity, that is, the sincerity with which the opinion is delivered, it is almost ensured by the necessity he is under of sustaining his reputation. In no other instance in which an individual may be appealed to as authority, is there the same chance of meeting with an equal degree of relative intelligence and relative probity. We say, an individual, because it is obvious that the probative force of authority is not increased by the number of persons who may have professed a given opinion, unless it can be proved, that each individual of that number, possessed in the highest degree the means and motives for ensuring the correctness of the opinion. Obvious, however, as the position may appear when thus stated, mankind seem hitherto to have been strangely heedless of its truth and importance, for upon no better authority than that of numbers, have systems and opinions the most mischievous and absurd, so long and so extensively prevailed; such as the religions—of Buddh, of Brama, of Foh, or of Mahomet. In truth, there seems to be no absurdity to which men may not be reconciled by idleness, ignorance, and sinister interest.

It is to the disinclination which the opulent must generally feel for encountering the toil with which alone appropriate knowledge can be obtained on any part of the field of legislation;—it is to the facility with which the most ignorant and imbecile may cite the opinion of another; and—to the sinister interest which is busied in suppressing every exercise of the reasoning faculty, lest that faculty should be directed to the removal of abuses,—that we must ascribe the extensive dominion of the

FALLACIES OF AUTHORITY.

The four following are those in most frequent use :—

Wisdom of our ancestors.

No precedent.

Irrevocable laws.

Laudatory personalities.

1. The first of these is generally contained in the hacknied expressions of—The wisdom of our ancestors,—Wisdom of ages—Venerable antiquity,—Wisdom of old times,—and phrases of the like import; from which it is meant to be inferred, that the repugnancy between a proposed measure and the opinions of our ancestors on the same subject, is, in itself, a sufficient reason for rejecting the measure. Now, according to the language of all but those who are interested in resorting to this fallacy, “Experience is the mother of wisdom;” according to the fallacy, Wisdom is the offspring, not of experience, but of inexperience. As between individual and individual living at the same time and in the same situation, he who is old may have more experience than he who is young: as between generation and generation, that which is the preceding generation, cannot have had so much experience as the succeeding: with respect to such of the materials or sources of wisdom as may fall under every man’s individual observation, the two generations may be on a par; with respect to such of those materials as are derived from the reports of others, the later of the two possesses the indisputable advantage of adding to its own experience, the experience of the former.

So long as men keep to vague generalities, and oppose their “wise progenitors” in the lump, to the “ignorant mob” of modern times, the weakness of the fallacy may escape detection: let them but contrast any determinate period of “venerable antiquity” with the present time, and the deception will instantly vanish. Unless the antecedent period be comparatively a recent one, so great will be the disparity, that in comparison with the best informed classes of those venerated ancestors, the palm of intellect must be awarded to a modern mechanic. Take, for instance, the reign of Henry VIII. At that time the House of Lords probably possessed the larger proportion of what little information the age afforded; it is doubtful, however, whether, without exception, their Lordships were able so much as to read; but supposing they could, in what book were they at that time to find any instruction on the various branches of political science? Pass on to the reign of James I., and we see that Solomon of his time, consigning men to death and torment for the misfortune of not being quite so well acquainted as he was, with the nature and composition of the Godhead. In the time of Charles II., even after Bacon had laid the foundations of a sound philosophy, we find Lord Chief Justice Hale unable to tell, (so he says himself,) what theft was, but knowing at the same time too well, what witchcraft was, and hanging men with equal complacency for both crimes, amidst the applauses of all that was wise and learned in that blessed age.

Our ancestors then, considering the disadvantages under which they laboured, could not have been capable of exercising so sound a judgment on their own interests as we on ours: but as a knowledge of the facts on which a judgment is to be pronounced, is an indispensable preliminary to the arriving at just conclusions, and as the relevant facts of a later period must all of them individually, and most of them specifically, have been unknown to the man of the earlier period, it is clear, that a judgment derived from the authority of our ancestors, and applied to existing affairs, must be a judgment pronounced without evidence : and this is the judgment which the fallacy in question calls on us to abide by, to the exclusion of a judgment which might be formed on complete evidence. No one will deny that preceding ages have produced men eminently distinguished by benevolence and genius ; it is to them that we owe in succession all the advances which have hitherto been made in the career of human improvement : but, as their talents could only be developed in proportion to the state of knowledge at the period in which they lived, and could only have been called into action with a view to then-existing circumstances, it is absurd to rely on their authority at a period and under a state of things altogether different.

In no part of the field of knowledge, save legislation, do leading men of the present times recommend us this receipt for thinking and acting wisely. Nobody would now refer us to the wisdom of our ancestors for the best mode of marshalling armies, navigating ships, or curing, alleviating, or preventing disease. Why this difference ? Only because in these parts of the field of knowledge, leading men are not affected with that sinister interest which is so unhappily combined with power in the frame of European governments.

The causes of the ascendancy which this fallacy has attained, seem to be, an error in language ; and a prejudice in favor of the dead. The gist of the fallacy lies in the word old, for what in common language is called old time, ought in strictness to be denominated young or early time ; succeeding generations, as we have before shewn, being, with reference to the accumulated experience of ages, as much older than those which have preceded, as a man is older than a child. To bestow on preceding ages the name of old time, is to transfer the appellation of old from age to infancy : the wisdom of antiquity is not the wisdom of grey hairs, but the wisdom of the cradle.

The prejudice in favor of the dead is no less indefensible than pernicious. The language of reason would inform us, that the infliction of pain on those who feel, and not on those who are insensible,—that outrages on the living, and not attacks on the dead, should be stamped with the seal of reprobation. The origin of the prejudice will be found very near the surface. The dead have no rivals. They stand no longer in the way ; and their survivors gain cheaply a credit for impartiality, by praises which cost nothing, and frequently enable them to gratify a more urgent malignity towards their living opponents.

2. No Precedent.

This fallacy is of the same nature as the preceding, and in effect propounds, that nothing ought now to be done unless it has also been done by our ancestors. "The proposition is novel and unprecedented ;—the present is surely the first time that any such thing was ever heard of in this house." Such is the language in which the sophist clothes his objection, which, if it were attended to, would form a complete bar to all human improvement, and pushed to its consequences, would place us again in the savage state. The exigency which calls for the measure to which this fallacy is offered as an objection, may never before have arisen; or if it arose, they who were exposed to it, may not have had ingenuity to devise the measure. But, if the argument be an objection against a measure now proposed, so it is equally an objection against every other that ever has been proposed or adopted, and consequently against every institution that exists at present: if it prove that a thing now proposed ought not to be done, it proves equally that nothing else ought ever to have been done.

3. Irrevocable Laws.

All laws and political institutions are essentially dispositions for the future, and the professed object of them is to afford a steady and permanent security to the interests of mankind: so far, therefore, they may be said to be framed with a view to perpetuity: but men are fallible, and circumstances change; laws or institutions may turn out to be defective; the causes which called them into existence may cease to operate, and other causes may call for an alteration: it is obvious, therefore, that the principle on which all laws ought to be, and the greater part of them have been established, is that of defeasible perpetuity. The ignorant and unreflecting, as well the interested, are, however, often heard to speak of certain laws as absolutely irrevocable; carrying thereby, to the highest pitch of extravagance and absurdity, the fallacy of the Wisdom of Ancestors. To the extent of the pretended immutable law, the government is transferred from the legislator of the time being, who has the best means of information, and the liveliest interest in the matter, to the dead legislator, who could have no means of foreknowing the exigencies of the present moment, and no interest equal to that of those who are immediately concerned. The despotism of a living tyrant, be he Caligula or Nero, may be alleviated by operating on the hopes or apprehensions of the despot; but the deceased neither hears nor feels. It should be observed, that it is only when the law in question is mischievous, that an argument of this stamp will be employed in support of it: if it be good, it will be supported by reasons drawn from its own excellence.

One shape which this fallacy has occasionally assumed, is the supposed existence of a kind of public contract. The sacred observance of contracts is among the most important ties that bind society together, and an argument drawn from this source, cannot fail to wear the appearance of plausibility. A contract, however, is not in itself an end, but a means to an end, and in cases where the public is a party, it is only so far as the public happiness is the end in view, that the contract is worthy to be observed. A striking application of the fallacy to the sinister purposes of a small portion of the public, may be found in the pages of Blackstone.

In the articles of Union between England and Scotland, for securing the forty-five members of the latter country from being outvoted by the five hundred of the former, provision had been made in favour of the Scottish Kirk. To give the treaty a colour of reciprocity, the like provision was made in favour of the Church of England. Of this latter circumstance, Blackstone has artfully availed himself for the purpose of perpetuating whatever may be found defective in English ecclesiastical matters. He states, that the preservation of the two churches, and the maintenance of the acts of uniformity which established the Common Prayer, are expressly declared to be "fundamental and essential conditions" of the union, and, therefore, that any alteration in the constitutions of either of the churches, or, with certain exceptions, in the liturgy of the Church of England, would be an infringement of those "fundamental conditions," and "greatly endanger the Union." Hence, should it ever occur that a change in the established belief should be followed by a corresponding alteration in the articles of the church,—if, for instance, the opinion should happen to gain ground, that human beings by the mere act of being born, neither merit nor incur damnation, and a corresponding change should be made in the article which enjoins such belief,—the union, according to Blackstone, would be greatly endangered. The absurdity of this reasoning is scarcely less astonishing than its impudence.

Another shape which the fallacy assumes, is that of a vow, or promissory oath; in which case, as a sanction to the engagement, a supernatural power is introduced in the character of guarantee. Now this supernatural power is either bound or not bound. If not bound, the sanction amounts to nothing: if bound, observe the consequence: the Almighty is bound; and by whom? Of all the worms that crawl upon the earth in the shape of men, there is not one who may not thus impose on the ruler of the universe any number of contradictory and incompatible observances. The offence too, which this Being is to visit with punishment, is not the act which the oath was proposed to prevent, for that act may be indifferent or even meritorious: the offence is the mere profanation of a ceremony, and an act the most beneficial to mankind may become by this doctrine the greatest crime in the estimation of the Object of Religion; whence the absurdity follows that the Being whose tenderness for the happiness of mankind is among his most estimable attributes, is nevertheless injured and offended by an act which may promote that happiness in the highest degree.

The statute of 5 Ann. c. 8. art. 25. s. 8. establishes a coronation oath, by which the king vows to preserve inviolate the settlement of the church, and the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government thereof, as then by law established. The utterance of this vow was made during the late reign, the pretence for perpetuating a mischievous instance of misrule in the exclusion of the Catholics from political privileges. It is obvious that the vow can only apply to the king in his executive and not in his legislative capacity; otherwise, every curate's bill, and almost every other statute to which he gives his assent, would be an infraction of it. It is obvious that if he persists in viewing it in a different light, he has the option of resigning his kingly office. It is obvious that if he refuse to do so, and makes the observance of an oath the pretence for inflicting and perpetuating misery upon a whole people, he renders himself absolute on the easy condition of pronouncing the word conscience, and that the pretended check of the oath is in effect a licence under the appearance of a check;—chains to the man in power; but such as he figures with on the stage ; to the spectators as imposing, to himself, as light as possible, they rattle without restraining. But whatever interpretation may be put on the oath, to oppose a beneficial measure on the score of religion, is to employ the form against the substance ; the means against the end ; to convert the terms employed to magnify the service of the Deity, into instruments of opposing his designs. To pronounce such a vow is criminal, to persist in it criminal and foolish. It should always be observed that this sanction is more likely to be applied to a pernicious than a beneficial purpose. Because the more manifestly the act enjoined or prohibited, is beneficial, the more likely is it to be performed or omitted independently of the sanction.

4. Laudatory Personalities.

This class of fallacies is played off in two ways ;

By a bold assumption of superior honesty or talent, or

By an unusual affectation of modesty.

Under the first device, when any abuse is dragged to light, any reform proposed or security demanded, men in office set up a cry of surprise, amounting almost to indignation, as if their integrity were questioned or their honour wounded ; at the same time they dexterously throw in intimations that their conduct is regulated by nothing less than the most exalted patriotism, honour, and religion.

The use of this fallacy is frequent in proportion to the difficulty of meeting it with specific disproof. Of the various official malconductors there is not one in whose defence this fallacy has not been urged : no matter what the delinquency or how clearly proved, up starts some friend of the accused, and roundly asserts his entire integrity and aptitude, which can no longer be disputed when it rests on such high authority. Ordinarily we judge of men's character by their conduct ; this fallacy calls on us to judge of their conduct by their character : and this too, notwithstanding the indisputable principle of politics, that no possible degree of virtue in those who rule can justify us in dispensing with the safeguard of good laws and public investigation. Assertions such as those we have noticed, are not only irrelevant to any question of reform or of improved public security, but they involve assumptions opposed to the known qualities of human nature ; they deny the influence of private interest in cases where it operates with the most unfailling certainty ; they are as easily made by the most profligate, as by the most virtuous of mankind, and are much more likely to be resorted to by the profligate. The virtuous man, being what he is, has that chance for being esteemed as such ; the profligate self-trumpeter, having no such hope of reputation, relies on the conjunct effect of his own effrontery, and the imbecility of his hearers.

An equal assumption of superiority is involved in the other mode of playing off this fallacy by an unusual affectation of modesty. When a defect in our institutions is clearly pointed out, and an unobjectionable remedy proposed, up starts the man in office, and instead of giving any definite answer, meets the proposal, with, "I am not prepared" to do so and so ; "I am not prepared to say," &c. ; with other phrases of similar import : the meaning of which, put into plain English, is,

"If I, who am so much your superior in rank and intelligence, avow myself incapable of forming a judgment, what presumption must it be in you to pronounce your conclusions on the subject."

The part of a man of probity is too obvious to require explanation. If he is not prepared to pass a judgment, he is not prepared to condemn, and ought not, therefore, to oppose: the utmost he is warranted in doing, if sincere, is to ask for time to consider.

FALLACIES OF DANGER.

Among these, the four following may be enumerated as obtaining the most extensive currency.

Vituperative personalities.

Incitement to distrust.

Dread of innovation.

Nothing but laborious application and a clear and comprehensive intellect can enable a man to employ successfully on any given subject, relevant arguments drawn from the subject itself. To employ personalities, neither labour nor intellect is requisite: in this sort of contest the most idle and ignorant are on a par with, if not superior to the most industrious and highly-gifted individuals, and nothing can be more convenient for those who would speak without the trouble of thinking: close and relevant arguments, have very little hold on the passions, which they serve rather to quell than to inflame, while in personalities there is always something stimulant whether they are employed in praise or blame. These are among the prevailing causes of the frequent recourse to vituperative personalities, which in common with other fallacies possess in a high degree the quality of irrelevancy, and produce the effect of drawing off the attention from the measure to the man. As far as they can be said to apply at all, they apply with as much force to good measures as to bad, for there is no good measure which may not be supported or even introduced by a bad man.

These fallacies are commonly employed in one of the five following shapes. Imputation of bad design. Imputation of bad character. Imputation of bad motive. Imputation of inconsistency. Imputation of suspicious connexions.

In the Imputation of bad design, the sophist calls for the rejection of a measure, on the presumption that the proposer of it intends to bring forward at a future time, some pernicious measure connected with that which preceded it. The answer is, reject the second measure if it be proposed, and proved to be pernicious: but the possibility that a second may be proposed, is no ground for rejecting the first, supposing the first appears to be of itself unexceptionable; and if it be exceptionable, the indication of its defects is the proper way to procure its rejection.

As to the Imputation of bad character, allow this argument the effect of a conclusive one, and you put it in the power of any man to withdraw you from the support of a measure which you esteem good, or force you to support one which you may esteem bad. Is it good? the man of bad character embraces, and by the supposition you reject it: is it bad? he blames, and you in consequence adopt it. Give yourself up to any such blind antipathy, and you are no less in the power of your adversaries, than by a correspondently irrational sympathy and obsequiousness you place yourself at the mercy of your friends.

The imputation of bad motive, is perhaps the most stupid and absurd of all the vituperative personalities, both because there is no mode of ascertaining with precision the real motives of men, and because, if a measure be good it is indifferent what were the motives of its author; if it be bad, its assignable defects are the ground on which to oppose it. By a bad motive, in these cases, is generally meant a view to private advantage; but if the measure be beneficial to the community, is it the worse because the proposer may profit by it also?

With regard to the Imputation of inconsistency, admitting the fact of the inconsistency, the utmost it can amount to in the character of an argument against a proposed measure, is, the affording a presumption of bad design or of bad character in a certain way and to a certain degree, and of the futility of these arguments a view has already been given. They may operate to the prejudice of the individual, but form no logical objection to the measure he supports.

The argument drawn from the Imputation of suspicious connexions,—even admitting the existence of the connexion, the improbability of the associate, and the influence exercised by him over the person to whom the connexion is objected,—stands on the same ground, and is open to the same refutation as the four preceding. There are few political measures in which men of all degrees in the scale of probity and improbity, may not be engaged on both sides.

Imputation founded on identity of denomination is a modification of the preceding fallacy, which has been frequently urged against the claim of the Catholics to an equal participation in civil rights. "Such and such enormities have been perpetrated by men who in former times bore the same denomination as you, and such we may expect from you; we judge of your intentions by the conduct of your predecessors." About the same time that these enormities were committed by Catholics, similar enormities were committed by the Protestants, and may therefore in both cases be ascribed rather to the ignorance and ferocity of the period than to any particular modification of faith. In other European countries the spirit and interests of the professors of Papacy, as well as of Protestantism, have so far changed, that like enormities have long since ceased to be perpetrated on the score of religion: it remains therefore, for those who resort to this argument against the British Catholics, to show that in spirit and interests they alone remain unchanged. To punish the existing generation for the crimes of the past, is as absurd as it would be to purge the inhabitants of Marseilles because their predecessors had the plague in 1720.

6. Incitement to Distrust.

This fallacy arises out of, and much resembles the Imputation of bad character and bad design. It calls for the rejection of a measure, not for any defect inherent in it, but on the ground that it may pave the way for mischievous measures hereafter. "In what is now proposed, there may be, perhaps, no great mischief, but in the quarter in which this measure originates, there are more behind of a very different complexion." Assuming that this is addressed to persons who have the faculty of choice, the fallacy supposes them so imbecile as not to be able to distinguish between good and bad, or even as being prone to adopt the bad. If, of two measures proposed at the same time, one were good, and the other bad, it would be absurd enough to reject both because one was bad; but the fallacy in question goes much farther, and calls on us to reject a good measure, because by possibility it may be followed by a bad one. But if the measure be rejected on this ground, so ought every other that ever has been or can be proposed; for there is no measure, however good, that may not possibly be followed by a bad one. Absurd as the argument may appear, there are few more frequently employed in Parliament. From the woolstack, it has recently been objected to the bill for allowing Unitarians to perform the marriage ceremony in their own chapels, that the measure, however proper in itself, might tend to sanction future measures detrimental to the church.

7. Dread of Innovation.

Innovation is one of those words, which in addition to the principal idea conveyed by it, annexes also a sentiment of disapprobation. By Innovation, is meant, not only change, but change attended with preponderating inconvenience, and it presents a fallacy most influential on those who receive without examination the vague ideas expressed by ordinary language. Their imagination conjures up a train of spectres which the judgment is unable to subdue, and foremost among them, the demon Anarchy. The absurdity of the argument intended to be included in the word Innovation, is so glaring as scarcely to admit of further exposure. Whatever is now establishment was once innovation, so that the objection is applicable to all measures that ever have been or ever may be proposed. Whether or not the measure proposed, be now proposed for the first time, is, except for the purpose of producing caution, a matter of indifference, and irrelevant to the main question which ought to be the object of enquiry; viz. whether or not the measure is likely to conduce to the greatest happiness of the greatest number.

Equally irrelevant is the counter-fallacy sometimes resorted to, in answer to the foregoing, that the change proposed is not innovation, but a return to an original state of things; an argument which with no less ignorance than sincerity has been used by many of the advocates of parliamentary reform. Whether the assertion be true or false, it is no argument for the re-establishment of the system which existed under the Tudors and Plantagenets. The goodness or badness of a measure depends on the effects it is likely to produce in the present posture of affairs; its correspondence with or difference from the institutions of our forefathers, whose political situation bore no more resemblance to our own than their morals or manners, is, comparatively, a matter of indifference.

It is scarcely possible to produce even the most beneficial change without producing some inconvenience, and this it is that has given such influence to the word innovation. Whenever, however, a proposed change is likely to be attended with more inconvenience than advantage, it is so easy and so relevant to specify the inconvenience apprehended, that we may rest satisfied such inconvenience does not exist, when in lieu of naming it, the objector has recourse to the cry of innovation.

8. Screen for Offenders in Office.

This fallacy consists in affecting to consider any disapprobation of the persons by whom or the system on which the business of government is conducted, as pregnant with mischief to the government itself. "Oppose us, you oppose government; bring us into contempt, you bring government into contempt, and anarchy and civil war are the consequence."

So long as government continues in a state short of absolute perfection, there will be no mode of clearing it of abuses, but by the indication of imperfections which may exist either in the conduct of its functionaries, or in the system under which they act; and no imperfection can be pointed out without producing aversion or contempt in proportion to the importance and extent of the imperfection. But so far is it from being true that aversion or contempt for public functionaries, or even for the system under which they act, is any proof of aversion or contempt towards government itself, that it is generally a proof of the opposite affection. The person expressing the contempt does not therefore wish that there should be no public functionaries, but that their conduct should be better regulated; just as the man who blames a particular lawyer or physician, is not therefore chargeable with any desire to abolish law and medicine, but simply with an intention to discourage bad, and encourage good practitioners. The disposition to submit to government is not produced by any such consideration as that of the fitness of the several functionaries of which it is composed: payment of taxes, and obedience to the decrees of courts of justice, do not depend on the good or ill opinion entertained in regard to the officers by whom the business of those departments is carried on, but on the desire for that security which can alone be attained in its highest degree by the vigour and activity of a good system of government.

Another shape which this fallacy assumes is that of attempting to scare off accusation by heaping obloquy on the accuser in case he fails to substantiate his charge.—"Infamy must attach somewhere," said one of the ministers, upon the occasion of a charge made some years ago against a member of the Royal family. But an insinuation to this effect has an unlimited application; the tendency of the fallacy, is, by intimidation, to prevent all true charges from being made, and thereby to secure impunity to delinquency in every shape. As a general proposition, applying to all public accusations, nothing can be more mischievous, as well as fallacious. Supposing the charge unfounded, it may have been accompanied with mala fides, (consciousness of its injustice;) temerity only; or it may have been perfectly blameless; and it is in the first case alone that infamy can attach upon him who brings it forward.

FALLACIES OF DELAY

Among these we shall consider—

No complaint,
False consolations,
The procrastinator's argument,
Snail's-pace argument; and Artful diversion.

9. No Complaint.

A remedy being proposed for some incontestable abuse, it is frequently objected that no complaint on the subject has been heard; and the argument amounts to this, "Nobody complains, therefore nobody suffers." Now if government exists for the benefit of the community, measures of precaution and prevention ought to be as much within its province as measures of redress: but the fallacy in question goes to establish a maxim in legislation, opposed to the most ordinary prudence of common life: it would tell us to abstain from building parapets to a bridge, till the number of accidents had raised a universal clamour. The argument, indeed, might be less absurd, if complaints could be made without difficulty or expense,—if they were likely to be attended to,—or if the parties suffering had sufficient knowledge to be able to ascertain the causes of their distress. It is difficult, for instance, to conceive a greater mass of suffering than that occasioned by the denial of justice;—by the uncertainty, delay, and expence, which put justice out of the reach of nine-tenths of the people; and yet the greater number of men, instead of ascribing this suffering to the palpable defects of our judicial institutions, are wont to conceive it an inevitable concomitant of law in general, and instead of uniting in complaints to the legislature, submit to the evil with the same kind of patience as they would endure an earthquake, or any other unavoidable physical calamity. In like manner, from the prevailing ignorance with regard to legislation, the cause of numerous and severely felt evils, has scarcely come to be suspected by the mass of mankind. If therefore the legislator refuse to correct an evil, because from ignorance, or any other reason, the people omit to complain, he proves that his end is not the public advantage, but his own.

10. The fallacy of False Consolations

Consists in holding out the misery of other nations as a reason for remaining satisfied with the condition of our own.

The fallacy is almost too gross to admit of further exposure than is contained in the mere statement of it. Pushed to its consequences it opposes every step in the progress of human improvement,—for with the exception of the single nation at the bottom of the scale, there is none of whom it may not be said there are others more miserable than themselves. If the end of government be the production of the greatest degree of happiness, it is no advance towards that end to indicate the misery of others. Few would venture to maintain that our roads ought not to be improved because they have worse roads in France, or that a tradesman ought not to receive the whole of his debt, because neighbouring tradesmen may have lost half theirs; and yet, in the debates on Negro Slavery, it has been gravely argued that nothing need be done for the blacks, because their condition is less bad than that of five millions of Irish. Admitting the fact to be true, if it is meant to be inferred that nothing should be done for the blacks, because the Irish labourers are starving, it is scarcely possible to conceive a more imbecile or nofarious argument.

11. The Procrastinator's argument,

Is the resort of a dishonest opponent, who seeks to postpone and elude a question, and to obtain ultimate impunity or success by wearing out the other side, with delay. "Wait a little—this is not the time!" Such is commonly the naked assertion and exhortation;—but unless it is very clearly shown why this is not the time, it must be obvious that the objection exists not in the judgment but in the will. Is it lawful to heal on the Sabbath? was the question put by Jesus to the official hypocrites. The proper day to do good—the proper day to remove a nuisance,—is the first day on which it can be done: Who ever opposes it on that day, will, if he dare, oppose it on every other.

12. Snail's-pace Argument; or, Gradual Change.

This fallacy, of the same nature as the last, is one of the most frequent and efficacious among those resorted to by the enemies of improvement.

A plan is advanced, which requires a certain number of concurrent acts to render it efficacious; the fallacy proposes to enter on them one by one, and to frustrate the scheme by disjoining it. This method of proceeding is termed gradual; its advocates taking credit to themselves, as moderate, sound, practical men, and of course stigmatising their opponents as violent, precipitate, visionary, theoretical, &c. The argument derives its influence from the mode in which abstract terms are taken metaphorically from physical objects. A patient killed by rapid bleeding,—a carriage overturned by runaway horses,—a vessel upset by carrying too much sail; such are the ideas connected with the word precipitation; while the opposite of them are conveyed by the word gradual, so that whenever precipitation is objected to a legislative measure, it never fails to excite a host of indefinite apprehensions. But where the proposers of any such measure are fairly chargeable with undue haste, the obvious and assignable consequences of their precipitation may be at once pointed out, and would afford unanswerable arguments against them. When instead of this, recourse is had to a vague recommendation of graduality, we may be satisfied that the opposers of the measure have no real objections to urge. As where the scope of a plan, is, to remove by some one measure, a number of abuses, each connected with the other; supposing the plan to have been maturely and deliberately framed, none but a person interested in the support of the abuses, would object to a general abolition of them, or claim credit for wisdom and moderation in suggesting a removal one by one. Take, for instance, a plan for abolishing all gaol-fees; none but a gaoler would condemn the plan as precipitate because it included all the gaols in the country, or would have the impudence to plume himself upon his wisdom and moderation for proposing instead, a gradual and successive abolition; as for Newgate, one year; for the Fleet prison, the next; for the King's Bench in a third; and so on for a century. Transfer the scene to domestic life, and suppose a man who has run himself into debt by keeping six race-horses, when he has only the means of keeping one:—an advocate of the gradual system would recommend to his friend something of this sort;—Spend the first year in considering which of your horses to give up; the next year, if you can satisfy yourself which it shall be, give up one: by this sacrifice, the sincerity of your intentions and your reputation for economy will be established, and you need think no more about the matter.

13. Fallacy of artful diversion.

A measure is proposed, which, on account of its obvious utility, can neither be safely attacked, nor openly resisted:—The fallacy consists in suggesting some other measure which bears a similarity in name or nature to the original plan, and in promising to bring it forward at an early opportunity. You then give formal notice of your intention to propose this measure. The matter is of too great importance to be compassed in the same Session; you accordingly announce your intention for the next Session. When the next Session comes, the measure is of too great importance to be brought on the carpet at the commencement of the Session; at that period it is not mature enough: If you cannot delay it any longer, you bring it forward just as the Session closes. Time is thus gained, and without any decided loss on the score of reputation, for what you undertook has been to the letter performed. When the measure has at length been brought in, you may take your choice between operations for further delay, and operations for frustrating the original plan: If you choose delay, extreme difficulty and extreme importance are themes on which you blow the trumpet, and which are sure to be sufficiently echoed. If you prefer complete frustration of the original plan, you substitute another, bearing no relation to it but identity of name.

IV. FALLACIES OF CONFUSION.

Of this class we shall have to examine fourteen:—

Question-begging appellatives.

Sham distinctions.

Impostor terms.

Vague generalities.

Allegorical idols.

Sweeping classifications.

Reproach of popular corruption.

Anti-rational fallacies.

Paradoxical assertion.

Cause and obstacle confounded.

The end justifies the means.

Not measures, but men.

14. Question-begging appellatives.

The nature and unhappy frequency of appellatives of this kind have already been fully brought to view in the opening of this treatise.

The fallacy consists in assuming the point to be debated, by employing, instead of neutral terms, terms eulogistic or dyslogistic, as may best serve the purpose of the moment. Thus if you wish to recommend a proposed change or alteration, (neutral terms,) in which nevertheless, you are unable to point out any assignable advantages, you call it boldly an improvement; (the eulogistic term:)—if you are hostile to the change, but at the same time are unable to specify any preponderating inconvenience as likely to result from it, you brand it at once with the dyslogistic term, innovation; which having happily for your purpose, contracted a bad sense, means something which is new and bad at the same time, and so saves you the trouble of any further argument. In this same manner you designate your own belief and practice with regard to spiritual matters, as religion, piety, zeal, orthodoxy, and so forth; the belief and practice of those who differ from you, as superstition, credulity, fanaticism, blasphemy, and the like. The only way to expose an orator who deals largely in these terms is drily to shew that the thing of which he is speaking may always be characterised under three different names, according to the temper of the speaker; but the potency and extent of this instrument of deception are most deplorable. Our ideas of things are so intimately associated with the words which usually represent them, and so large a proportion of words in addition to the thing they represent, represent also as inseparably connected with it, some sentiment of approbation or disapprobation, that it is a matter of reflexion and enquiry to detach the one from the other, and to view the thing simply for the purpose of close examination. The speaker often employs a word of this cast, without any intention to deceive, and the hearer often falls into the snare without suspecting its existence.

Of the same nature as the foregoing fallacy, and closely allied to it, are—

By which, sham approbation, accorded to a state of things under its eulogistic name, is employed as a mask or cloak for the real opposition made to the same state of things under a dyslogistic name. Take, for example, Liberty and Licentiousness of the Press. The benefit derived to the community, by allowing the press to give publicity to the official faults and errors of public men, is so incontestable, that few will openly declare themselves hostile to the Liberty of the press. This benefit however cannot be attained without some attendant inconvenience. The press, like every thing of human origin, is fallible, and along with true imputations, false ones will occasionally be made: till the law has defined what is libellous, observations will often wander from the public to the private conduct of the individual arraigned; and the observations will be couched in language more or less acrimonious and vituperative. In this state of things there are no means of excluding unjust and coarse attacks, without excluding just ones also; an alternative to which no friend of the people would resort if the benefit arising from the power of making just accusations preponderated over the inconvenience of admitting occasional unjust ones. About this there can be no doubt. Without the check of the press, the misdoings of public men are subject to no other control than that of impeachment by law; and if, as generally happens, they are themselves the arbiters of impeachment, the press is the only safeguard against all the evils of arbitrary power:—such is the extent of the benefit. The inconvenience, on the other hand, is in reality slight: the channel which has been used for attack is equally open for defence, and truth must quickly prevail if the individual attacked be innocent ; it ought also to be remembered, that the public man will resort to this defence, with the advantage of having at command all the wealth and talent of the country ; that censure is the tax which has always been submitted to by eminence, and that he who accepts a public situation has no more right to complain that his conduct is freely scrutinized, than a soldier, that he is shot at in battle.

The enemy of the liberty of the press, however, fastens upon the inconveniences inseparable from it in the absence of a clear law of libel ; these inconveniences he stigmatizes with the appellation of Licentiousness, and under pretence of suppressing licentiousness, would in effect annihilate all freedom of discussion. In truth, when his meaning comes to be sifted, it appears that the licentiousness of the press is the disclosure of any abuse from which he or his derive advantage, and from the indication of which they are liable to sustain loss or shame ; the liberty of the press is such disclosure, and such only, from which they apprehend no inconvenience to themselves.

Next in order come—

(16.) Impostor terms,

By which, in order to justify or disguise a thing indefensible under its real name, recourse is had to some more general term, which together with the indefensible thing includes others, the objects of approbation. The word gallantry, for instance, has two senses ; in the one it denotes on the part of the stronger sex the disposition to manifest towards the weaker that attention and kindness which so peculiarly distinguishes civilized from savage life ; in the other it is, in the main, synonymous to adultery.—Now, say of a man that he has committed adultery, and he shall scarcely thank you for the compliment ; insinuate the same thing by calling him a man of gallantry, the complacency of his smile will indicate his self satisfaction, and show how little he disclaims the charge, although there may be no foundation for it in fact. To take another example—If there be any meaning in the word representation, it is totally incompatible with a system of election procedure, which induces or enables an elector, from the hope of private profit or the fear of private loss, to vote for a candidate whom he would not otherwise have supported ; to defend such a system under its true appellation, corruption, would be impossible : its abettors therefore speak of it by an ambiguous word, expressing in one sense this state of facts which they cannot deny, and in another, another state of facts to which no one could object. This word is, influence. Influence of the Crown ; Influence of Property. Now influence is of two kinds. Influence of will on will ; influence of understanding on understanding. In the exercise of the former arise all the evils occasioned by despotism or aristocracy.—The exercise of the latter is no other than the exercise of human reason, a guide which like other guides is liable to err ; but which in political as well as private matters is the only guide we can procure, or ought to follow.

But when the present state of election procedure is admitted to be subject to the influence of the crown, or the influence of property, the hearer, doubtful, perhaps, in which of the two senses the word influence is applied, receives it for the most part with an indistinct if not an absolute sentiment of approbation.

An expression is vague and ambiguous, when it designates by one and the same appellation an object which may be good or bad, according to circumstances; and if in the course of enquiry touching the qualities of such an object such an expression is employed without a recognition of this distinction, the expression operates as a fallacy. Take for instance the terms Government, Laws, Morals, Religion: each of these may be good or bad according to circumstances; for no one will deny that there have been, and still are, bad governments, bad laws, bad systems of morals, and bad religions.

The bare circumstance, therefore, of a man's attacking government, law, morals, or religion, does not of itself afford the slightest presumption that he is engaged in any thing blameable: if his efforts are directed only against that which is bad in each, they may be productive of good to any extent. This essential distinction the defender of abuse takes care to keep out of sight, and boldly imputes to his opponent an intention to subvert all government, laws, morals, or religion.

This is usually done, rather in the way of insinuation than of direct assertion.—Propose any thing with a view to improving the actual practice in government, law, or religion, you are immediately treated with an oration on the necessity of maintaining these objects of general regard, from which oration the hearer is desired to infer that the existence of them is incompatible with the measure proposed. It is with this view that in political debates recourse is so frequently had to such expressions as Order; Social Order; Establishment; Matchless Constitution; Balance of Power.

Order, —Social Order,—can mean little more than that state of things which is agreeable to the speaker; for the system established under Caligula or Bonaparte, was by each of them probably styled and esteemed the perfection of social order. For this indefinite expression substitute one more precise, and the Sophist is immediately defeated; instead of enquiring in what way a measure proposed may affect social order, ask what bearing it has upon the greatest happiness of the greatest number, and the apprehensions excited for the fate of social order will probably be soon allayed.

The same observations apply to the word Establishment, whether of church or state.

So as to Matchless Constitution!—if the constitution means the actual state of government, it has at least some bad points as well as good. It affords facilities for waste of public money, depredation, and oppression in almost every department. Now in their own names, Waste, Depredation, and Oppression cannot be toasted: Gentlemen cannot cry, Waste for ever! Depredation for ever! Oppression for ever! but, The Constitution for ever! This they may and do cry, and make a merit of it. Applied to the government of England, the word Constitution is pre-eminently indeterminate and unmeaning. As a designation of the collective securities for any specific mode of government, the word is perfectly precise; but in England no definite plan of government has ever been drawn up or established. The constitutions of the French and American republics, of the kingdom of Holland, and of other countries, have been reduced into form—the securities for their respective administration defined one by one, and published in a book. It is needless to say that no such record of the English Constitution has ever appeared; and that the word, as applied to the English government, can denote no settled form of polity, but only that form to which it suits the speaker's interest to apply it. A political constitution, however, of some sort, being essential to the public welfare, the epithet constitutional has acquired in the abstract a eulogistic sense, and impresses the unreflecting with some notion of undefined excellence. How fatal this error may become, where what is constitutional depends on the authority of the speaker, it is not difficult to perceive.

It is scarcely necessary to pursue the investigation farther.

Balance of Power, as between the three branches of the state, King, Lords, and Commons, is an expression absolutely devoid of meaning; the functions of government cannot be performed without action; but bodies in equipoise must, with reference to each other, be entirely at rest.

18. Allegorical Idols.

This fallacy, which is only a modification of the preceding, consists in substituting for men's proper official denomination, some general term to which an idea of excellency is attached: as government, for the members of the governing body; the church, for churchmen; the law, for lawyers. The device is used with the view of securing to individuals, and to the bad parts of an institution, the respect attached to the institution at large, and by that means, of exempting them from the control of public opinion. Propose to examine the conduct of a minister,—point out an abuse from which he derives an advantage,—the answer is at hand; “you are an enemy to the government.” So, in whatever manner the imperfections in the church establishment are brought to notice;—the disproportion between pay and service, for instance, or the pernicious effects of tithes,—the cry of “enemy to the church,” at once overwhelms the assailant.

The fallacy of Sweeping Classifications ascribes to one individual the qualities possessed by another, merely because the two have been classed together under a common name. The fallacy is equally applicable to undeserved eulogy as to undeserved censure; when employed for the purpose of undeserved censure, it scarcely differs from that species of vituperative personality which has already been noticed as “Imputation founded on identity of denomination.” The injustice with which the Catholics of the present day are charged with a disposition to renew the barbarities of their ancestors, was fully pointed out under that section, and one example more will now suffice.

In the heat of the French revolution, when Louis was yet on his trial, among the means employed for bringing about the result that followed, was the publication of a pamphlet entitled “The crimes of Kings.” The object of the writer was obviously to ensnare his readers into some such reasoning as the following: “Criminals ought to be punished: kings are criminals, and Louis is a king; therefore Louis ought to be punished.” It is needless to expose so gross a fallacy. But it was with a view to the same kind of reasoning that during one of the debates on Catholic Emancipation, a book was put forth with the title of “Cruelties of the Catholics.”

This fallacy consists in imputing to the people such a degree of political depravity and corruption, as to render useless any changes in our system of representation. "Instead of reforming Parliament, reform yourselves;" "The corruption is in the people not in the government." Such is the tone usually assumed, and which, whether sincere or affected, is the result of a thick confusion of ideas. The charge is, that the governed will, like the governing, sacrifice when they can, to their private interest, their share in the general interest of the community; and instead of exercising in the choice of representatives a discretion beneficial to the public, will vote for the individual who has most ability to serve their private interests if they favour him, or to injure them if they vote against him.

That, in the present state of political knowledge, they will do this for the most part when they can, is pretty clear, from the predominating influence of that regard for self which has already been explained, as so necessary not only to our welfare, but to our very existence. Unchecked by laws and by appropriate political institutions, this feeling, so salutary in the main, will unquestionably in some directions be productive of pernicious effects, but this affords the stronger reason for framing and establishing those appropriate institutions, instead of ignorantly lamenting the existence of the feeling, or reproaching the people with a more than ordinary submission to its influence. If there be any means by which it can be rendered impossible for an elector to serve his private interest at the expence of the general interest of the community; if all motives to do this can be removed out of his way, and the only motives which shall be left to operate upon him, shall be those which will induce him to further to the best of his ability his share in the general interest of the community, it is unjust and absurd to reproach him with yielding to a temptation which it is the duty of the legislature to remove out of his way.

That such means may easily be found, cannot be doubtful to those who have considered the mode of election procedure by ballot. When the candidate has no means of ascertaining with certainty which way the elector has given his vote, it is useless to threaten, foolish to promise, and almost lost labour even to canvass. When the elector is protected, if he chooses, by the secrecy of this mode of procedure, from being deprived of his farm or his customer, for giving a conscientious vote; when no man will offer him a bribe even though he be willing to receive it, because it can never be ascertained whether or not he has voted as the briber directs; no course remains but to serve the general interest, by voting for an able and upright man.

21. Anti-rational fallacies.

When reason is adverse to a man's interests, he will naturally feel an antipathy to any exercise of the faculty, and so long as abuses exist in the administration of government, they who profit by them will endeavour to render the powers of reason, and even thought itself, an object of contempt. This is accomplished by speaking of every intellectual process in a tone of sarcasm and ridicule. If a plan does not suit the interests of an official person, who is unable to assign any valid objection against it, he saves himself the trouble of rational discussion, by pronouncing it speculative or theoretical; he will hold up the word theory, and even plan, project, system, as exciting ideas of distrust and apprehension. "Looking at the House of Commons," says one of these orators, "my object would be to find out its chief defects, and attempt the remedy of them one by one," (snail's-pace argument,) "To propose no system, no great project, nothing which pretended even to the name of a plan, but to introduce in a temperate and conciliatory manner, one or two separate bills."

Now a theory is formed out of general conclusions drawn from the collection and comparison of facts. Facts taken alone and by themselves are altogether useless; and the sum of every man's knowledge is in effect made up of the number and extent of his theories. Undoubtedly there are bad theories as well as good; but it would be as absurd to proscribe all theory, because some is bad, as to proscribe all reasoning, because some reasoning is a vehicle for fallacy.

The honest course in such cases is, not to condemn a theory, plan, or system, merely because it is a theory, and bears the marks of rational contrivance, but to examine and point out in what respect, if any, it is likely to prove defective. If this were done, instead of the absurd expression which we often hear from the unreflecting, that a thing may be good in theory, but bad in practice, it would be found that whatever was bad in practice must be bad in theory also.

Thus, the scheme for lighting the streets with gas, held out to those who proposed to engage in it a larger profit than was warranted by the result; but upon examination of the scheme it was afterwards discovered that the projector had in his calculations inadvertently omitted the expence of iron pipes for conveying the gas. As to the expected profits, therefore, the project was bad in practice, because it was bad in theory. If indeed a theory is nothing more than from a general survey and comparison of the means in possession and the end in view, to adapt the one to the other for the purpose of practice, it is not easy to perceive how that which is bad in practice can be good in theory. According to this strange absurdity, the very goodness of a plan, has sometimes been urged as a ground for its rejection. "It is too good to be practical.:" an objection which has been sufficiently answered by the foregoing exposition.

To the epithets speculative and theoretical, are often added in the same sense, or by way of aggravation and climax, those of visionary, chimerical, romantic, Utopian. If these words have any meaning beyond that of the speaker's dislike to the measure against which he directs them, it is, that in his estimation the measure is impracticable. If this be so, it would be so easy to state why he entertains such an opinion; what he esteems to be difficulties in the way of carrying the measure into execution; what the causes of its probable failure; that when in lieu of this, he merely resorts to vituperative and contemptuous expressions, it may safely be inferred he has no such objections to urge.

Besides the set who find their account in every instrument of delusion which can mystify the intellects of mankind, the anti-rational fallacies are singularly acceptable to three extensive classes of men.—To the idle and frivolous, who hate the trouble; to the ignorant, who have not the means; and to the dull, who have not the power of thinking on intricate and extensive subjects. Their ease and their vanity conspire in inducing them to get rid of thought, and these fallacies are the most efficient instruments for the purpose: an expression of scorn levelled at the author of this trouble, is at once likely to operate as a suppression of the evil, and as a punishment, however inadequate, for the disturbance attempted to be given to honourable repose.

The object of the preceding fallacy, is, as we have seen, to bring into disesteem the faculty of reason itself. The fallacy of paradoxical assertion proposes to cast discredit on the only modes in which reason can be usefully employed. With this view the principle of utility, (or that which seeks to establish the greatest happiness of the greatest number, as the paramount object of morals and legislation,) has been denounced as a useless or even dangerous principle; classification, method, and simplification, as frivolous impediments to knowledge, and political disinterestedness, as a mark of the basest profligacy*.

The object of those who pronounce in the same breath, the extravagance, that things which are useful, are at the same time and on that very account, not useful, is the same as theirs who decry that quality of discourse which is known by the name of method or classification. By following a methodical rule the elements of good and bad are extracted from the details of every measure, and brought to view in the state best fitted for comparison. How far the opposite state of confusion and darkness, is better suited to the purposes of those who profit by a system in which the interests of the many are sacrificed to the interests of the few, is too obvious to require further elucidation. It is true, that in order to arrive at correct conclusions in the application of the principle of utility, a concurrence of intelligence, discernment, patience and integrity, is requisite; of each of them, no inconsiderable amount; while nothing more than a moderate share of ignorance, impudence, and improbity, is necessary to qualify a man for pronouncing decisions in the true ipse-dixit style; but whether it be safer to act on decisions so pronounced, than to search for correct deductions from the principle of utility,—whether the compass should be thrown overboard, because it occasionally varies,—whether the principle of utility should be stigmatised as dangerous, and abandoned, because men may occasionally err in the application of it,—is left to the ingenious reader to determine.

Non causa pro causa; or Cum hoc, ergo propter hoc.

In every political system of long standing, which has not been produced in prosecution of any comprehensive design, but piecemeal, at different and distant times, according to the predominance of conflicting interests, among the incidents which may compose the general result, some will be found to have operated as promotive causes, others as obstacles, and others, as uninfluencing circumstances. It is obvious, that if the system contain any good points, the beneficial effects arising from them are not occasioned by the abuses or imperfections of the system, but that such abuses must have operated as obstacles.

The fallacy in question consists in representing the obstacles, or at least the uninfluencing circumstances as the cause of the beneficial results ; it is the converse of the preceding fallacy, which represented evil as occasioned by good ; whereas this represents good as occasioned by evil.

It would be easy to shew, for instance, if this were the proper place, that if the English have been less ill-governed and more prosperous than other European nations, such comparative exemption from mis-government, and such prosperity, have been mainly occasioned by the greater degree of publicity which, through the press and other means, has always attended our legislative and judicial proceedings ; this publicity having created a tribunal of public opinion, to which, in the long run, our rulers have been more or less obliged to submit. It would be equally easy to shew, that among the causes which have contributed to promote misgovernment, and impede us in the career of prosperity, the most active and prevailing has been the system of our parliamentary representation : a system, by which a few powerful families are, to a considerable extent, enabled to apply to their own purposes the immense sums of money annually collected from the people in the way of taxation.

The orator, however, who profits by this disposition of the public money, and has, therefore, some small interest in supporting this state of the representation, jumbles together publicity, representation, (virtual representation as he calls it,) hereditary monarchy, and an hereditary court of justice, in one lump, which he calls the system, or the constitution, and then expatiating on the general prosperity of the country, affirms, that the system “works well in practice ;” by this he would have it inferred, and the illogical heads of his hearers intoxicated by his glowing descriptions, have accordingly inferred, that the prosperity so described, is entirely owing to that virtual representation, which, by the waste of the public resources, has mainly contributed to check its career. Much in the same way, the influence of the crown and the seats possessed by the bishops in the House of Lords, have been represented as being among the causes of good government ; the system of education pursued at the universities, as the cause of national learning ; the usury laws, as the cause of national wealth ; and the opulence of the clergy as the cause of national virtue.

Luckily, it is easy to discomfit by the single monosyllable “How ?” the sophist who employs this fallacy ; if these effects are produced by this cause, shew us how : we cannot admit it upon unsupported assertion

Real knowledge depends in a great degree on the being able to distinguish from each other, causes, obstacles, and uninfluencing circumstances, and if the querist is able to pursue this division, he will have little difficulty in exposing the ignorance or dishonesty of his opponent.

24. Fallacy of Partiality.

“From the abuse argue not against the use.”

When abuses are too plain to be denied, the system may yet be defended by the old and pernicious maxim, "From the abuse argue not against the use," by which it is proposed, that in taking an account of the effects of an institution, you should set down all the good effects, and omit all the bad ones.

The point to be ascertained in every such enquiry, is, which predominate; if it be shewn that the bad predominate—that the good are so few as not to compensate for the bad—it is obviously just and necessary, from the abuse, to argue against the use.

25. The end justifies the means.

Yes: but only on three conditions, either of which failing, the justification fails also: One is,—That the end be good. The second,—That the means be either purely good, or, if evil, having less of evil in them, than on the balance, there is of good in the end. The third,—That they have more good or less evil in them than any others by the employment of which the end might have been attained. Laying out of the case these restrictions, note the absurdities which would follow. The procuring a penny loaf is the end I aim at; the goodness of it is indisputable: if by the goodness of the end, any means employed in the attainment of it are justified, instead of a penny I may give a pound. Thus stands the justification on the score of prudence: or instead of giving a penny, I may cut the baker's throat and get it for nothing; and thus stands the justification on the ground of beneficence and benevolence.

In politics, this fallacy in the mouth of the Ins, has served, and will serve, for the justification of whatever cruelties those by whom power is exercised, may find a pleasure or profit in committing on those over whom power is justified. In the mouth of the Outs it has a manifest alliance with, and constitutes, in fact, the practical result of the fallacy which follows next: viz.—

26. Not Measures but Men.

A fallacy mainly resorted to by the Outs, who would imply by it, that good government can never be attained by any measures of their opponents in office, but can only be brought about by changing those opponents for another set of individuals, to wit, the Outs, whose rigid virtue is to be the main security for a just exercise of the ruling power. To this end, it is represented, not only as allowable, but commendable for a member of the Outs to speak and vote against a measure of the Ins, although he may deem the measure itself beneficial; or to support a measure of the Outs although he may deem it pernicious: in other words that the end is such as to justify the pursuit of it by means of gross improbity.

Now what does this end assume? that they who pursue it are a class of beings exempted from the common incident of humanity;—the disposition to prefer self to others;—that they alone are ready upon all occasions to sacrifice their private interest to the interest of the community; and that though the Ins cannot be trusted with power for want of adequate checks in the constitution to secure the just use of it, the Outs may be trusted without any alteration in the system, without the establishment of those checks, the absence of which enables the Ins to do so much mischief.

This exposition is of itself a sufficient exposure of the fallacy; and the annals of mankind may shew how far such exceptions to the general laws of human nature have ever yet been witnessed,—how far such impudent pretensions have any foundation in fact. The general predominance of personal over social considerations is sufficiently attested in the existence of laws which hold out the fear of punishment as a check to the thereby acknowledged propensity in men, to prefer themselves to others.

Political institutions having originated for the most part in ignorant and barbarous ages, the contrivers of them had not sufficient knowledge or integrity, to devise in matters of government, those apposite direct and indirect means for regulating the predominance of personal considerations, which to a certain extent have been attained in matters of jurisprudence. Instead therefore of reposing confidence in quacks, who, upon no better evidence than their own assertions, and in opposition to the unvaried experience of ages, call upon us to believe that they alone are exempt from the operation of that self-regard which is necessary for the welfare and existence of man, we ought so to alter our defective institutions, as by means of a system of apposite checks and regulations, to direct the self regard of even the most selfish among the governing body, in a course which shall not fail to promote the benefit of the governed.

27. Opposer General's argument.

This is a fallacy from the same quiver as the preceding.

When a measure is so clearly beneficial that specific objections cannot be found, the only hope of depriving the Ins of the credit they are likely to obtain, is, by an attempt to reject the measure altogether on the pretence of a regard for economy; or by denouncing it as a job; that is, fraught with advantage to some assignable individual; or as likely to increase the influence of the crown.

Assuming the measure to be one of those in which these inconveniences, to whatever they may amount, are not preponderant over the proposed public advantage, it is clear that a man of probity, whose object is not merely to deprive an opponent of credit, will suggest, not rejection, but amendment: if the measure can be duly accomplished at less than the estimated expence, he will shew how, in detail, and so consult the interests of economy; if the advantage to some single individual will interfere with the interests of the public, he will shew how, and propose to amend the measure by excluding that lot of advantage;—supposing that advantage not to interfere with the interest of the public, it is clearly an additional recommendation to the measure, for public advantage is only made up of the sum of individual advantage:—if the supposed accession to the influence of the crown be an avoidable evil, he will shew how; if not avoidable, still he will not propose to reject the measure unless he can clearly establish that the influence is increased to such a degree as to constitute an amount of evil which will outweigh the projected advantage.

If in lieu of these details, in lieu of possible amendment, he insists upon rejection on the mere cry of Economy; Job; Influence; these are cries which might equally be directed against any measure which ever has been or can be proposed or carried, and therefore clearly indicate the absence of any specific and preponderating objection to the measure in hand.

The same observations apply to every case in which inconveniences, remediable or not preponderant, are urged as grounds for the entire rejection instead of the amendment of a measure generally beneficial.

Here, for the present, we close our examination of these mischievous instruments of Deception.

The Treatise, as the intelligent reader will not fail to have perceived, is nothing more than a condensation and new arrangement of the matter contained in "The Book of Fallacies," and in the French Version of the same matter, which may be found in the second volume of the Tactiques des Assemblées Législatives. With the profound writers of those works we may regret that the catalogue is far from complete—the exposure far from perfect; but until some abler hand shall have supplied the deficiencies of our execution, we trust that the present attempt may be found not unserviceable to the cause of improvement and the best interests of mankind.

SESSION OF 1825.—6th GEO. IV.

On THURSDAY, Feb. 3d, the Session of Parliament was opened by Commission from His MAJESTY.

THE KING'S SPEECH.

The Commons being summoned to the House of Lords in the usual form, and the commission being read, the LORD CHANCELLOR read His Majesty's speech as follows:—

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"We are commanded by His Majesty to express to you the gratification which his Majesty derives from the continuance and progressive increase of that public prosperity, upon which His Majesty congratulated you at the opening of the last session of Parliament.

"There never was a period in the history of this country, when all the great interests of the nation were at the same time in so thriving a condition, or when a feeling of content and satisfaction was more widely diffused through all classes of the British people.

"It is no small addition to the gratification of His Majesty, that Ireland is participating in the general prosperity. The outrages, for the suppression of which extraordinary powers were confided to His Majesty, have so far ceased, as to warrant the suspension of the exercise of those powers in most of the districts heretofore disturbed. Industry and commercial enterprise are extending themselves in that part of the United Kingdom. It is, therefore, the more to be regretted, that associations should exist in Ireland, which have adopted proceedings irreconcilable with the spirit of the Constitution, and calculated, by exciting alarm, and by exasperating animosities, to endanger the peace of society, and to retard the course of national improvement.

"His Majesty relies upon your wisdom to consider, without delay, the means of applying a remedy to this evil.

"His Majesty further recommends the renewal of the inquiries instituted last session into the state of Ireland.

"His Majesty has seen, with regret, the interruption of tranquillity in India, by the unprovoked aggression, and extravagant pretensions of the Burmese Government, which rendered hostile operations against that state unavoidable. It is, however, satisfactory to find that some of the other Native Powers have manifested any unfriendly disposition, and that the bravery and conduct displayed by the forces already employed against the enemy, afford the most favourable prospect of a successful termination of the contest.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"His Majesty has directed us to inform you, that the estimates of the year will be forthwith laid before you.

"The state of India, and circumstances connected with other parts of His Majesty's foreign possessions, will render some augmentation in his military establishments indispensable.

"His Majesty has, however, the sincere gratification of believing, that notwithstanding the increase of expense arising out of this augmentation, such is the flourishing condition, and progressive improvement of the revenue, that it will still be in your power, without affecting public credit, to give additional facilities to the national industry, and to make a further reduction in the burdens of his people.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"His Majesty commands us to inform you, that His Majesty continues to receive from his Allies, and generally from all Princes and States, assurances of their unabated desire to maintain and cultivate the relations of peace with His Majesty, and with each other; and that it is His Majesty's constant endeavour to preserve the general tranquillity.

"The negotiations which have been so long carried on through His Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople, between the Emperor of Russia and the Ottoman Porte, have been brought to an amicable issue.

"His Majesty has directed to be laid before you, copies of arrangements which have been entered into with the kingdoms of Denmark and Hanover, for improving the commercial intercourse between those States and the United Kingdom.

"A treaty, having for its object, the more effectual suppression of the slave trade, has been concluded between His Majesty and the King of Sweden, a copy of which treaty (as soon as the ratifications thereof shall have been exchanged) His Majesty has directed to be laid before you.

"Some difficulties have arisen with respect to the ratification of the treaty for the same object which was negotiated last year between His Majesty and the United States of America. These difficulties, however, His Majesty trusts, will not finally impede the conclusion of so beneficial an arrangement.

"In conformity with the declarations which have been repeatedly made by His Majesty, His Majesty has taken measures for confirming by treaties the commercial relations already subsisting between this kingdom and those countries of America which appear to have established their separation from Spain. So soon as these treaties shall be completed, His Majesty will direct copies of them to be laid before you.

"His Majesty commands us not to conclude without congratulating you upon the continued improvement in the state of the agricultural interest, the solid foundation of our national prosperity; nor without informing you, that evident advantage has been derived from the relief which you have recently given to commerce by the removal of inconvenient restrictions.

"His Majesty recommends to you to persevere (as circumstances may allow) in the removal of similar restrictions; and His Majesty directs us to assure you, that you may rely upon His Majesty's cordial co-operation in fostering and extending that commerce, which, whilst it is, under the blessing of Providence, a main source of strength and power to this country, contributes in no less a degree to the happiness and civilization of mankind."

Their Lordships then adjourned, and re-assembled at five o'clock.

THE ADDRESS.

The Speech having been again read:—

Lord Dudley and Ward rose to move an humble address in answer to the Speech. Having enlarged upon the various topics contained in the speech, particularly the financial and commercial prosperity of the country, and the commercial policy of Ministers; he justified the late recognition of the various states in South America, from the aspersions of the Continental party, known in France, under the name of ultras; a party which he described as eminently hostile to this country, whose glory and wealth they envied, and whose constitution they regarded as at variance with the principle of legitimacy. As long as any chance of recovering her colonies remained, we had declined to recognize the South American States, out of deference to Old Spain. He observed that to compare the situation of Spain and her colonies, with that of Great Britain and our American settlements, during the American war, as was done by the despotic party on the Continent, was absurd. The question between Spain and her dependencies was in fact settled, by the latter having achieved their independence; at the period referred to, our colonies were not in that condition; as soon as they were, their independence was acknowledged also. He next adverted to that part of His Majesty's speech which relates to Ireland. That country had participated in the general prosperity, though in a less degree. The effects of that participation were seen in the increased rent of land, and the general tranquillity of the country. It had been too much the fashion to speak of Ireland as an ill-used country. He could not say that England had always behaved towards Ireland with perfect justice; but the system of government had been greatly altered during the late reign, and was completely changed by the union of the two countries. Since that time, the welfare of Ireland had been an object of anxious care to the United Parliament. Upon an occasion like the present, he was anxious to avoid topics which might lead to extended discussion, yet the state of Ireland, though it was a subject on which he should not say much, was one which could not be passed over in silence. The final settling of the troubles in Ireland depended upon doing justice to the Irish Catholics, (hear, hear.) Sooner or later, concession on that point would be inevitable. It was a question, certainly, of the greatest importance, but he did not think it of such a nature that those members of his Majesty's Councils, who were known to favour it, ought to prosecute it at the risk of dissolving the Government of which they formed a part. The claims of the Catholics were supported by all friends to toleration, who held this vantage ground in every argument. It must be confessed, however, that the maxims upon which the Catholics had once acted, were such as could not fail to be remembered by the posterity of those who saw and suffered the oppressions which had been committed in the name of the Catholic religion. He could not refuse to acknowledge that the prejudice existing in many minds against the Catholic faith, was connected with many good principles; and was one which could only yield to time and conciliatory measures. It was for the Catholics to show that they cherished no intolerant feelings now; to wipe out the stain with which their former conduct had been blackened. He was sorry, however, to find that the conduct lately pursued by associations in Ireland, alluded to in His Majesty's Speech, was not only ill adapted to this purpose, but was quite irreconcilable with the spirit of the Constitution, and calculated to endanger the peace of society. The transactions of those societies had been of a nature that trod upon the utmost verge of the law: and if the contest now going on in that country were allowed to proceed, it was possible that the parties might come to open war. He would not say that this was likely to take place: but if it did, the Catholics would be the sufferers. There was only one way by which their object could be obtained: by humbly appealing to the justice of Parliament. Every thing like revenge, every thing like hostility in their conduct, could only serve to bring the question to a calamitous issue for them. It would then become a question: as to who was the strongest; and of the result of such a question there could be no doubt. The Protestant interest of Ireland, though less, numerically, than the Catholic, was infinitely superior in wealth, power, and intelligence. It might, however, be said, that they would perhaps be aided by foreign arms, as they had formerly been, and with such aid it was possible the Catholics might prevail against an undoubted superiority of domestic force in Ireland; but it was not likely that they could also prevail against the power of this country; and if they did, what would the consequences be? What was it they desired? A participation in the political rights enjoyed by members of the national church: but they would only gain a participation in expiring freedom. All sensible Catholics must be convinced that their present state was better for them, than any they would be placed in after incurring such a risk. They had every prospect of obtaining their object by peaceable and constitutional means. They had almost an equality of votes in favour of that object in both houses of Parliament. The great question of Catholic emancipation would doubtless come again into consideration, during the present Session. Their lordships would then have to consider whether the situation of the Irish Catholics, was one which could or ought to last—whether it was possible to retain a great body of men in the state in which they were placed, discontented in peaceful, and perhaps disaffected in troubled times—whether, supposing the evils which some apprehended from concession to be admitted, it would not be better to make that concession, than to live in this constant state of discontent and possible revolution.

Lord Gort, who seconded the address, confined himself to that part of the Royal speech which referred to Ireland: after eulogizing the administration of the Marquis Wellesley, he animadverted upon the conduct and the pretensions of the Catholic Association. That body had assumed the rights, and exercised the powers of a Parliament. It imposed taxes, issued proclamations, and made laws for the Catholic community. Its professed object was Catholic emancipation, but its real tendency was to overthrow the Constitution. He would not now discuss the question of Catholic emancipation; but were he the most strenuous advocate of the most liberal concessions, he should still be the opponent of the Association. In this Catholic Parliament, the most declamatory speeches were uttered, and every topic of inflammation enforced. The Catholics were taught to believe that they were the objects of Government hostility—that they were universally oppressed, and that the Protestants were their oppressors. So decided was this Association in its opposition to the constituted authorities of the land, that some change must be made. The two Parliaments—the Catholic and themselves—could not co-exist: either the Catholic or the legitimate Parliament must give way. Entertaining this view of the question, he entirely concurred in the suggestion from the Throne, that the Association must be put down. By means of the "Catholic rent" system, it had levied taxes on every parish in Ireland; and by means of its proclamations, and the co-operation of the priests, it had extended its authority, and exercised a striking influence from one end of the island to the other. The priests, in executing the orders of the Catholic Parliament, showed that they possessed an influence which they ought to have exerted in maintaining the public peace at other times. He should be sorry to be thought so void of constitutional principle, as to oppose any obstacles to the Catholics, in uniting to express their grievances, and to seek for redress; but if they were to come before their lordships, they must come as petitioners—they must come with prayers, and not with menaces—they must submit their demands to the discussion of Parliament, and wait the result with patience. In short, they must present the olive-branch, and not show the sword (hear, hear).

The address having been read from the woolsack,

Lord King admitted that the situation of England was prosperous and fortunate; but their lordships should not forget that such was not the situation of six millions of Catholics on the other side of the Irish Channel, suffering under a misgovernment which was a disgrace to our age and country. The world, in general, was now too wise to allow Governments to inflict penalties, or to withhold privileges, on account of differences of religious faith. This was almost the only government which carried on a contest with a large portion of its population on account of religion. Ireland and Turkey might be cited as the only countries in Europe where whole races were oppressed and punished on account of their faith. The Grand Sultan had been endeavouring to make converts of the Greeks, as the government of England had to make converts of the Irish Catholics; but they had not succeeded. When the unhappy Greeks complained of the sufferings which they endured, and applied to be treated a little better than Mussulman dogs, the Sultan sent for his Grand Vizier, to ask him what was to be done. This Grand Vizier had at first been a friend, and then an enemy, of the Grand Sultana. He had thus lost much of the favour of his master, and suffered himself to be bearded in his own Divan, by his officers and serving men (a laugh). He was hostile to some of the claims of the Greeks. The next person in the Divan, in point of influence, was the Reis Effendi, who was friendly to the just demands of this persecuted people. This officer, it was well known, was Minister for Foreign Affairs. His foreign policy deserved and obtained general approbation. In this part of his duties he conducted himself with remarkable liberality and talent. He had done great good, and gained considerable popularity to the government of the Sultan, and would have done more had his measures not been opposed by his less enlightened colleagues. He, in fact, was the only man of real genius in the whole Divan (a laugh), and was esteemed an ornament among Turkish statesmen, being gifted with poetical talents. The Kiaya Bey or Minister of the Interior and the Capitan Pacha were likewise against the Greeks in their claims for civil privileges; but the leader of the opposition to their cause was the head Mufli or chief of the Mussulman law (a laugh). This officer was an enemy to all change. He had regularly opposed all improvements in trade—all improvements in law—all improvements in foreign policy (a laugh). He had been, and always proclaimed himself, the greatest champion of existing abuses. He was the most consummate intriguer of the whole Divan (a laugh). He had at one time taken up the cause of the Sultana, but he turned against her when he found that by continuing to support her he would forfeit his place in the Divan. He then took up the cause of her enemies. At one time there was a proposal to admit some Greeks into the regular troops, or body of Janissaries. He then raised such a fanatical cry against this measure—very similar to the cry of "No Popery" in this country—that he turned out of the Divan the members who had adopted it. He succeeded himself to office, and he no sooner got in than he agreed to the very thing against which he had clamoured (a laugh). He kept the Sultan's conscience and his own; but it was never remarked of him that his conscience opposed his interests (a laugh). Having minutely studied the Turkish constitution, he had found out that it was essentially Mahometan (a laugh), and therefore hostile to Greek privileges. He had resolved, therefore, to continue staunch to the cause of intolerance, and was surrounded with the Mollahs, the Imams, and the Dervishes, who encouraged him in his hostile purposes. To complete the picture of this divided Divan, the members who composed it had resolved that in certain questions they should agree, and in certain questions they should agree to differ, without breaking up their union. Having seen the evils resulting from such a Divan—having seen the Mussulman empire torn by this intolerance of some members of it to their Greek brethren, and their quarrels among themselves—he would pray that this country might not be delivered up to such a divided cabinet (a laugh).

The Marquis of Lansdown concurred in all that was said about the internal prosperity of the country, and the wisdom of recognizing the independent states of South America. It showed that we had no intercommunity of feeling with these governments which claimed this right of interfering; and was done without exciting resentment, or placing our system in direct opposition to theirs (hear, hear). With reference to that part of His Majesty's speech which touched upon the state of Ireland, he regarded it as peculiarly important. He did not mean to enter into the proceedings of the Catholic Association, either in the way of justification or attack; but he cautioned their lordships to beware how they suffered themselves to be beguiled into an expectation, that by merely removing the outward symptoms of the malady submitted to their treatment, they gained any thing against the cause which produced those symptoms. In a state of irritation like that which prevailed at present—irritation arising out of the discontent of five or six millions of people, placed with respect to their law, their church, and their exclusion from political power, in a state entirely different from that of any other equal body in any other country in the world—he conjured noble lords not to believe that, by checking the Catholic Association, however its measures might call for check, they would cure the disease which affected the body of the Irish population; the existing symptoms might be removed; but new troubles must and would arise, arresting the prosperity of the sister kingdom, and in time of danger unerving the arm of our own. He set out with one conviction—that in any country situated as Ireland was, there must always exist a large fund of discontent ready to be drawn upon for evil purposes. Such being the case, was it not to be desired that public opinion should make its way by open channels rather than by secret ones?—that correspondence should be carried on, and communication, that sort of communication which would always prevail between different bodies of men labouring under similar disabilities, should circulate open and avowedly, than that it should be conducted in darkness and concealment, working its ends unheard and unperceived, and producing mischief where it perhaps might have been harmless, had the more eye of authority still retained power to pursue it? It was not “the outward and visible signs,” which constituted the disease with which Ireland was affected. The freemasonry which Government had to dread, was that which bowed men to each other by a common sense of interest, which taught them to strengthen themselves by alliance, and to aid each other in evading the law. What the nature of the evils anticipated from the proceedings of the Catholic Association was, he did not know. The noble Viscount who had seconded the address and adverted to the danger, but had not expressed the nature of it. When he should have all information upon this point, he should be

The Earl of Liverpool, after congratulating the government and the country on the restoration of a metallic currency—the removal of restrictions on commerce, and the precise time and circumstances in which the independence of South America had been recognized—when mediation had been offered by this country—when no considerable party was in arms in the Colonies in favour of Spain—when there was no prospect of reconciliation or re-conquest—proceeded to make a few remarks on the state of Ireland, which he said he could not treat as wholly unconnected with the general Catholic question, because there was no subject which interested or affected Ireland at all which some persons would not be disposed to mix up with that question. He should, however, treat it as a matter by no means growing out of, or immediately connected with it. For the measure which was to be proposed, there was nothing about it which should prevent its being discussed upon its own merits. There was nothing about it which touched the question of Catholic claims—nothing which the advocate of those claims might not vote for as freely as he who stood most opposed to them. With respect to the proceedings of the Catholic Association, there could be no doubt that they were undertaken, and carried on in that spirit which said, determinately—“Whatever law you make, our business is to evade and to nullify it.” There might be those who would say generally that they disliked the effect of the restrictive laws operating upon Ireland, and that they would do nothing to strengthen or extend them; but whenever those persons looked at the conduct of the Association—saw it actually levying a duty upon the Catholic population of Ireland—would they say that the existence of such a body was consistent with the constitution of this country, or compatible with its peace? He protested that if he himself stood before the House as the advocate of Catholic claims, the first act which he would propose should be the putting down that convention; because, if those claims were granted at all, they ought to be granted upon their own merits, and not to the demand of such a body as the Association, acting in the way in which that body was disposed to act. He did not deny the right of the Catholics to assemble and petition Parliament; but that right was not now the question; the question was, whether on their part conduct should be tolerated inconsistent with the spirit of the laws. The Speech from the Throne said, that in the general increasing prosperity of the country, Ireland was taking a large share. This was apparent in the cessation of those disturbances which some had attributed to political and religious animosities, but which he had always mainly attributed to distress. If, however, religious dissensions, and the political animosities arising out of them, tended to produce disturbance, what could be more mischievous than the measures of the Catholic Association? It seemed to him that both the safety and the prosperity of the country demanded that immediate measures should be taken against it. He should therefore sit down by giving notice, that on this day so might, he should move for a renewal of the committee for inquiring into the state of Ireland.

The Earl of Donoughmore regretted to hear any tone taken which seemed to threaten further measures of coercion against Ireland. He defended the Roman Catholics generally, and the Association in particular, from the charge of illegal proceedings. The Catholics paid taxes, and fought the battles of the country like other people, and ought not to be put down, as seemed to be intended. He was surprised that any minister who approved of the Speech which had been delivered from the Throne, could think it necessary to propose a committee to inquire into the state of Ireland. He wanted no inquiry; but would rest satisfied with the King's royal word, which declared that peace and tranquillity were restored to that part of the kingdom. Such being the case, he thought the coercive measures alluded to by His Majesty's ministers, ought not to be resorted to.

Lord Clifden argued, that the proceedings of the Catholic Association were perfectly legal, and that no quibbling could prove them to be otherwise. The Catholic rent was collected for, and applied to, various legal purposes; such as the education of the poor by Catholic priests, the establishment of newspapers, to combat the abuse of papers opposed to them, and the building of Chapels. The Speech from the Throne spoke of associations; he concluded, therefore, that it was intended to suppress the Orange Associations as well as the Catholic. It was extraordinary that Government should exhibit more intolerance towards the people of Ireland, than those of the kingdom of Hanover. His Majesty had lately issued a proclamation, declaring that in the kingdom of Hanover the professors of all Christian denominations should be on an equal footing with respect to civil privileges.

The Address was then agreed to unanimously.

COMMONS, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 3.—

The Speaker having read the Speech,

Lord F. Leveson Gower rose to move the Address. After expatiating upon the commercial and financial prosperity announced in the Speech, he said that as a friend to the question of Catholic emancipation, which some persons regarded as the panacea for all Irish evils, he felt bound to say a word upon the proceedings of the Catholic Association. He could not say that he felt contempt for that body; but looking at the nature of its proceedings, and feeling anxious for the success of the general measure to which they referred, he had the most ardent desire for its annihilation. No man who looked at the conduct of the principal members of that body would be disposed to envy them the station they had acquired in public opinion. Perhaps one might grudge those gentlemen the graceful diction and fertility of imagination by which they were distinguished; but the evils which they were likely to produce to the country would be ill compensated by speeches of flowing eloquence and rounded periods. The acerbity of public feeling which must be generated by such orations from either party, were obvious; and that would be increased by either party continuing to act as an organized body. As a friend to Ireland, he hoped that the violence of the Catholic Association on the one side, and the ravings of Orange inanity on the other, would no longer be allowed to disturb the tranquillity of that country. Their effects were already felt too much. Some persons were disposed to seize every phantom which presented itself to their minds, and exaggerate it to the highest state of disorder; and though they admitted that some rents were paid, and that some gentlemen could lie down at night with the hope of rising in the morning, they still would have it believed that Ireland was in the highest state of insubordination. He, however, was far from thinking that any such danger existed. He could state that no information received by His Majesty's ministers on the subject would lead to that conclusion. He then proceeded to account for the increase of the army, specifying the Burmese war, the conflict raging in the vicinity of the Mediterranean, and the necessity of keeping up a force in Canada, as the cause of this increase, and concluded by eulogizing the discretion with which the independence of South America had been recognized.

Mr. Alderman Thompson seconded the address. After complimenting his noble friend on the impression produced by his speech, he proceeded to make a few remarks on the foreign relations of the country. It must be highly gratifying to the country to learn, that through the mediation of his Majesty, the differences which existed between the Emperor of Russia and the Ottoman Porte had been brought to an amicable issue; that there was no prospect of the friendly intercourse which subsisted between this country and foreign Powers being disturbed; but, on the contrary, there was a well-founded expectation of a continuance of that good understanding which had now existed for many years, and which had chiefly contributed to raise this country to its present state of prosperity. Whilst on this subject, he would advert to an event which had lately occurred in France, the circumstances connected with which had offered strong evidence of the happy change which had taken place in the feelings and opinions of the people of that country, and offered a substantial pledge of permanent tranquillity. He alluded to the demise of the late King of France—an event which was contemplated with no inconsiderable anxiety by the people of every state in Europe. The termination of the life of that monarch was regarded as the last hope of the advocates for revolution; but, thanks to a benign Providence, their expectations had been disappointed: we had witnessed the sceptre of France pass into the hands of his legitimate successor without the slightest disorder, thus satisfactorily exhibiting to the world that the present dynasty of France rested on the most solid foundation. He was led to these observations from a wish to show, that the peace we now enjoyed was likely to continue, and that the country was rapidly advancing to a state which might be viewed as affording an indemnity for the vast sacrifices she had made in the accomplishment of the general peace and tranquillity of Europe. With respect to the fallen state of Spain, the declarations of the Government of France might, he thought, be safely confided in. He believed Charles X. to be sincere when he declared that his object in maintaining a military occupation of a part of Spain was not for the purpose of territorial aggrandizement, but with a view of protection to his own dominions. In proportion as that danger subsided, would he withdraw his army from Spain. His accession to the crown had been distinguished by a liberal policy, exemplified in the restoration of the liberty of the press and other institutions, which were in unison with a progressive state of tranquillity and civilization. He then repeated the statements concerning the South American States; and went on to observe that it was to be lamented, that at a moment when British capital was beginning to diffuse itself through Ireland—when the benefits of an unrestricted commercial intercourse between the two countries were daily exemplified—whilst measures were also in progress which could not fail to ameliorate the condition of the lower orders of Irish population—that those beneficial effects were impeded by the obtrusive interference of misguided individuals, who were exasperating animosities, diverting the attention of certain classes of His Majesty's faithful subjects from honest industry, and levying a species of tax upon a portion of the people of that country, with no other object than to enable those mistaken individuals to attempt to overawe the Parliament of the United Kingdom. He next adverted to that part of His Majesty's Speech which related to the improving state of our agricultural interests, of our trade, commerce, manufactures, and navigation. It could not fail to be gratifying to every Englishman, to behold our country, after a war of unprecedented length, carried on at an expense to the people to which history afforded no parallel, not merely recovered from the state of exhaustion attendant upon such a struggle, but raised to a degree of prosperity and glory unknown at any period. In proof whereof, he would advert to the increase of our revenue: the branch of Excise had exceeded the amount of the preceding year, by upwards of 1,100,000*l.*; and there was an increase in the Customs nearly equal to that in the Excise. Whatever part of England you visited, there were presented to your view a happy, contented, and industrious population; whether employed in the manufactories of our great staples, or in the cultivation of the soil. Within the short period of five years, he had heard gentlemen declare that England was a declining country,—that in commerce, manufactures, and navigation, she was incapable to enter into successful competition with any foreign rivals,—that the means by which she must sustain her public credit, were rapidly diminishing. And might he not now ask, triumphantly, how had these gloomy predictions been verified? He then alluded to the happy effects of the improved state of our commercial code. In the first place, the official value of the exports of British manufactured goods during 1824, showed an increase of no less than four millions and a half sterling over those of 1823, bringing the total value in 1824, to 50,758,800*l.*, by far the largest export ever made by this country. The transit trade had also, under the beneficial influence of the improved warehousing system, experienced a marked increase; the act only took effect in July 1823, and in 1824, as compared with a like period of twelve months preceding, there was an increase in value of more than 1,200,000*l.* After mentioning the improvements which had occurred in several branches of production, he observed that the prosperous state and improving condition of our agriculture form a topic of pleasing reflection. He was anxious, however, to state his opinion, that such prosperity was not in any manner attributable to the existing corn laws, which ought to undergo alteration. He was an advocate for their repeal, and the substitution of a protecting duty equal to a fair equivalent for the poor rates, tithes, &c., paid by our farmers as compared with other countries.

Mr. Brougham regretted to state, that he was under the necessity, not only of expressing his dissent from, but also of entering his solemn protest against, some and those not the least important, parts of the speech which had just been read to them. He felt, however, great satisfaction in being able, before he stated them, to concur in the satisfaction which had been expressed on the removal of restrictions from commerce, and on the recognition of South American independence. In giving that assent, he could not claim for himself any extraordinary stretch of candour. He was rather withheld, as were many of his hearers, from giving their due praise to the measures alluded to, since they were measures which gentlemen on his side of the house had many years ago urged in vain, upon those who at that time were intrusted with the administration of the country. The principles, he hoped, were at an end which had so long hampered the industry of the people of England. Those doctrines of a narrow, shop-keeping, bucketering policy, which for two generations back had been the topic of unqualified scorn and reprobation to all enlightened writers, but which had been regularly defended by each successive minister, during that period, as the foundations of national greatness, could never more be advanced to obstruct the prosperity of the country. He had heard them treated as idle chimeras by one set of ministers, and as jacobinical innovations by another, just as it was the fashion of the day to regard them as objects of contempt or of abhorrence; and yet he, who had seen them first contemned and then abhorred, had now the happiness to say, that they had reached the consummation of their glory, that they were topics of congratulation in a King's Speech, and in both Houses of Parliament. Eight years ago he had himself submitted the very modifications in the navigation laws which had lately been adopted. He claimed no merit—the invention was not his own, but that of greater and much wiser men. He had ventured, however, to preach them more than once—ineffectually, indeed, at the time, but, as now it appeared, with undeniable success at last. Then, however, he was not only blamed for so presumptuous an attempt, but admonished never again to preach such damnable heresies to the house. At the same time he had also proposed the changes which had recently been adopted in the silk trade. They were assailed, on his first propounding them, with great and extraordinary severity. He was told that though they might appear very plausible in theory, every person in the trade considered them inapplicable to practice; he was even met by the taunt, that what he advanced might be very true, but that it looked very much like an ingenious sophism. "I trust," said one gentleman, whom he now saw before him, "that I shall never see any ministry attempting to legislate upon such a subject." "God protect me," said another, "if any man attempt to withdraw this corner-stone of our commercial policy. Let no man meddle with it by day or by night;" and he might have added, in the interval between midnight and morning, which of all times for meddling was certainly the most objectionable (a laugh). "Thank God," said a third, in a fit of pious enthusiasm, "we shall never live to see the day, when the principles avowed by the gentlemen opposite shall be sanctioned by His Majesty's Ministers." Ministers, however, had carried into effect all the detestable nostrums of that side of the house; they had taken an entire leaf out of the book of their opponents; they had even enacted measures to legalize the heresies of Adam Smith and the French economists, and to stamp with that odious name the opinions of their adversaries: nay more, the country was now called to thank God for having ministers who had courage to support such measures, though it was formerly called upon to thank God for having ministers who had courage to oppose them. He thanked God that measures had been taken by them to recognize the principles for which he and those who thought with him had long contended with so little immediate success. What they had done, however, was chiefly to be prized as a pledge that a better policy than the past would be pursued in future. For example, they had adopted the recommendations which he had proposed in 1817, regarding the navigation and the silk laws. It was a well-known observation of Dr. Swift, that in political arithmetic two and two did not always make four. He had observed, long ago, that with respect to the last laid wine duties, two and two did not make four. In the case of coffee, by lowering the duty, they had increased the consumption; so that where they meant to add two-and-two, as in the case of wine, they had decreased, and not doubled the amount of duty; whereas, when they reduced the duties upon coffee one-half, they had doubled, or nearly doubled, the consumption, and maintained the full amount of the revenue. Let the wine duty, then, at once be reduced; and, above all, let there be not only a reduction, but an equalization of different wine duties for all foreign countries—he meant, in fact, a general revision of the Methuen treaty. One good effect which would arise from such a revision, would be the establishment of a better understanding with the French Government, the lowering of the duties upon other French articles, and the increase of the foreign consumption of British manufactures. He next alluded to the approach lately made by Government to that just and liberal policy, so often recommended from that side of the house, in the recognition of some of the great Governments of South America. How much of this policy, great as it undoubtedly was, belonged to the country which had so strongly and repeatedly called for it—how much to the executive Government—how far, or how long the Ministers had been driving or driven into it—how little was the speed of their march—how small was their reluctance, or what was the measure or degree of their readiness to do this justice to the country and the new states, it were now perhaps unnecessary, if not invidious to inquire. How much of it was due to the great speech delivered by his learned friend (Sir J. M'Intosh) upon the Foreign-enlistment bill, as well as to his last equally great address, during the last session, upon the state of South America, it was not easy to say: but sure he was that there was no man either within or without that house, who could fail to ascribe a portion, a large portion, of this great and liberal, and sound triumph of right policy, over wrong policy, to his learned and excellent friend (hear, hear). The good was done, and by whatever process it had been effected, the recognition had luckily taken place at last.

When touching upon this subject it could not fail to recur to him, that many a long year before Mexico, Colombia, Buenos Ayres, or Peru, had ever dreamed of independence, another people had embarked in a successful contest for freedom—he meant the people of St. Domingo, who had long and long since succeeded in establishing their entire independence, upon a more peaceable, and now a more assured footing, than even the best established of the new South-American States. At the onset of the St. Domingo revolution, England was hostile to the natives; she became so from the situation of her people as slave-masters. But the question of slavery, so far as St. Domingo was concerned, had been long since set at rest; the natives had entirely emancipated themselves, and the island had become a thriving empire—one which had a right to be included in the British system. It was clearly the interest of our own colonies that it should be so; we owed it as well to our colonial whites as to their unhappy slaves; and we ought to lose no time in adopting that just and salutary policy. He would now ask, was this display of liberal policy to stop here? Was this essential administration of justice to be confined to our foreign colonies? Were we never to do justice nearer home—were we never to listen to the voice of Ireland? Was it there alone that policy was to be overlooked; and that, too, where a great population was oppressed by a continuance of matchless impolicy, and worse injustice, because Ministers withdrew from the adjustment of a question, which ere long must be definitively settled. There was an evident danger in trifling with a vital subject, which could not be set aside. There was in the Government, no doubt, too great a difference of opinion upon the Irish question, as there had been upon others; but surely not more than there had been upon the mercantile topics. There had been something like the same difference on the silk bill; they could not fail to recollect, that it was brought into this house and carried by one minister, and thrown out in the Lords by another. An equal difficulty had been found in reconciling the conflicting opinions of the Cabinet at an early period of the South American question. It was by some called jacobinical to urge the claims of the new states of South America, until at length a minister, backed by the voice of the people, and supported by their representatives, had the manliness to press forward those liberal measures of foreign policy which some of his colleagues denounced. It might be said, that if such a minister should persevere in this novel course, he might be compelled to resign. Was this to be the reason for delay? Was this conduct to be tolerated in a British minister? And if it were, were they, then, to consent to say "The danger is, we admit, great, but touch it not?" Let them not in these times, be told that there were particular scruples, in a high quarter, which could not bear to be touched. This language had, he knew, been used on a former occasion; but it was unjustifiable—it was unconstitutional—it was intolerable—it would have been hardly used to a House of Commons by a minister of Charles II.; and sure he was that, if used in the better times which preceded that reign, it would have brought a minister to the block. It was Mr. Fox's constitutional maxim that the name of the King should never be mentioned in debate, to influence or overawe. The great constitutional practice was, that when an act of grace was to be performed, the King was to have the gracious merit of what was done; and that it was only when measures of an odious and unpopular character were necessary, that ministers were to step forward and assume the whole opprobrium which attached to them. This was the constitutional maxim which had always prevailed, except in the worst times, and which never, until of late, had been departed from. The practice was otherwise, now. If there were any thing odious to be done—any political opponent to be run down—"Oh then," ministers exclaimed, "it is not our fault, we wish to do what is right; we are above these petty jealousies; we do not wish, nor mean, professionally, to injure a political opponent; but don't you see we are delicately placed?" Then followed the allusion to the Sovereign, as the imperative director of the act, so that these official personages cast upon the Crown the odium of any unpopular act, whilst they carefully preserved to themselves the popularity of more liberal measures. So it was once regarding Ireland; the name of his late Majesty had been used for the purpose of rendering it impossible at a former period to proceed with the Catholic question. But this plea, bad as it was, was now removed, as must be known by any person who had marked his present Majesty's most gracious conduct in his cordial and gratifying visit to Ireland, which had demonstrated his just and enlightened feelings towards the Irish people. He would add, too, that in the territory in which George IV. reigned as King of Hanover, and where he acted individually, and not as in Great Britain, under the guidance of what were called responsible advisers—they had not long since an opportunity of knowing the King's real sentiments, in the decree which he graciously promulgated at the opening of the States, and of which he had procured a copy. He earnestly hoped that this decree from the King of Hanover personally, would be taken as a hint, for ministers to adopt a more liberal policy towards Ireland. His Hanoverian Majesty was most graciously pleased to say, "that the general professors of the Christian faith are to enjoy a perfect equality of civil and political rights in the kingdom of Hanover, and in conformity to the 14th article of the constitution, the pre-eminence of a predominant church is abandoned." This declaration became a Sovereign, who felt that a truly tolerant man never used the word. Such a man must feel, that toleration was an indispensable duty, and not a boon. It was the inalienable right of man to worship his Maker according to the dictates of his own conscience, and no man had a right to interpose and prevent the exercise of it (hear, hear). The King's decree went on further to promulgate, "that all Christian communities had a right to the unobstructed and peaceable exercise of their religious worship." Ought not that house boldly to come forward, and, consistently with the royal act, do for Ireland what had been done for Hanover (hear, hear)? He was now putting aside the business of the Catholic Association, although the acts attributed to that body were the genuine fruit of the policy pursued towards Ireland. He had predicted such a consequence. If there had been extravagant and harsh language used by any of the Catholic body—if there had been extravagant propositions discussed—if an alarm had been the consequence, who was to blame? Not so much the Catholics, who had sent over a bill with such propositions—not so much the Association, who had framed it; but those whose impolicy had originated the association, had made it what it was, by continued oppression and insult. The Catholics first came to Parliament with a respectful request, and were met by refusal, and contumely: the natural result was, an insolent and unreasonable demand. Why not then revoke this policy? Why not redress grievances in Ireland and apply conciliation instead of coercion? They could not answer for the result until they had made the trial. But what was the ground of alarm when the experiment was suggested? He knew that high, very high, in that cabinet was to be found the greatest learning, with the most experienced talents combined—were they afraid of losing the benefit of these great acquirements by pressing an obnoxious measure upon a particular individual? What, did they think the great seal would be in danger if they pressed this question? Did they think the venerable and learned person who held it would quit his possession on that account? Great God! the very notion of such abandonment of office was the most chimerical of all the chimeras that ever disordered the brain of a poet (loud laughter). Surprised indeed should he be, to find any quittance of office in that quarter, before all sub-lunary things were at an end. That fear of public loss never crossed his apprehensive mind even in a dream. They greatly undervalued the steadiness of mind and purpose of their venerable colleague; there was nothing to equal the patient assiduity with which he bore the toils of his high station, the fortitude with which he endured to be thwarted: upon all questions of foreign and domestic trade he had at length consented to yield—ay, and so would he upon this Catholic question if it were equally pressed upon his reluctant attention. His composure under such circumstances was only equalled by the fortitude with which he bore the prolonged solicitations of the suitors in his own court. To suppose that he would quit office on this account, was really to harbour the vainest fear that ever crossed the most fantastical imagination; his colleagues would see this, were they only to make the attempt upon the prepossessions of his great mind; they would soon find the predominating prevalence of that patriotic feeling, that there was no principle so strong as the love of saving one's country, and that in no offices was it so forcibly felt as in those of the highest rank, in those possessing the most extensive patronage and connexions; and that so much the more powerful and profitable were the office, so much higher would be the ardour, and zeal, and self-devotion which would not allow the venerable, the wise and good man, at all hazard of personal opinions, to tear himself from the service of his country. To damp such zeal for the public service would be, he repeated, to possess a power superior to that of Prince Hohenlohe. To remove this great personage would be a real miracle; the seals were his estate—his freehold; he had secured the term, and his last breath would be poured forth in the public service. The only question in law upon the matter was—who was to appoint his successor? He was not, for his unabated desire to do good to mankind, to be restricted to a mere life interest; the office must in him be devisable, and for the uses of his will. Indeed, there were indications which in a measure pointed to the successor, although that successor would find himself disappointed, if he hoped to get office during the natural life of the present holder (renewed laughter). To be sure, one member of the cabinet might say, 'I will resign if this measure is not carried,' and another might reply 'And so will I, if it is.' Let the rt. hon. gent. opposite (Mr. Canning) only make this experiment with his noble colleague upon the Catholic question, as he had done upon the commercial bills, and the nation would not, he might depend upon it, be deprived for one hour of the inestimable benefit of his colleague's public services (hear, hear). Unhappily, the rt. hon. gent. made no such effort, and therefore the Catholics were put off; from year to year—from one crisis to another—in time of war, or in time of peace, the Catholics were to be turned aside, and for them alone the hour of redress was never to approach (hear, hear). Penal enactments were the answer to their petitions, and now again they were called upon to put down, not the association, but "associations." This was one of the sliest insertions that ever crept into a form of speech. The venerable and learned personage in the cabinet had added this letter; he knew his hand-writing (laughter), and the object was plain and palpable; "Make it plural, and then we shall have the votes of those who are anxious to put down the Orange Associations, and who will admire by anticipation the mode in which we poise the equal balance in our hands, and determine to put down faction in Ireland." He, however, conjured hon. members to exercise their common sense. They would soon find that the justice was only nominal—that it partook of those subtle equities, from the precincts of which it sprung—that the strong and irresistible hand of the law would be called forth to put down the Catholics, whilst the Orange Association would be only visited with a gentle tap (hear). To the introduction of this principle, therefore, he must at once oppose all the resistance in his power; he could not assent to it under any form, or with any qualification. If the Catholic Association had transgressed the principles of the constitution, and embarked in measures irreconcilable with the supremacy of the law, the more it was to be regretted. He had never in his life approved of all the measures of any association, still less had he ever approved of all the measures of a society united by a mixed bond of religious and political principles, where men's feelings now and then became roused, and sometimes carried them in their warmth over the strict line of propriety. But he thought their moderation had been exemplary, and their language—which had been sneered at by the noble lord (Gower), but which it would have been more prudent in him to have endeavoured to imitate than to have sneered at—was moderate. "Oh, said the noble lord, 'I am not disposed to treat them with contempt!'" That he—that he—most noble and most honourable as he was—should have it go forth to six millions of suffering fellow-subjects, and that the very first time, perhaps, they had ever heard of his name—that he did not mean to treat them with contempt, was certainly singular. To speak of such people with contempt, was quite out of the question—not even that most contemptuous of all contempters, Signor Pococurante, would have said so (a laugh). The great bulk of the Catholic community had given to that body their hearty and unqualified support. They might not, perhaps, all think alike upon the whole of the measures of the Association; nevertheless, the great bulk of the body sanctioned the entire of their proceedings. There were some who disliked the particular speeches of individuals: among these was the Attorney-General for Ireland; and yet, when he sent up an obnoxious speech to the scrutiny of a grand jury, he found that they were not prepared to assist in prosecuting the party. He regretted that his learned friend had taken such a course, after the late Mr. Gratton, the Attorney-General for Ireland, had done more than any other man of his time, for the claims of the Catholics. If any man, then, had planted, and fostered, and fathered this very association, his learned friend was that man. There were many who did not approve of the Catholic rent, or the manner of its collection, but who were still cordial friends of the association, and who would adhere to it, as the representative of their sentiments, and would feel an attack made upon it, as a declaration of war against the Catholic people of Ireland. Besides, how they were to put down this association, without equally extinguishing hundreds of others, was beyond what his imagination could comprehend. What was to become of the Bible Society, which raised, not 8,000*l.* or 9,000*l.*, like the Catholic Association, but 80,000*l.* or 90,000*l.*,—which had struck its roots deeply into the soil, and spread its branches far and wide—which comprehended great sects and illustrious names amongst its directors and supporters—which had dignitaries of the church at its head, and a peer of Parliament for its president—which could boast amongst its members Lord Bexley, and Lord Liverpool—a peer with whom, in the new commercial policy, he had often the honour to act (a laugh). There was also the Bridge-street Association, of which the Duke of Wellington was a President. This, it was true, was only a society for prosecuting libellers; they did not attempt to stand up for a redress of old grievances; their office was rather to check complaints than to originate them—to exercise the power of ex-officio prosecutions, without the responsibility of the Attorney-General, for whom that power was intended. What was to become, he would ask, of this society? He would fain hope that this intention would be abandoned. He conjured the ministers to pause before they advanced a step farther in such a system of legislation. He protested against the principle of such a measure; he could not even allow the papers to be laid upon the table which were to form its basis, without proclaiming its injustice. From that very moment he would take his stand, and oppose it inch by inch, and step by step, as a measure pregnant with enormous mischief, bottomed upon injustice, and filled with all the ingredients of coercion and impolicy, which if persevered in would sooner or later lead to the severance of the two kingdoms (loud cheers). The peace of Ireland was secured by the Catholic Association (hear, hear); Ireland had never been more tranquil than now, through the reliance of the people upon that body. This was the fact; let the house describe it as it might please—cloak it over with any form of words—this was the doing of the Catholic Association (hear, hear). The people of Ireland once confided in Parliament; but the conduct of their friends in always supporting emancipation, except "under particular circumstances," and of the Parliament in as constantly rejecting it, had alienated the Catholic people. They now confided in the Association. And why should that house complain? Was it not their own handy work? Swift, among his shrewd maxims, had one that—there was nothing so unreasonable as for people to make themselves ridiculous, and then be angry at others for laughing at them. So it was with Government; they first made rebels by their injustice and impolicy; put them down they must, in order to keep the Government going; but after that, came vituperation and reproaches, which kept up the former soreness. 'Twas true, there was no talk of rebellion, but if any thing could invite it to our shores, it would be the delay of justice to the Catholic people. He warned them against waiting under the plea of a more convenient season; it would be better to relent even in the twelfth hour. It was madness—it was the grossest imprudence to keep the former course. That minister was not worthy of the credit which would attach to the very meanest and least significant of those measures which had been introduced for the comparatively light purpose of benefitting commerce, who could hope, by the adoption of violent means in putting down the Catholic Association, to satisfy the demand which was made upon him for the adoption of a liberal policy. The associations might be put down in eight-and-forty hours. It was their own fault that they were there. Let it once be seen that the Government and the Parliament were sincere—let the conviction once take effect that justice would be secured by the enforcement of equal laws, and there would be an end to associations. That they might be wise enough to yield in time to the reasonable petition of six millions of their oppressed subjects, was rather his earnest prayer and wish than his belief. But his conscience prompted him to call upon them to adopt this as the fittest time for conciliation and redress, while, as to the policy hitherto pursued, and for aught he knew yet to be continued, he was determined to relieve his own mind from the guilty responsibility of acquiescence (loud cheers).

Mr. W. Lamb said there were many associations in this country, expressly engaged in raising money by legal means. It was highly desirable that such bodies should be enabled to meet to manage their own proper interests. But what would be said if they went to add to their private affairs the consideration of those of the whole country? He could even admit that the subscriptions to the Catholic Association might be legal; but if he found that the Roman Catholic priesthood were engaged in collecting them, and were to be consulted as to their employment, he should deem that a circumstance symptomatic of the deepest alarm. Nor was that alarm at all lessened by the recollection that that priesthood claim an actual delegation of the powers of omnipotence, professing that whatever they bound or loosened on earth, whether absolution and remission of sins, pardons plenary or in part, the same was bound or loosened in heaven. He maintained that the operations of a clergy, pretending to such power, should be watched with rigid scrutiny. He was, notwithstanding, a friend to Catholic Emancipation, and should support such a measure, if proposed.

Mr. Conning:—With respect to the Catholic Association, as relating to Catholic Emancipation, he must, as a supporter of that question, express his entire accordance with his hon. friend who spoke last—that so far from the Association being identified with the interests of the Catholics, its institution and conduct more resembled the scheme of an enemy who had devised it for thwarting the progress of the question of emancipation in this country. The worst enemy of the Catholic religion could not have hit upon means more certain—he could not have imagined a plan so successfully mischievous as the institution of the Catholic Association. To one question of the learned gent. he would advert as particularly deserving of an answer. He had asked, if no steps were taken by the Government, with a view to check this Association, might not the mischief die away? It was at one time his own opinion that it would. He appealed for proof of it to his conduct in the last session of Parliament. Had the learned gent. forgotten how ministers were then goaded to stifle the restless spirit which was then said to prevail? Had he forgotten the answer then given, that they thought it better to wait until the mischief should die away of itself; and at all events they declined calling upon the house for any extraordinary expedient until the effect of patience were fairly tried? The learned gent.'s mode of handling this subject was most singular. To prove that the existence of the Catholic Association was at least harmless, he ought to have shewn that they were a few zealous individuals, who did not profess to represent the people of Ireland—who had no design of assuming the character of a Government. But the learned gent. exaggerated even their own most gross and exaggerated account. He told the house that the Catholic Association was the Government of the country. "You are indebted," said he, "to the Catholic Association for the peace and tranquillity of Ireland." He entirely overlooked the administration of the last three years. He left out of view the eminent services of the Marquis Wellesley, in retrieving, by the equal justice of his government, the authority due to the laws. He forgot that the sunshine of Government was shared equally by Catholic and Protestant, and that the favours of the Crown were nothing. It was not to this that the tranquillity of Ireland was attributable; her repose, says the learned gent. is the work of the Catholic Association! Most earnestly was it to be wished that the current of that wise and benevolent administration had been suffered to pursue its course unimpeded, and to have flowed through the land unmixed with these waters of bitterness:

"Doris amara suam non intermiscet undam."

Whatever disappointment awaited the great measure of emancipation must be ascribed to that body. But it seemed that the Catholic Association was the cause of that peace which the Government had been unable to achieve. By what charm had they brought about this object? whence did they obtain their magical elements of concord? From the pit of Acheron! Their combination was cemented by an adjuration of horror—"Be peaceable, they said, by the hatred which you bear the Orangemen!" This was the charm by which they extracted peace out of hatred. Good God! was it for reasoning men to put such a bond of union late writing, and when called upon to explain themselves, deliberately to affirm the deed? Could this be Catholicism? He trusted not; for if it were, he had been in a fatal error in advocating the Catholic cause (cheers.) Did the learned gent., did the Catholic Association know so little of the English people, as to suppose that intimidation could avail them? Every sentence of that nature must operate as an injunction on their advocates to hold their peace, till the impression of that violence could be effaced from the minds of the English people. Let no one consider him, therefore, as opposing the Catholic claims. He wished to separate the Catholic Association and the Catholic question,—the learned gent. wished to confound them. He did them an essential benefit, in ridding them of that incubus, in removing what was unsightly and unbecoming, and advanced their cause in the estimation of every man who hated to be bullied, or who possessed a sense of independence. He was sorry to detain the house with personal explanations, but the learned gent. had asked him—almost in so many words, “Why do not you, who have carried a particular question against the views of an opposing minister, insist on carrying the Catholic question?” He objected to both premise and conclusion. Suppose the premise true, did the learned gent. see no difference between the South American and the Catholic question? “What had a minister to fear,” asked the learned gent. “with this house, these benches, all England at his back?” He would answer with another question; “What would a minister do with only these benches, and with no England at his back” (cheers, and laughter)? He should reserve to himself the right of judging how, when, and at what period, and in what manner, to give up either his office or his life in support of that or any other cause; he would not consent to have the opportunity chosen for him, especially by one who might have some collateral interest in giving his advice (laughter). In the notion that a certain member of the Cabinet, who was opposed to him on the Catholic question, was also opposed to him on that of South America; the learned gent. was entirely mistaken. He assured him that the line which divided the Cabinet was not straight, but serpentine. The project of breaking it up, on account of one question, might not be difficult; that of forming a new one from the different benches of that house, would be found not quite so easy. No doubt a competent ministry might be selected from the benches opposite; but if the learned gent. could have the satisfaction of ousting him, he would not, in all probability, have the satisfaction of succeeding him (cheers, and laughter). All he desired of the house was, to consider rightly the terms which were objected to in the address. The King stated in the Speech, that associations existed in Ireland, for whose conduct it was recommended to consider of an adequate remedy. The house replied, by promising that it would do so. What less could the house do? Unless, taking the learned gent.’s description of the Catholic Association, as a body possessing the whole authority in Ireland, enjoying undivided allegiance, exercising all the powers of Government, issuing the only commands which were effectually obeyed, and loving revenge—unless they were prepared to say that a power thus formidable ought to exist—to sit beside the Government, or to tower above it—they could not refuse their assurance to the Crown, that they would take an early opportunity of considering the means of putting down so enormous an evil. The learned gent. seemed to treat lightly all those measures which a liberal policy had adopted for the advantage of trade, and the recognition of the new states. The learned gent. was not an unfrequent speaker in that house, and when he favoured them, he was not remarkable for conciseness—mixing up with the matter of debate, dissertations de omni scilicet. As, in the course of his Parliamentary life, the learned gent. had proposed and supported every species and degree of innovation which could be practised in a settled government, it was not very easy for ministers to do any thing in the affair of South America, or any other, without seeming to borrow something from the learned gent. Their views might be shut up—by circumstances which they must consult, though he need not—as among ice in a northern winter. In time the thawing came; but break away in what direction they would, to the left or right, it was all alike. “Oho!” said the learned gent. “I was there before you—you could not have thought of that now, if I had not given you a hint.” In the reign of Queen Anne there was a sage and grave critic of the name of Dennis, who got it into his head that he wrote all the good plays that were acted at that time. At last a tragedy came forth with a most imposing storm of hail and thunder. At the first peal, “That’s my thunder,” said Dennis (loud laughter). So, with the learned gent., there was no noise or stir for the good of mankind in any part of the globe, but he instantly claimed it for his thunder. One thing he had, however, kindly thrown overboard, which was to be divided between Government and his learned friend (Sir J. M’Intosh). He wished to hear from that learned member to what degree he claimed South America for his thunder (laughter)? The learned gent. was very cautious in his praise. Much had been done to which he could not object; but then, for fear that they should feel too proud, he suggested that things might have been made better, especially as to time. Now if he piqued himself upon any thing in the South American negotiations, it was upon the subject of time. As to the propriety of admitting states which had successfully shaken off their dependence on the mother country to the rights of nations, there could be no dispute. There were two ways, however, of proceeding, either recklessly and with a hurried course, by which the object might be soon reached, and almost as soon lost—or by a course so strictly guarded, that no principle was violated and no offence given to other Powers. The three States with which Government had to deal, were Buenos Ayres, Colombia, and Mexico. As to Buenos Ayres, it was true many years had elapsed since there had been a Spanish soldier on the soil. But his learned friend knew well that Buenos Ayres comprised 13 or 14 small and separate states, which were not till lately collected into a federal union. Would it not have been absurd to have treated with a power incapable of answering for the conduct of the communities of which it was composed? So soon as it was known that a consolidation had taken place, the treaty with Buenos Ayres was signed. Next as to Colombia. As late as 1823, Puerto Cabello was held for the King of Spain. It was only since that time that Colombia could have been admitted amongst the independent States. Some time after that, however—he spoke it not as imputing blame—Columbia chose to risk her whole force and a great part of her treasure in a distant war with Spain, in Peru. Had that enterprise proved disastrous, it would have ended in re-establishing the royal authority. The danger was now at an end. The case of Mexico was still more striking. Not nine months ago, an adventurer who had wielded the sceptre of Mexico left these shores to return thither and resume his abdicated throne. In neither of these cases, could the time of the negotiation have been anticipated even by a few weeks. Now with respect to the mode in which this great object was effected, he was bound to say, whatever fault had been found with it, that it was the best and wisest that could have been adopted. The learned gent. had said, that there was something mean and paltry in negotiating a treaty, as the prelude to recognition. Now what was the conduct of France with respect to the United States of America? The fact was, that the ambassadors of the United States were not admitted to the Court of France until the signature of a treaty. Such was the mode of recognition in that case; and the treaty was quoted to this country as a confession of that act. France not only acknowledged the independence of the United States before it was recognized by the mother country, but she entered into a treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, with those States; and thus she became the enemy of England, with whom she had previously maintained relations of amity. Did those who opposed the course adopted by His Majesty's Ministers intend to argue, that this measure was imperfect because it was not accompanied by a war? The task which he had had to perform was, to arrive at this great object, without giving just cause of war to Spain or any other power (hear, hear). There might be something mean and huckstering in this mode of proceeding, but if the learned gent. thought that war was not to be had, with some little dexterity (a laugh), he was exceedingly mistaken. War lay here and there; it was on the right, and on the left of our path—our course lay in the middle: we took that course, and arrived at the object of our solicitude honourably and peaceably. Was this mode of proceeding unsatisfactory, because there did not exist in the archives of his office, a single document which Spain had not seen, and of which the Powers in alliance with this country had not been supplied with copies? Or because Spain was told, that if she would take the precedence, in recognizing the independence of the colonies, this country would be content to follow her steps, and to allow to her a superiority in the markets of those colonies? Now he would say to the learned gent., that the credit of the measure might be his, or it might be that of his learned friend (Sir J. M'Intosh); but he would claim for himself the merit of selecting the time, and of devising the mode in which the object was effected. He trusted, that by this plain conduct—this temperate—tardy policy, if they pleased so to call it—the country had avoided all the dangers which otherwise would have accompanied the recognition. He did not pretend to conceal, that by this step, we had hurt many feelings—run counter to many interests—shocked many prejudices—excited many regrets, much anger and indignation; but still he hoped that these feelings would evaporate in words, and that we should have gained our object, and still remain at peace with all the world (cheers). There were one or two points in the speech on which it would be proper that he should say a few words. He alluded more particularly to the treaty with the United States of America, relative to the slave trade. At the beginning of the last session of Parliament, a proposal was received from the United States, to carry into effect a measure for putting an end to the slave-trade, by giving to each power the right of mutual search. The treaty was drawn up by the Ministers of the United States; and in the course of the negotiation, some alterations were made here. By the constitution of the United States, the right of ratification was placed, not in the Executive Power, but in the Executive Power and the senate. This country, therefore, had no right to complain, when a treaty, regularly negotiated and signed by his Majesty, was refused by the American authorities, unless alterations were made in it by the United States. But the singularity of the case was this—that the alteration proposed by the United States had no reference to the alteration introduced by the British Cabinet, but was an alteration in their original draught. By the original treaty, the Americans were to be permitted to search our ships in the West Indies, and we in return were to search their ships off the coast of America. They withdrew the clause which empowered us to search their ships. The mutual right of search was thus destroyed, and it was impossible for this Government, either as a question of policy, or as a matter of justice to the West India proprietors, to allow such an alteration; for it would have been a tacit admission that our slave-laws were evaded by the colonies, but that the American slave-laws were not so evaded. Under these circumstances, we proposed to cancel that treaty, and to send a minister for the purpose of forming a new one, which should be drawn up verbatim as the treaty originally stood. This was the situation in which the matter was now placed, and he did not think that a refusal to accede to so reasonable a proposition could stand the test of public discussion in America. He thought the Americans themselves must feel that they had no choice left but that of adopting the expedient which the British Government had pointed out. The whole discussion had been carried on in a spirit of the most perfect amity; and he believed the personal feelings of the Executive Government of the United States were in favour of the arrangement.

The house adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEB. 4.—On the question that the report on the Address be brought up.

Mr. Hobhouse said, that as His Majesty had congratulated Parliament on the prosperity of the country, and the amity which prevailed in our relations with foreign Powers, it was remarkable that although Ireland was particularly represented as partaking of the tranquillity, a change of the criminal code, not merely of Ireland, but also of England, was recommended; and notwithstanding the peaceable aspect of foreign affairs, an increase of our standing army was advised—as if Ireland were expected to break out into rebellion, and the Holy Allies were disposed to march their armies into France, and thence proceed to annoy our shores. It was impossible to allow such topics to be embodied in the address, without protesting against them in the most solemn manner. The rt. hon. gent. had said, that none but the enemies of Ireland could assert that the Catholic Association represented the Catholics of that country. If he might rely upon the public papers, he was persuaded that that Association not only spoke the opinions and represented the feelings of the Catholics of Ireland, but of England also. How else could it be accounted for, that one of the most numerous and respectable meetings of Catholics held in England for a long period of years, had recently passed a unanimous vote of thanks to the gentleman who was at the head of the Association? If it did not represent the sentiments of the people of Ireland, why legislate against it?—why attempt to put it down by force?—why was His Majesty advised to recommend that subject to the House, if the Association had no power? He believed, and he thought, His Majesty's advisers were of the same opinion, that the Roman Catholics of Ireland and England, were never more united than now. It was the knowledge of this unanimity which produced alarm amongst ministers, and called forth the statement in the Speech. Having noticed this inconsistency in the speech of the rt. hon. gent. he should take this early opportunity of protesting against any design of putting down the Catholic Association. There was another topic in the Speech which he could not pass over, and which, to his astonishment, had not been touched upon last night—he meant the increase of our military force. The unprovoked aggression which the Burmese had made upon the territories of the merchants of Leadenhall-street—a body, which, from the language it used, could never have made an unprovoked aggression upon any state (a laugh), was assigned as one of the reasons for this unexpected augmentation of our military establishments. The whole excuse for this extraordinary measure was “the state of India, and circumstances connected with other parts of His Majesty's foreign possessions.” They were told that Ireland was not included in the “foreign possessions.” He was glad that it was not proposed to increase our military establishment in Ireland; but unless ministers intended to back their new penal law against the Catholics with a military force, it would be in vain for them to send mere Acts of Parliament. To what part, then, of our foreign possessions, was this allusion to apply? Did it refer to the struggle in the Mediterranean, between the Ottoman Porte and Greece? It would be gratifying to find that the rt. hon. gent. was strong enough in the Cabinet to take some decisive measures in favour of that unfortunate but glorious nation. At the commencement of last session he had stated his opinion to be hostile to our interference with Turkey, in behalf of the Greeks: but events had occurred since that time, which made it proper for the British Government to interfere, and to urge upon the Ottoman Porte the impossibility of its recovering possession of that part of the continent and islands of Greece which had achieved their freedom. If we wished Turkey to exist as a bulwark either against Austria or Russia, we should contrive some measures by which the Greeks should be declared independent. He could not, however, flatter himself with the idea that this view was taken by Government, or that they were inclined to interfere with the Turks on behalf of Greece. What, then, was he to consider as the cause of this augmentation of the army? Was it any danger which hung over the Canadas? He had heard that the politics of one of the candidates for the Presidency of the United States were so hostile to England, that if he were elected, Canada might be considered in imminent danger. He mentioned this rumour owing to the ignorance he was in as to the real cause. That was not, however, any fault of his, but of those who withheld information from the people as to the cause of increasing their army in the ninth year of peace. We had now a standing army of 73,000 regulars, a force unexampled in time of peace. He had, therefore, a right to information upon two points; first—how much was the army to be augmented—by 5,000, by 10,000, by 15,000, or, as he had heard it stated, by 20,000 men? next—for what purpose was it augmented? Was it on account of the continued occupation of Spain, to which he was astonished at finding no allusion made, either in His Majesty's Speech, or in the address which had been voted in reply to it—an occupation that had arisen out of an aggression, which the rt. hon. gent. had himself declared to be one of the most unjustifiable that could be found in the history of nations (hear, hear)? The people had a right to know whether this crying injustice was to be consummated and perpetuated for ever. We had suffered one of our allies to annihilate the independence of Italy; but there had been no call for arming then. We had suffered another to subjugate Spain; but there had been no call for arming then, or at least only from that side of the house whose calls were not often attended to. But now, because the Burman empire, of which few men knew any thing, had attacked the East India Company, and because “there were other circumstances connected with our foreign possessions,” which were not specifically mentioned, and of which nobody knew any thing, our army was to be suddenly augmented. After some further observations on this head, the hon. member concluded by joining in the congratulations on the improvement of trade and agriculture, and those changes in our commercial policy, the credit of which he would not contest with any party—as it was indifferent to him from what quarter the thunders came, provided they “spare those that are subject, and beat down the proud.”

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that it would be his duty at an early day to enter into the amplest details of the propositions he intended to submit to the house. At present he would merely observe, that though the augmentation of the army seemed to him absolutely necessary, he should be able to accompany it with a reduction of taxation, which he trusted would appear to be founded on sound principles, and to be generally acceptable to the country. The whole burden of the speech which the hon. member for Westminster had just made was—“What are the grounds on which ministers call upon the house to increase the army?” It was true, as the hon. gent. had argued, that there was nothing in the state of Ireland which required the presence of an additional soldier. The same was also the case in England. His Majesty's speech distinctly stated, that the augmentation of the army had reference, not to the internal, but to the external circumstances of the country. The hon. member had treated the Burmese war as a matter of indifference: and that was not surprising, considering that most people treated with indifference a distant danger. Any man who considered the peculiar nature of our empire in India, and how it had arisen into its present extent and magnitude, would see that whatever tended to disturb the tranquillity of any part of it might produce effects much more important than any which would enter into the imagination of a casual observer, or of one who only knew of the Barman empire by hearsay. When this subject should be brought before the house, he should be able to prove that this increase of the army was dictated by sound policy, and was not liable to the objections which the hon. member had urged against it; for it was not an increase in time of profound peace, but in time of active war. With regard to the words, "our other foreign possessions," he could not conceive how the hon. member could look at our foreign possessions without seeing how widely different their present state was from their state twenty years ago. The establishment which defended them twenty years ago was utterly inadequate at present. In England, in case of sudden danger, the ministers could call upon the people to support the Government with its resources: but in our foreign possessions, which were widely scattered over the face of the earth, those resources could not be immediately called into action, and it would be therefore unwise to leave them exposed to the dangers of sudden invasion. These were the general grounds, without entering into details, on which he thought that there were just causes for increasing the army. He expected, however, that the hon. gent. if he took his information from the sources which were open to the public, would be greatly disappointed, when he learned what that increase was really to be.

Col. Palmer, after a long attack on the administration, and, in particular, the Sec. for foreign affairs, said that the ministers, in the King's speech, had again openly boasted of their friendly relations with those Powers who had as openly declared their hostility to all constitutional governments, and proved their intentions by their acts in destroying that of Spain. What, then, could be the basis of such friendship, but their mutual understanding and agreement upon that vital question of public liberty, the existence of which was incompatible with the principles the Holy Alliance stood pledged to establish? And that this was the fact, he boldly asserted, and believed; whilst of all parties concerned, the ministers of England stood deepest involved in the guilt. But, whatever the motives of the parties, for which they must answer to their God, it was their conduct the people had to look to; and whether the Government of France and Spain, the Governments of the Holy Alliance, or, above all, the Government of England, he denounced the whole as conspirators against the liberties of mankind—he accused them of having wilfully neglected that glorious occasion which the return of peace, and the destruction of Buonaparte's power, had afforded of re-establishing the liberties of Europe upon a firm basis, and of complying with the Powers of Europe against the liberties of the people, solely to prevent reform, in the abuses of their own governments. What better illustration of the strength, courage, and generosity of the nation, contrasted with the weakness, cowardice, and baseness of her Government, than the act of the rt. hon. gent., who, as one of the people had advertised his subscription to the relief of the Spanish patriots, from whom, as Minister, he had withdrawn the trifling support the Government had allowed them; and whilst thus meanly truckling to foreign Powers, what greater proof of their tyranny at home, and the insolence of that faction which had usurped the powers of the constitution and larded it equally over the Crown and people, than that the same Sovereign, who had proclaimed the equality of civil and political rights to all his German subjects, was prevented by his ministers from doing the same justice to the Catholic population of his United Kingdom. And what was their excuse?—the danger to the Protestant religion. But was ever assertion so false, or hypocrisy so great, as that which pretended to believe it, but which well knew that the danger was not to the established religion, but to an enormous church establishment in Ireland, which required the expense of a large standing army to support it, in the teeth of all justice and true religion, and the sense and feeling of the people? As to Catholic emancipation, nothing short of it could give that strength to the Government which, under whatever form, was essential to support it; and if such had been the advancement of general knowledge and education, that this concession had been deemed necessary to the slaves of a despotic government to whom the freedom of the press was still unknown how much more necessary to that people, who in the establishment of their liberties, beheaded one king, dethroned another, and set up a third, to the exclusion of the legitimate heir to the Crown, whom the voice of the people declared to have forfeited his right? And unless the ministers could make up their minds to this measure, which if not conceded would eventually be forced upon them, they had better at once drop the curtain upon the farce they had so long been playing in that house, and either shut its doors, or at least march those out of it who dared impeach their conduct, as the Deputy Manuel was marched out of the French Chamber.

Sir John Newport complained of the manner in which the condition of Ireland had been treated in the Speech from the Throne. What was stated as a main fact respecting Ireland in that address, he absolutely and of his own knowledge denied. He denied that the Catholic Association had tended to disturb the peace of the country. On the contrary, he believed that that body had assisted, and most efficaciously, to tranquillize Ireland, and to afford the most powerful co-operation with the Irish Government, in producing that salutary effect (hear, hear). If the Catholic association were really dangerous, the country had to thank the Lord Chancellor, and the rt. hon. Sec. for the Home Department for its existence; for it was these gentlemen, who had in each house of Parliament declared, that the people of Ireland had, in point of fact, no interest, and felt no concern, in the discussions upon the Catholic question which had been pressed upon the Government—that the agitation of such subjects was kept alive only by a few. Now what was the fact? The association prepared their petition, and the people from one end of the country to the other, came forward to testify their deep interest in the proceedings of that body, and to contribute from their exhausted purses the necessary means for defraying the expenses of their measures. At first, it was said the people cared nothing about the matter: then followed the establishment of the Association, and the demonstration of the popular feeling; whereupon ministers turned round, and threatened to coerce them into silence. He called upon them to recollect the motion which had been made by his rt. hon. friend (Mr. Wynn), in 1813 to put down the illegal society of Orangemen. In the debate upon that motion, the rt. hon. gent. (Mr. Canning) and a noble lord, then in the government (Lord Londonderry) had both declared that they relied upon the common sense of their country for rejecting and putting down such associations; and yet, notwithstanding these declarations, it was only now that ministers had come prepared to say, that the existing laws were not sufficient to meet the evil, and that new and more coercive ones were necessary. It was quite clear, he thought, that against the Catholic Association this measure was particularly directed, and against them alone (hear). Was it not notorious that high officers in his Majesty's government in Ireland were members of Orange Associations? Did they not know that official persons acted as Deputy-Grand Masters in these illegal societies? If any such were found in the Catholic Association, how loud would not the complaints have been! He concurred in praising the liberality of the late measures of Government, but why not extend the same wise policy to Irish affairs? The fact was, that they never acted wisely or liberally towards Ireland, and their periods of relaxation were always dictated by necessity. Trace the question historically. In the year 1792, when the present Lord Privy Seal (Lord Westmorland) was Viceroy, and the late Earl of Buckinghamshire his Secretary, an humble petition from the Catholics was driven out of the Irish house of Parliament by acclamation—a petition merely asking for a very moderate share of privilege: and yet in the very year after, a measure embodying far more relief than was supplicated in the previous petition, was carried triumphantly through Parliament under the auspices of this same Secretary. He was old enough to recollect the whole course of this question, and to remember that the eye of Parliament could not be brought to look upon it, until the fleets of France and Spain rode triumphantly in the British Channel. Let no man, then, be duped by the notion that the Catholics had reason to confide in the liberality of the British Government. If, at the time to which he alluded, the Catholic body was important, when a crisis befel the empire, how much more important had it not since become? It was never so consolidated as it was now; and that consolidation had been effected by the misgovernment of this country, and the repeated refusal of the just claims of the people (hear, hear). He lamented exceedingly the course which his Majesty's ministers seemed now disposed to take. Again and again he would deprecate this policy, at once baneful and absurd—this wretched perseverance, upon every flimsy pretext, of refusing the just claims of the people, until the arrival of some impending danger, which compelled the Government to bestow ungraciously, and thanklessly, what it conferred under other circumstances, and other times, would have been received as a boon (hear, hear). He had now done his duty; he could conscientiously say, liberat animam meam. But a few years remained to him in the course of nature, but with his dying breath he would admonish ministers not to proceed thus towards Ireland; and his last words would be to warn them against the danger of prosecuting a system of restriction, which would bring ultimate ruin upon the country (loud cheering).

Mr. Peel said, that, on Thursday next, his rt. hon. friend near him (Mr. Goulburn) would submit a motion on the subject of the associations in Ireland, and it was the intention of his Majesty's Government to propose such a measure upon its own responsibility. That these associations in Ireland ought to be put down, he thought could not reasonably be denied—indeed, he thought that the warmest advocates for the liberty of the subject ought to call for their extinction. He spoke not of the opinions of those who thought that such a body trench on the supremacy of the Crown, or the privileges of the Executive Government; but of the opinion of every man who valued the proper privileges of the people, who respected the due administration of justice, and who wished to maintain the principles of rational liberty. No such man could think it reasonable that an association like this should be permitted to levy taxes on the people, or interfere with the administration of justice. For these brief reasons, he thought it would not be difficult to show, upon the popular principles of the constitution, that bodies arrogating such a power ought not to be permitted to exist. In his opinion, they trench upon the existing law—the Convention Act; the letter of the law was evaded, but its fair spirit was infringed. He could not easily bring himself to believe that the Catholics were prepared to identify themselves with the Association. He could not believe that a Christian sect and Christian pastors could adopt a bond of hatred so entirely at variance with the pious spirit which they professed. If, however, the Catholics participated in such feelings and opinions, then, indeed, how strong became the reason for excluding from political power persons capable of holding such tenets! It was not a little strange that whilst gentlemen called upon the Government to permit this association to remain, they were loud in their denunciation of another association in this country, against which the same cause of complaint did not exist. A learned gent. had last night alluded to some supposed difference of opinion among the members of the Cabinet upon particular subjects: he had talked of those who were always ready to sacrifice their opinions for the preservation of their places, and that there was one who would pocket any popular opinion of the day to preserve his official power. Of the Lord Chancellor, to whom the observations he alluded to were understood to apply, he could not speak in terms of adequate praise; but he believed he would go down to posterity as a man of exalted merits, and as the most consistent politician who had ever held the great seal. With respect to his own opinions, and for them he only meant now to answer, he could declare that his original view of the Catholic question had been strengthened by experience; and he claimed credit for sincerity when he declared that he was prepared to make any official sacrifice rather than abandon the principles which had suggested that opinion (hear, hear). The rt. hon. bart. who had spoken last, had said, that he

(Mr. Peel), and the Lord Chancellor, were the persons who ought to be held responsible for the establishment of the Catholic Association. He should only remark at present, that in calling upon Parliament to put down this association he was contributing to the tranquillity of Ireland: he had no doubt, that when the Catholics discovered their error, they would readily obey the laws, without its being necessary to enforce them by military coercion.

Mr. C. H. Hutchinson warmly defended the Association, which he contended had done much to promote the tranquillity of Ireland, however they might be talked of as a representative body or not. Upon the impolicy of the projects against Ireland, he entirely concurred in what had fallen from his rt. hon. friend (Sir J. Newport). For years he had deplored this fatal policy, and marked, step by step, the affliction of which it was the cause. It was the calamity of Ireland that the British Government had ever ruled her in a spirit of faction: discord, and not peace, had been their motto, and now they were again about to exasperate real grievances by coercion, instead of expunging from the statute-book those bitter penal enactments which disgraced the Protestant, while they oppressed and degraded the Catholic (hear). He denied the assertion of the rt. hon. gent. (Mr. Canning), that the proceedings of the Catholic Association had indisposed the public mind in England to listen to the Catholic question. That individuals disapproved of some of the acts of the Association, he readily admitted; but he denied that any public expression of hostility had emanated from any portion of the British public against the measure itself (hear). The hon. member then proceeded to deplore the peculiar evils which must result under the present circumstances from a perseverance in the proposed measures. He said that English capital was most fortunately flowing into Ireland; its value was most sensibly felt by all parties; but its continuance must depend on the security afforded for property by public tranquillity: and here was the Government proclaiming, unjustly and unwisely, that there was a spirit of insubordination in Ireland which must be suppressed (hear, hear, hear). He deplored the fatal consequences of this system, but he had the solitary consolation of having for years opposed it, from a desire to promote the prosperity of the British empire.

Sir T. Lethbridge said, that there was a strange inconsistency with regard to the Catholic Association. Some gentlemen admitted that it represented the Catholic body, while others denied that fact; and again, it was said, that not only did they represent the opinions of the people of Ireland, but those of the Catholics of England also. If the account of the friends of the association were to be taken for the correct one, it would appear that it formed a second body in the state, of equal power and influence with the Parliament. Then there were two Parliaments to represent the subjects of Great Britain. In his opinion one was enough, and certainly the constitution did not admit of a second.

Lord Nugent said, that the rt. hon. Sec. (Peel) had taunted his side of the house for imputing illegality to the Constitutional Association, which, in all its professed objects, was exactly analogous to the Catholic Association. Was the rt. hon. Sec. so blinded by the eagerness of debate as not to see that his weapon was double-edged? If the Catholic Association were now declared illegal, had not his hon. friends near him a right to ask why, when that Constitutional Association was in being, was there no attempt on the part of Government to put it down by law? A word or two upon the observations which had been made as to the union of the Catholics of England and of Ireland. He assured the house of the correctness of the supposition that they were cordially united in their views. He believed that he was fully authorized to say that the Catholics of Great Britain were disposed to concur in every respect with the feeling and spirit evinced by the Catholic Association of Ireland.

Mr. Trevelyan wished to satisfy the mind of the hon. member for Cork, as to the confidence of English capitalists in embarking their money in Irish speculations. He had had the honour of attending a meeting that very day, of the Irish Provincial Mining Company, and their proceedings went forward with an animation which was not damped by any thing which had occurred in either house of Parliament.

Mr. Denman congratulated Ireland on the confidence of the Mining Company. As a lawyer, however, he would advise the hon. member and the company not to be too confident; they might, for any assurance he could give them to the contrary, be engaged in an unconstitutional proceeding; they might be acting in direct contravention to an existing law; their affairs, when deemed the most secure by themselves, might be found all at once the most cruelly embarrassed. As to the Constitutional Association, whether constitutional or not, the argument with respect to the conduct of ministers was the same. They were going to put down the Catholic Association by enacting a new law—by violence, by the army, by the sword. Why was nothing of all this attempted against the Constitutional Association? Surely there was something remarkable in this difference of ministerial conduct. Was not that, as the Catholic Association was now said to be, impertum in imperio? Was there not an Attorney-General who was no Attorney-General—a private individual who had the impudence to take upon himself the right of exercising the powers which could only belong to the law officers of the Crown, the meaning of his endeavours plainly being, to put down freedom of discussion throughout the country? There was, indeed, a violation of the constitution; but it happened to be a violation which played the game of power, and therefore there was no alarm given; no one objected; formal defences were set up for it by the immediate dependents of administration. What was the danger here, compared with that which was threatened to the constitution by the Constitutional Association? Defend the Catholic Association! God forbid that he should ever attempt it. He would not be bound to defend the proceedings of any public body—not even the body which he was then addressing. He could more easily defend the conduct of the Catholic Association, however, than that of the Parliament. It was astonishing that they should yet hope to keep down a great country, dependent on them, by violence, which continually bred discontent, and thus put themselves in danger of interference from the Holy Alliance. What dangers to ourselves and to Ireland might ensue in the meantime—what strife—what bloodshed and confusion—he could not foresee. They were attempting measures towards Ireland in comparison with which the causes of the American war were trifles; they were placing Ireland in the situation held by America; they were bringing America to their own doors; they were doing their best to work eventual confusion. When the hon. bart. (Sir T. Lethbridge) undertook to represent the sentiments of the people of England, he was compelled to tell the hon. bart. that he knew something also of those sentiments, and he did not allow the faithfulness of that representation. That there were some opposed to the Catholic claims, perhaps, in the public-houses and low alleys of the town, among the eminently unfeeling and ignorant, was true. The hon. bart. must not flatter himself with the honour of representing the whole British people, if such were his sentiments. He hoped that the hon. bart.'s election did not depend upon hopes so futile (laughter). He believed that the opinion of every man in the country, whose opinion was worth having, was with the Catholics. An opinion so unfounded might be well enough for the hon. bart.; but he was grieved to hear the rt. hon. sec. (Canning) resort to so vulgar a play upon the passions of the public, as that which was implied in his remark about "bullying the people of England." An hon. member (Mr. W. Lamb) expected, that proofs would be produced of the dangers arising from the Association, and then he would yield his ready acquiescence to the measure. They had heard the rt. hon. sec. (Peel) declare, that no proofs would be produced; but that ministers, acting on their own responsibility, would proceed upon the notoriety of the fact. What a proposition! To proceed in the enactment of a penal law upon the reports of newspapers! He owned that he had not been sufficiently at leisure to trace the proceedings of the Association. He had read the address which they put forth, and he highly approved of it, excepting one expression so loudly harped upon by the two Secretaries of State. But surely one phrase in a printed paper, however indiscreet, though asserted and affirmed with that wicked deliberation which had been insisted upon, was no reason to justify new coercive laws. He should have thought that the Attorney-General of Ireland might have given them some wise cautions against the danger of confiding in newspaper rumours for the groundwork of their proceedings. And what, after all, was the danger? An association was in existence which was accused of raising money. What less could they do? Did not all other associations support themselves by joint contributions? There was a society for prosecuting poachers, very constitutional of course, for no complaint was made against them for raising revenue. But then the Catholic priesthood were not to touch it! Why? Were they not known as a body of men peculiarly respectable, admitted on all hands to be derived from the middle classes of the people? After a few further remarks in the same strain, the learned gent. sat down, cautioning the house against the delay of justice, from which he predicted the worst consequences.

Mr. R. Martin admitted that the Catholic Association represented the Catholic population. He knew it from his own experience. He cautioned the house against trusting in the assertion that the Catholic priesthood claimed the power of Omnipotence, which they exercised in the absolution and remission of sins. The fact was, that they pronounced the forgiveness of sins in the identical form of words used by the Archbishop of Canterbury.—"If you repent, I absolve you!" the form of words was the same in the rites of both churches. The primate, archbishop of Tuam, would severely reprehend any priest who should affect a delegation of Almighty power in the absolution of sins.

Sir H. Parnell bore testimony to the fact that the Catholics of England and Ireland cordially concurred in the proceedings of the Catholic Association; and as he denied that ministers could make out the allegations of the Speech with respect to the Catholic Association, he should oppose the measure throughout.

Mr. M. Fitzgerald said, his alarm arose from the conviction that the Association represented, in the most complete manner, the feelings of the Catholic people of Ireland. The sentiment which actuated them was for the first time, in his experience, one and undivided. They were formidable, because they were suffering admitted injustice; and were united among themselves, while it appeared the intention of Government to continue the refusal of their rights. He was compelled, therefore, to deprecate in the strongest terms, the proposed measure of putting down the Association, because it would have the effect of driving the Catholics to some other course. It would be unfair in him not to avow that he had already heard the intention of doing so expressed, if the threatened suppression of the Association should take place. Nothing could be more natural than that this should be the result of such a step; for, while Catholic disabilities existed, the persons suffering under them would not relax in their endeavours to throw off the burden. It had been said in the House, that the rent which was raised for the objects of the Association was levied in the shape of a revenue: he was not aware that it could fairly deserve that name. It was nothing more than a voluntary subscription entered into by the Catholic population of Ireland for the protection of the people in various parts of Ireland against the oppression of the magistrates, by procuring legal assistance. But if any objection could be raised to this sum, and the manner in which it had been collected, how could any other similar subscriptions be justified? That of the Methodist Conference, for example, which was infinitely larger in amount, and which was unquestionably applied to political purposes. Although the Catholic interest in that House was comparatively feeble, the Methodist interest was very powerful. He recollected, that, in the last session, he had seen more external influence brought to bear on a question in which the Methodists were interested than on any other of which he knew—he meant that relating to Smith the missionary. He would add his feeble voice against the proposition of ministers, and would say that he looked with serious apprehension at the consequences which must result if the notice already given should be acted upon.

Mr. Butterworth begged to contradict the assertion of the hon. member, respecting the fund raised by the Methodist Conference. The whole of that was voluntarily subscribed. The members of the society were influenced by no compulsion. There were many persons of the same sect who did not subscribe. The hon. member must have been very imperfectly informed on the subject on which he had spoken, as appeared by his allusion to the case of the missionary Smith, as that individual did not belong to the society of Methodists. That body never interfered in any political matters; nor was the money raised by them applied in any instance to a political purpose. In Ireland, he had reason to know, that a considerable number of Protestants had suffered in their circumstances, and their business had fallen off, because they had refused to subscribe. Gentlemen might say what they pleased about the nature of the Catholic rent; he knew that it had already created considerable alarm, and that individuals had been obliged to leave their dwellings in the country and to live in the towns, for their personal protection; and he thought that ministers would be extremely negligent of their duty, if they did not at once put an end to it.

Mr. Hume said, the Attorney-General for Ireland had been asked over and over to point out wherein the alleged illegality of the Catholic Association consisted; to these questions he had not thought fit to return any answer. The people of Ireland, and the Catholics were the people of Ireland, had been too long ill treated; they had too long remained quiet under the oppressions which were practised against them. At length they had come forward in a constitutional manner, and now be trusted their voice would be heard, and that no new persecution would be attempted. He had rejoiced to hear in the last session a declaration on the part of his Majesty's ministers, that the laws were to be distributed in Ireland with the same impartial justice as in England; but how that declaration was to be made consistent with the intention now avowed by ministers, he was yet to learn. There were now existing in England many associations which it might be said with as much reason were likely to be applied to dangerous purposes as that in Ireland. The Dissenters' Association, which was established for the purpose of defending individual dissenters from oppressive prosecutions. This was a lawful and laudable object, and was precisely similar to that of the Catholic Association. He would go further, and if he were a Catholic, he would say that the oppressions to which they had been exposed could only be borne to a certain extent, beyond which resistance became a duty. He had no doubt that if coercion, such as had been carried on, should be continued, resistance must be the consequence. The increase which had been announced in the military establishment, must in every point of view be unnecessary. It was impossible that any man could believe that such increase could be made for any beneficial purpose, or that it would have been made at all if it were not contemplated to bring the bayonet into use in Ireland. Up to the year 1792, 33,000 or 34,000 had been the greatest number of troops kept on foot in England in a time of peace. In 1821, the great military establishment then existing, was reduced from 60,000 to 76,000. Now, when his Majesty was constantly receiving assurances of the peaceful disposition of his allies—now that we were in the tenth year of profound peace, upon what rational pretence could this addition to the burdens of the people be justified? As it appeared, however, that the address to the Throne was a mere farce, he would not pursue the subject or the intention he had formed any further; but he must regret that any thing should be done which might lead the people of the Continent, and of other parts of the world, to believe that the increase of our army was for some purpose that might produce disquiet.

Sir C. Forbes said he was happy to hear that a portion of the proposed addition to the military establishment was destined for India, and he could have wished that a larger portion—nay, even the whole of the addition, should be sent thither. He insisted upon the necessity of the troops being embarked with as little delay as possible, and that precaution should be taken, by not overloading the transports, to guard against the probability of the soldiers suffering from sickness during the voyage. He regretted that the war now raging there had been allowed to commence; but since it had done so, he was convinced it was highly necessary to put as speedy a termination to it as was possible. If it were allowed to continue longer, he believed that consequences might arise from it which would shake our Indian empire to its very foundation.

Mr. C. W. Fynn said, that papers were now in the press which he should be able at an early day to lay before the House, containing a body of information on the subject of the Burmese war which it was necessary that hon. members should be in possession of before any discussions could be entered upon. When the House should be acquainted with the particulars relating to this affair, he should be ready to enter upon the case of Lord Amherst, as fully as the papers might enable him.

Mr. Alderman Haygate, after applauding the measures proposed with respect to the Catholic Association, and the recognition of the South American States, hoped that in the reduction of taxation which the ministers proposed, they would do away with the assessed taxes, which affected the comfort and independence of the people more than all the indirect taxes. He was sure that if it were proposed to reduce the duty upon foreign wines or on windows, 19 hands out of 20 would be held up in favour of the latter. He congratulated the ministry on the popularity which they enjoyed at the present moment, and hoped that they would adopt measures to ensure its continuance.

The address was then agreed to.

IRELAND. Committee of Inquiry.

THURSDAY, FEB. 10.—The Earl of Liverpool rose to move the re-appointment of a committee to inquire into the state of Ireland in a more extended manner than the inquiry which took place last session. Last session a committee was appointed to inquire into the state of certain disturbed districts in Ireland which were subject to the Insurrection Act. The principal ground for appointing that committee was to enable the house to judge of the necessity of continuing that Act, and the inquiry was very properly, by order of the house, confined to the counties which were then subject to its operation. The inquiry, therefore, was limited as to space; but it was found necessary to extend it to many other subjects than the state of the disturbed districts; and, indeed, to make it almost general. He would, therefore, move for a committee to inquire into the state of Ireland, and more particularly with regard to the circumstances which led to the disturbances in those parts of the kingdom which were the subject of inquiry last session. Under these terms, no fair subject of inquiry would be excluded. But he certainly did not mean to include the Catholic question. That was a subject of too paramount importance to be consigned to an inquiry of this kind. If, however, there were facts connected with that question which in the judgment of any noble lord might throw light on the inquiry, he would not object to their being investigated.

Earl Darnley :—If the noble earl meant to inquire into the state of Ireland without making the Catholic question his main object, and obtaining information respecting that question from those most capable of furnishing it, his inquiry would be useless. To overlook the Catholic question in an inquiry into the state of Ireland, was to imitate the strolling company who advertised the tragedy of Hamlet with the part of Hamlet, for that night, omitted. The more their lordships examined the subject, the more would they be convinced that Ireland never could be satisfied until the just claims of the Catholics were satisfied.

Lord Holland said, that many persons whose rank, wealth, talents, and intimate connexion with Ireland entitled their opinion to respect, had repeatedly urged the noble earl to agree to a general inquiry into the state of Ireland, but without success. A motion for that object last session had been rejected; and the only inquiry to which the noble earl would consent, was one which was limited to the disturbed districts. The disturbance in those districts was then ground of inquiry; but now that their lordships had come to the present session, what did they learn?—that there was no disturbance at all; so that the only narrow ground which the noble earl had for his former inquiry, was cut from under him. But upon looking further into the subject, we find there is one thing in the state of Ireland—the situation of the Catholics—one evil for which remedy is required. Oh, oh! we have got it now. Here is something to inquire about! “No,” said the noble earl, “that is not to be inquired into.” In appointing the committee, no reference must be made to that subject. The noble earl, in his caution on this question, resembled Marc Antony in his love, who gave licence to men’s tongues on all his other faults, but not a word of Cleopatra. It could not but be confessed, however, that the inquiry, though late, was still acceptable. He rejoiced most sincerely at the appointment of the committee, because he was sure its labours must prove useful.

The Earl of Harrowby said, the house would recollect that the last committee was not appointed for a general inquiry, because the proposed renewal of the Insurrection Act was the only reason for its institution. The intended measure rendered inquiry necessary into the nature and extent of the disorders which appeared to call for the continuance of the act. As to his noble friend’s observation on leaving out the Catholic question in his motion, their lordships would recollect that his noble friend had distinctly stated that he had no objection to the inquiry being so extended, that every fact bearing upon that question might be introduced; and he would on his own part state, that he had no objection to the introduction of evidence of opinions, for that would also be fact, as it would prove the existence of certain opinions held by certain persons.

The motion was then agreed to.

Catholic Association.

LORDS, MONDAY, FEB. 7.—The Marquis of Lansdown said, that, from what passed in the debate on the Address, an apprehension was entertained that ministers did not intend to lay on the table any papers connected with that part of His Majesty’s Speech which related to the state of Ireland.

The Earl of Liverpool observed, that the noble marquis’s impression was right. He did not intend to submit any papers to their lordships.

The Marquis of Lansdown then gave notice that he would to-morrow move an address to His Majesty for copies of all despatches from the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, relative to the political and religious societies in that country.

TUESDAY, FEB. 8.—The Marquis of Lansdown rose, in pursuance of his notice, to move an address to His Majesty, praying for copies of despatches relating to political and religious societies existing in Ireland. In the Speech by which the session had been opened, His Majesty was made to say that Ireland had partaken in the general prosperity of the empire; but it was added, that there existed in that country associations of a nature irreconcilable with the spirit of the constitution. Combining this with his Majesty’s subsequent recommendation to their lordships to adopt measures for suppressing these societies—combining it too, with the noble earl’s refusal to communicate that information which would be necessary to enable their lordships to form a right opinion on the subject; the house was placed in a most unprecedented situation. He did not remember any new restriction, even in time of war and public danger, having been imposed on the people, without a committee having been appointed to inquire into the alleged evil, or a communication having been made of the evidence on which such restrictions were grounded. It was now, as it appeared, intended to limit the freedom not of one, but of all classes. He had a right to assume this, for if there were any law capable of correcting the evil complained of, there certainly was no indisposition to enforce it. The acts of the associations, then, which were referred to in His Majesty’s speech, whether morally right or not, must be legal as the law now stood. Their lordships were, however, called upon, without any knowledge of the alleged evil, to provide a remedy for a danger at the moment when that danger was not pretended to be imminent (hear)—when the country was declared to be in a state of unexampled prosperity—and when all parties agreed that unusual tranquillity prevailed in Ireland. Different causes were assigned for this extraordinary tranquillity. The Catholic Association asserted that it was owing to themselves; the friends of the Lord-Lieutenant, that it was owing to his prudent management; the friends of ministers, on the contrary, insisted that it was entirely owing to the wise measures adopted by them, with respect to Ireland, for the last two years. But whatever difference of opinion might exist as to the cause, there was none as to the fact; and he had, therefore, a right to assert that nobody existed in Ireland willing to disturb the public peace, or, what would do as well for him, none able to disturb it. What a moment then for this extraordinary proceeding! As if some conspiracy, some dreadful treason had been discovered, they were called upon to impose new restrictions on the liberties of the people, without even inquiring into the reality of the danger. But he should perhaps be told, that they had only to govern their proceedings by the notoriety of the case. If, however, there were ever a case in which this argument was useless, it was this; it was a case in which persons who had the best opportunities of information had been most notoriously deceived. The law-officers in Ireland, whose business it was to inquire into the case, and who had the best means of obtaining knowledge, had been completely deceived. The facts they endeavoured to establish in the case he alluded to—a case in which the witnesses produced to support the charge contradicted themselves and one another—were rejected, not by a petty, but by a grand jury. He, therefore, must conclude that the present was one of those subjects, in which, instead of relying upon loose reports, and newspaper statements, they ought to inquire strictly as to the facts. They had in the first place to be satisfied of the existence of evil; next, as to its nature, and by what remedy it could be put down; and in the third place, that in extinguishing the evil, they did not create a greater in its stead. Now, in all these points their lordships required information. They were about to engage in a task, which, even with every information, would be of a most difficult nature. It was one of which they might see the commencement, but of which they could not see the end. The learned lord on the woolsack, who was reported to be the parent of the forthcoming measure, had undertaken a task of which, from every estimate he could form of the abilities which the learned lord had brought to it, he could not anticipate success. In the absence of all information, he must speak from report, and if, as was said, the object of the measure was to extinguish the Association and the Catholic rent—he would tell him, that unless he could make it penal for persons to place confidence in others,—unless he could prevent people from giving away their money—unless he could prevent the sentiments expressed by one man from reaching the ears of another, and the money of one man from passing into another man's pocket—unless he could do all this, he would do nothing. Before he proceeded further on this point, he would notice the pretence, that the proposed measure was not a substantive bill, but a mere amendment of the Convention Act. Now, there was a much wider difference between them. The Convention Act was passed to prevent a form of proceeding which, whether an offence or not, was a tangible object. He would not now discuss the propriety of delegation; although he should be sorry to give an unqualified opinion against it, because the greatest and best men which this country ever produced had considered delegation a fit and constitutional mode for obtaining a redress of grievances. However that might be, at least delegation was a practice tangible by law; in like manner, were secret oaths. They might say that the form of an oath should not be administered, for that, like conventional delegation, was a tangible object. But, when there was no form, no compulsion or oath, and when all that was done was founded in confidence, he would ask what more could be done by law, than getting rid of certain words? They might object to the term "association," or especially to the term "rent," for many people would have every thing under that name take a very different direction. Their lordships would recollect that a Secretary for Ireland had set himself against the "Catholic Committee," and he succeeded in getting rid of it; but the "Catholic Association" took its place. In like manner the learned lord might get rid of "association" and "rent;" but the question was, would not the people still meet and pay their money in spite of the law? The learned lord would find it a hard task to prevent men from paying their own money in any way in which they wished to pay it. Whatever might be the law, it was always difficult enough to get money into one's pocket, but he never heard of any difficulty in getting it out. Their lordships knew the story of Piron's applying to a member of the French Academy to abuse a comedy he was about to print—"for," said he, "if you abuse it in the Academy to-night, I shall sell every copy to-morrow." Now, had he been a member of the Association, and could have gained access to the learned lord, he should have asked him to say in Parliament that the Catholic rent was a bad thing, and then he should have expected it to be soon doubled. He would tell their lordships another anecdote. In a remote period of the connexion of the two countries, when those acts of violence which had always been too frequent in Ireland prevailed to a great extent, the Irish were accustomed to vociferate two words Crom-a-boo and Butler-a-boo. The correspondents of the English Government represented that those words were the cause of all the outrages which were committed. A meeting of the cabinet took place. It was resolved, that the obnoxious words must be put down, and an act was passed for abolishing them from the Irish language. But considering that the Irish would not be quiet if they were not allowed to use some exclamation, they were permitted to call out "St. George;" but if they persisted in using the proscribed words, they were to be hanged. Whether this law had the effect of abolishing the mischievous words was not known; but the outrages were as violent as ever. This act, then, had failed. but he could not tell how far the present might succeed. Their lordships must recollect, that it was against words, and words only, that they were called upon to legislate. It became them to consider whether, by expressing apprehension of the Association, they would not give importance to it, and increase substantially the very powers which they were nominally about to abridge. It was not necessary for him to apologize for, or explain the proceedings of the Association; nobody had any right to judge of those proceedings from report; but he had no objection to state, that if the reports were correct, he saw much in those proceedings to disapprove. But having said that, he must also state, that there were some of the proceedings of the Association which met his approbation; but because they were of that mixed character, he would not therefore attempt to put down the Association, conceiving that it grew necessarily out of the condition of the Irish people. There existed on the surface of society evils of all descriptions, resulting from the habits and passions which degraded human nature, which no reasonable man thought of attacking, because they eluded the grasp and deceived the eye of legislation. If this were the case with respect to habits and passions, how much more strongly did it apply where opinions only were concerned. In a country divided by religious and political opinions, individuals should have an opportunity of presenting their opinions publicly, whether right or wrong. Opinions resembled those vapours with whose extraordinary powers we were daily becoming more acquainted, which, if pent up, would explode and sweep every thing before them; but if allowed to mix with the air, blended harmlessly with the common atmosphere (hear). On these reasons he grounded his motion.

The Earl of Liverpool said, that if the noble marquis had thought proper to wait for two or three days, he might have satisfied himself with respect to the proceeding to which his motion referred. But he would argue the question on the supposition of the noble marquis. The noble marquis said, that no abridgement ought ever to be made of the liberty of the subject without an inquiry being instituted on information laid before Parliament. If he meant, that no such measure should be adopted without sufficient grounds, he agreed with him. But those grounds might be facts of general notoriety, as well known to all their lordships as to Government. When their lordships passed a measure affecting the Orange societies, they did not ask for a tittle of evidence, or enter into any inquiry: but could it be said that they knew half as much of those societies as they did of the Catholic Association? He did not intend to argue that in acting in that manner regarding the Orange societies, they had acted rightly—he merely stated, that they acted without inquiry or official information, and only on the notoriety of the case. If it were intended that the measure about to be brought, should rest on official information, he would agree, that before they adopted the measure, there would be a fair ground for inquiry. But the measure intended to be introduced would not be founded on official information, nor, indeed, upon any circumstances which were not as well known to any one of their lordships as to his Majesty's ministers. It was the boast of the Catholic Association that all their proceedings were public; that every thing which they did, was done in the face of day, and before the world. If their lordships should adopt any measure affecting the Association, they would adopt it on evidence which no member of it would dare to deny. He could therefore see no ground for the motion of the noble marquis. The noble marquis supposed—for what reason he could not divine—that the proposed measure was the contrivance of the learned lord on the woolsack. Undoubtedly, the measure could not be introduced into Parliament without his concurrence, but certainly it was no part of his duty to concoct it. It was the measure of the Irish Government, approved of by the English Cabinet. It was adopted from a deep sense of its necessity to preserve peace in Ireland. He would ask, what must be the effect of the political and religious animosities which such a society as the Catholic Association must produce? The noble marquis had said, that there must be inflammatory speeches in all public assemblies. But there was a great difference between inflammatory speeches in a divided assembly, and in an assembly professedly united (hear, hear). If men of different persuasions met together, warmth on one side would produce warmth on the other, and no further mischief might ensue. But in an assembly of men having all the same object, inflammatory addresses must be looked upon with a different feeling, especially when such speeches were followed by similar acts. The noble marquis had alluded to the case of an individual against whom a bill had been filed, which a Grand Jury had ignored. But did that prove what were the opinions—even of the Grand Jury—as to the conduct of the Catholic Association? The only inference is, that they did not understand certain words in the same sense as the Attorney-General, by whom they had been deemed seditious. It was on the acts of the body itself that the opinion of Parliament should be founded. If there had been inflammatory proceedings on the part of the Association, there never was a time when they were less justifiable than the present, both from the prosperity of the country and the general conduct of Government; for he called upon the warmest advocates of the Catholics, and those who most strongly condemned the policy by which Ireland had been hitherto governed, to declare whether there ever had been a period when justice had been more fairly administered, or when Government had shown a stronger desire to act with kindness towards the Catholic body than within the last few years. He looked upon the Catholic Association as being the greatest enemies of Ireland; for they drove wealthy people out of the country, stopped the flow of capital into it, and excited animosities which it was the wish of Government to remove. It was impossible that such a body could exist without creating opposite associations, which must be followed by a state of rancorous, religious and political animosity, incompatible with the well-being of any country in the world.

Lord Holland observed, that through the whole course of his speech the noble earl had carefully abstained from stating to their lordships what the motion was, or from giving any reasons why the information which it sought should not be granted. He had contented himself with saying, that the motion had reference to something of which the house knew nothing—although it clearly had reference to the King's Speech—and declared it unprecedented and uncalled for. The refusal, and not the demand of the information, would be unprecedented, indecent, and unjust. How often had the noble earl come down to that house calling for committees, and furnishing papers and information, which were to end in laws abridging the liberty of the people? When the noble earl brought down his green bags, containing volumes of libels on the people of England, no one had ever asked "What is the meaning of all this? There is no bill before us: the bill is in the House of Commons." It was strange, that when the house was called upon to apply a remedy to an evil, they should not inquire into the nature and extent of the evil, because they did not know what remedy might be adopted. He thought it would be impossible for the house, if they had any respect for their character, or if they wished the proposed measure to carry any consideration out of doors, to refuse his noble friend's request. The noble earl was fond of precedents, and said that one for the intended measure was to be found in the bill respecting the Orange Societies, which passed, he said, unanimously, and without inquiry. How was it that the House was reconciled to that bill? It was merely the extension of a law already existing in England, and was originally introduced in a committee by Mr. Sec. Dundas, after a long and painful inquiry (hear, hear). From what had fallen from the noble earl, he conceived that the pattern to which he looked with respect to the intended measure, was the Irish Convention Act. At the time that Act was passed, there was a threat of a Convention to be held at Athlone, for purposes legal in description, but it was supposed with other designs. We were on the eve of a war with France, which, it was alleged, held forth its arms to receive the discontented of all countries, but more particularly of this. What happened? The noble Keeper of the Privy Seal (Earl of Westmorland) was then Viceroy of Ireland. Surrounded with the dangers to which he had alluded, what was the conduct of the noble earl when he came down to the Irish Parliament? Did he mark out the Convention for the notice of Parliament in the Speech from the Throne? No, he recommended conciliation, and concession to the Catholics. He began by a boon, and afterwards proceeded to adopt measures which he thought necessary for the safety of the State. The Convention Act was preceded by one which conferred upon the Catholics almost the only privileges which they enjoy. He contended that the nature of his noble friend's motion was mistaken: the question was not as to whether the alleged grievances required a remedy, but whether they were to adopt an important measure without information on the subject. It might be said, they had the King's Speech: they had; but what did they learn from it? It stated, that the Irish were more prosperous and industrious than ever—and that associations existed amongst them which called for a remedy. It then proceeded to recommend inquiry into the state of Ireland. Now, if the noble earl meant that no information should be afforded until after the remedy was brought forward, why recommend inquiry? According to the King's Speech, if any measure were to be adopted, it ought not to be adopted rashly; for it was stated in that Speech that the condition of Ireland was highly prosperous. When he read the passage relating to unconstitutional associations, he looked round him to see what association there could be of this kind, and it struck him that it was the Irish Cabinet (hear). That, indeed, was an association contrary to the spirit of the constitution; for it was formed upon a system of disunion and counteraction, which might be seen in every one of its measures, and which was only equalled in this respect by the English Cabinet. It was marked by the greatest inconsistencies, like the conduct of the Attorney-General of Ireland, who when he had instituted one foolish prosecution on one side, endeavoured to counteract it by a more foolish one on the other. He was thus for Crom-a-See and Butler-a-boo both. The serpentine line may be traced in all that relates to Ireland.

—“Penitusque in viscera lapsus Serpentis furiale malum, totiusque pererrat.”

The real question before their lordships was, whether or not, when they were called on from the throne to legislate on evils said to exist in Ireland, they were to do so in the dark? If the necessity did exist, where so many millions were to be affected by the measure, it was, indeed, a frightful necessity, but still their lordships were bound to obey it: but he conjured them, as they valued the safety of the empire—he conjured them, as they valued the liberties of their fellow-subjects—he conjured them, as they valued the character of the laws of this country—not to have recourse, without full and substantial evidence of that necessity, to so baneful and disgusting a measure.

Earl Bathurst briefly opposed the motion. The principle brought forward on the present occasion was this—If, on the face of the public proceedings of this association, there were nothing to justify their lordships in adopting the proposed measure, then they would reject it; but if there were, their lordships would do well to wait until it was proposed, and then judge if the measure were equal to the occasion.

The Earl of Caernarvon said, that the noble earl had talked of statements, but he had heard nothing stated. He thought the noble earl would, as upon other occasions, have produced some documents to justify the strong recommendation which had been put into the mouth of His Majesty. He, however, did no such thing, whilst another noble lord (Bathurst) actually apologized for the little he was going to say upon the subject. Between both, in what a condition were their lordships placed? He would ask, were they to legislate on the preamble of the bill to be introduced on a future day? Were they to say “content” or “not content” on any bill which the House of Commons might send up, without having any information to guide them, and that upon a bill which might be of the most vital interest to the welfare and the safety of the country? Were they to proceed in this way upon such a measure as this when they would require evidence before them in support of the most unimportant private bill? The noble earl said that all the information was to be derived from the newspapers, and in the same breath he stated that the proposed measure was founded on the despatches received from the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. The ministers said to the House, “We act on despatches: the newspapers are enough for you.”

The house then divided—

Content, 20—Not content, 42—Majority against the motion, 22.

COMMONS, THURSDAY, FEB. 10.—Sir G. Hill presented a petition from the nobility, magistrates, clergy and freeholders of the county of Londonderry, praying for the suppression of the Catholic Association. He should merely state the circumstances out of which this petition had originated. He could assure the house, that though much alarm had been excited in the minds of the Protestant population of Ireland by the attempts of the Association to rule, tax and govern their Catholic fellow subjects, and to alienate their affections from the constituted authorities of the country, the petitioners would have left the suppression of the evil to the Executive Government, had they not seen a dangerous attempt to levy the Catholic rent in their own immediate neighbourhood. A subscription had been entered into in the town of Londonderry to build a school-house, for the education of Roman Catholics; an undertaking which several Protestants had benevolently contributed to support. The money so raised was given to the leaders of the Roman Catholics in that neighbourhood, who immediately handed it over to the rent, accompanying their gift with the usual inflammatory speeches (shouts of hear! from the Opposition). He said "hear" too, though unfortunately for Ireland, she had already heard too much upon this subject (hear, and a laugh). The petition was signed by 29 magistrates, 39 clergymen, and 1700 freeholders, in three days.

Mr. Dawson said that the petitioners would not have thought it necessary to come forward had they not seen it falsely and impudently asserted in some resolutions of the Catholic Association, that the feelings of the Protestants of Ireland were favourable to the Catholic rent. Nine-tenths of the Protestants of Ireland were, he believed, decidedly hostile to it. They were so, at least, in the county of Derry, where they were to the Catholics, in the proportion of numbers, as two to one, and in the proportion of respectability, property, intelligence and industry, as 1000 to one (loud cries of hear!).

Sir H. Parnell observed, that this was the only petition which had yet been presented from Ireland for the suppression of the Catholic Association. The hon. member had declared that nine-tenths of the Protestants were in favour of the measure for which these petitioners prayed; but he had only given his own authority for that declaration. He was obliged to meet this declaration with a negative; he would say that nine-tenths of the Protestants of Ireland were opposed to it. The hon. member must have forgotten how completely the petition of the Protestants some few years ago proved that they were not hostile to the cause of Emancipation. They were still animated by the same sentiments; and several petitions were now receiving their signatures in favour of Catholic Emancipation (cheers).

Mr. Abercrombie:—A requisition had been presented to the sheriff by several magistrates of the county of Waterford, calling upon him to convene the county to petition Parliament in favour of their Catholic brethren. The sheriff had refused to call the meeting, and he thought that that public functionary should explain his motives for doing so.

Mr. Dennis Browne declared himself of opinion that a permanent foundation of the peace of Ireland was only to be looked for in the relinquishment of all civil distinctions arising out of religious differences (loud cheers). He had advised the Catholics in his neighbourhood not to join in any of the popular schemes to obtain emancipation, but to wait patiently the change of feeling in Parliament. They had in general followed his advice; but when they found that the proposition for putting the Catholics of England on a level with themselves was rejected, against the wishes of the prime minister (loud cheering from the Opposition), they had asked how much longer they were to expect their own emancipation.

The petition was then ordered to be printed

Mr. Goulburn rose to ask leave to bring in a bill relating to unlawful associations in Ireland. At the close of last session, he had indulged a confident hope, that the measures which Parliament had adopted, and the Government of Ireland pursued, would have been allowed to go on in a course of progressive benefit; but although the previous outrages which had disgraced Ireland had ceased—although the employment of the poor had considerably increased—although her trade had advanced in proportion, and considerable commercial establishments had grown up, yet there had also, unfortunately, grown up another power, unconnected with Parliament or the Government of the country, but attempting to control both. The Catholic Association had now assumed a character calculated to deprive the country of that returning peace and prosperity of which it stood so much in need; it had superseded all rational authority, by evading the existing law against illegal associations in Ireland. There were two subsisting acts directed against these associations: the Convention Act, passed by the Irish Parliament in 1793, and another of the session before last. The act of 1793 prohibited all assemblies for the appointment or election of deputies, or which assumed in any manner to represent the people of that country. The principle of representation was not the sole evil of which the legislature then complained. That principle, however, being the most tangible one, the legislature could more easily prohibit and suppress it; and the societies of that day had mostly assumed the representative character. But the Parliament had now to deal with an association which had carefully evaded the act of 1793. They did all the real business of representation without professing it in a single instance, and exercised within the letter, though not the spirit of the law, all the purposes of delegation and representation, which that law was enacted to prevent. It was allowed by a gentleman opposite, that this body proclaiming itself self-elected, did, in fact, represent the Catholic population of Ireland. Was the law, he would ask, to be thus evaded? Was the existence of a body to be tolerated which, to the plain common sense of every man, was intended to supersede the legal authorities of the land? He would now consider more particularly the constitution of the body which he called on Parliament to suppress. As he trusted it was only temporary, it might be met by only a temporary restriction. He was perfectly aware how tiresome it must be for the house to hear over again the proceedings of a body, which during the whole of its deliberations boasted of having courted publicity (hear, hear). From its commencement in 1823, it had unceasingly disseminated its proceedings. Its members stated in their first report that they confined their labours to the Catholic question alone. It mattered little to him, whether this was their only object, or whether they sought a reform in Parliament; or, ultimately, a separation from Great Britain. It was enough for him to know, that whatever was their object, their means of furthering it were incompatible with good government. He should, on account of the publicity which they had already obtained, refrain from going into details concerning the Catholic Association. But there was this about it, in which it differed from almost every other body, that there was a concurrence of opinion among its members; that their efforts were directed to one point—that dissent was inadmissible—and therefore that it was without the clash of adverse opinions, which in other assemblies mitigated, if not neutralized, the violence of peculiar views. Another dangerous quality of this body was its indefinite duration. Imperfect as sometimes was the periodical control of the multitude, sickle as was its supervision, still it presented some control over other bodies: but this self-elected body continued without resorting to any fresh accession from the people. In this Association, there were certainly a few of the first class of the Catholic body—there were many disappointed individuals who sought personal aggrandizement, some of whom undoubtedly possessed considerable talents; their occupation was occasionally to discuss some real grievance, but more often to exaggerate some fancied one, to inflame the people by declarations that their legislature was corrupt, and their laws oppressive. There were also in the Association, surviving members of the Catholic Convention of 1793, who had abandoned the representative character against which the Convention Act was directed to assume that of virtual representation. There were men among these who had been rebels of old time; who had suffered the penalty of the law—men who were the friends of Tone, of Russell, and Emmett, traitors who had borne arms against the King's troops, when drawn out to oppose them. In this promiscuous assemblage were found a few members of the Catholic peerage and aristocracy, many of the Catholic gentry, and persons of property (hear, hear! from the Opposition). But it was not by rank or virtue that the members of such a society raised themselves to eminence: it was by pandering to the prejudices and passions of the multitude. In the exercise of their functions the Association proceeded according to all the recognized forms of Parliament—they had their committees of grievance, of justice, of education (hear, hear! from the Opposition), of finance—with persons regularly assigned and deputed to conduct all these investigations. These general committees had also subordinate agents, who had specific duties to perform. They had almost copied verbatim the seasonal orders of the house. The first act of this body was the imposition of the Catholic rent, which was called a voluntary contribution. There were regular collectors, and regular sums assessed under this name, so that it was by many felt to be an onerous and grievous tax. And so complete was the engine for collecting this payment, that there was a regular chain through all ranks, closely linked, to encircle the different gradations of society. The Association first ordered a sum of money to be raised: for this purpose the priesthood were employed, assisted by direct collectors, acting under their instructions, and with regular sets of books, in which were inscribed the names, condition, and rent of the individual; and what was of as much importance, the names of those who refused to contribute (hear, hear). It happened, that many gentlemen of the country had endeavoured to dissuade the wretched peasantry from applying any portion of their inadequate means to the fund of this rent. The consequence was, that the Association denounced them, held them up to reprobation and scorn, and if not to the vengeance at least to the hostility of their fellow-countrymen. And this was called a voluntary contribution!—a contribution backed by the influence of the priest over his flock—his discretionary power of absolving (hear, hear)—a power which, whether the priest had actually made use of, or not, was still formidable, and which, when exercised in a political sense, was much to be deplored. In the constitution of this fund, then, there was a heavy grievance; and when they came to consider of its application, they would find equal cause of complaint. He would not object to the members of the Association for giving briefs to one another, and paying the fees out of the Catholic rent; nor would he criticise the regard shown by them to the liberty of the press, in retaining a considerable part of the Irish press in their interest—in persecuting another part of the press—in employing Mr. Cobbett, and disseminating his writings throughout the country. It was of their unjustifiable interference with the administration of justice that he complained (hear, hear). He knew he should be told, that there were institutions in England which had a similar object; but it did not follow that that which might be permitted here was equally permissible in Ireland. The Association interposed their influence in the ordinary administration of justice. The business of the court at quarter-sessions was perplexed by them; and they contrived to intermingle with the common interests of justice all the bitterness of political enmity. In every case of felony or murder, they assumed it to be their business to superintend the execution of the laws. Counsel were retained at head-quarters, who came down with the most exaggerated statements against any individual charged with any offence by a Catholic, or against individuals by whom a Catholic might happen to be charged. None of those courts could be free from the presence of some representative of the Association, intrusted with the business of watching over the administration of justice. Many magistrates of unquestionable conduct and of known impartiality, had complained to Government of the hindrances which were thus put in the way of the fair distribution of justice. Passing over the subordinate jurisdictions, he begged leave to call attention to cases which came before the higher tribunals. He would borrow his statements from the records of the Association itself. In the month of July last, according to the statement of the Association, a murder was committed in the parish of Ballybay. It was first notified by a correspondent, who styled it an “unprovoked and wanton murder of a Catholic by an Orangeman.” The letter, which was published, was transmitted, before the trial, to the Association. A discussion took place, and a Mr. Murray moved, that the business should be referred to a committee. The committee was appointed, sat, and reported. Authority was then given to institute proceedings for the prosecution of the alleged murder, and Mr. Kiernan was directed to conduct it (hear, hear). Did gentlemen mean by their cheering, that this was a proceeding of which they could approve? An individual was to go to trial with the opinions of the whole Roman Catholic population called against him (hear, hear! from the Opposition). He would have to go to trial with the declaration of that body against him, as against one who had perpetrated murder upon political motives. But to continue. The trial came on. A host of evidence deposed, that the man charged with the murder jumped upon the throat of the deceased, kicked him in the side, and behaved to him, whilst struggling in the agonies of death, in a manner too disgusting to be related to the house. Nevertheless, the surgeon who had examined the wound deposed, and he was corroborated by one of their own witnesses, that the body evinced no particular marks of violence, and that the deceased had come by his death by the dislocation of the vertebrae of his neck, which, in falling, came in contact with a small post. The jury pronounced a verdict of acquittal (hear, hear). He begged their attention to what followed. The judge said, that he should not discharge his duty if he allowed the prisoner to go from the bar, without expressing, not only his very great satisfaction at the verdict, but his entire approbation of the prisoner's conduct in the affray—a conduct which tended to preserve the peace, instead of disturbing it, and which was highly praise-worthy (hear, hear). The particulars of the second case were more familiar to the house: it related the proceedings of a person, who was constantly entitled by the writer of the paragraph from which he read, "a ruffian." He was accused of administering unlawful oaths to the Catholic inhabitants of a certain parish. He was discovered to be a soldier in the 36th regt. and it was broadly insinuated that he was doing this with the connivance of Government. It was then recommended that he should be pressed by some one deputed by the Association, lest he should, through the interference of the magistrates, escape transportation, which he so richly deserved. He confessed that on reading this series of bold asseverations, he did not doubt but that some wicked persons had been at work to spread discontent in that part of the country, and that there must be some truth in a statement so hardly advanced, notwithstanding the disgusting imputation of guilt against the Government of Ireland. The accusation, conducted by the delegates of the Association, was heard before a numerous bench of forty-three magistrates, who declared, that there was no ground whatever for the charge preferred. The priest of the parish in which the accused had been taken up, admonished his flock to beware of those men whose pockets were full of the King's money, but who were only anxious to seduce them in the first instance, that they might afterwards shoot them like dogs: he denounced the individual from the altar, and said he would find out to what parish he belonged, and he would make his wife or mother, if he had either, leave the country (hear, hear). Let the case be transposed:—Suppose a man had been taken up under the Insurrection Act—suppose the Government had, even before trial, denounced him as only fit for transportation—suppose they had proceeded to molest the wife and mother of the party, and had expressed a resolution to make them leave the country;—what would have been the outcry against the Government for such conduct? That which would be execrable in the Government would scarcely be defended on behalf of the Association. There was a case of a police-officer who had encountered similar treatment, from which it was obvious that there was a design to spread a feeling of animosity against that useful body of men. The general tendency of these proceedings was perfectly plain; it was to excite in every case the acrimony of party resentment. He came next to the conduct of the Association within the last year; and he would confine himself to the month of December last. In that month they began to collect a revenue. In order still further to advance their object, they put forth an "Address of the Catholic Association to the People of Ireland," some passages of which he should advert to. In one place it said, "we advise you to refrain from all secret societies; from all private combinations; from every species of whiteboyism or ribbonism, or by whatever other name any secret or private association may be called" (hear, hear! from the Opposition). They proceeded to point out the inducements their Catholic brethren had to remain quiet—the power of the law, the inconvenience of indictments, and the number of innocent persons who, during former disturbances, had suffered for the guilty. Thus they could not caution the people to remain tranquil without libelling the laws of the country. This too, was addressed not to the well-informed and well-judging, but to the ignorant and illiterate—to men most likely to be led away by any statement from such a quarter. In the name of the Government of Ireland, and those high authorities by whom it was administered, he begged to repel this charge (hear, hear). There was nothing which had more seriously engaged the attention of the present Lord Lieutenant than the impartial administration of justice (hear, hear). There was no man better acquainted with this fact than the gentleman at the head of the Association, who, from his professional and legal habits, must be convinced that such was the fact. He next came to a memorable passage:—"In the name of common sense, which forbids you to seek foolish resources; by the hate you bear the Orangemen, your natural enemies (cheers from the Ministerial benches, re-echoed from the Opposition); by the confidence you repose in the Catholic Association, your natural and zealous friends; by the respect and affection you entertain for your clergy; by the affectionate reverence you bear for the gracious Monarch, who deigns to think of your sufferings with a view to your relief; and, above all, in the name of religion, and of the living God, we conjure you to abstain from all secret and illegal societies, and Whiteboy outrages" (hear, hear). And this was the doctrine infused into the great body of the Roman Catholics of Ireland! They were told that they were to look upon the Orangemen—and let it be recollected that the terms Orangemen and Protestants were nearly synonymous (hear, hear! from the Opposition). They were told to look upon the Orangemen with hatred! There was no possibility of taking the passage in any other sense. The danger of this form of words was pointed out to the Association, and their rejection was moved by one of its members. A division ensued, and the words were retained by a very considerable majority. It must be inferred, therefore, that this was a principle upon which the Catholics were prepared to act if they could obtain power. The document, thus worded, was distributed throughout the country. Priests read it from the altars in preference to preaching a sermon. Was it surprising that the Protestants should view these proceedings with alarm, or could Government be justified in allowing the existence of a danger which threatened, not only to perpetuate political divisions, but to re-awaken religious animosity in all its bitterness? It was not so long since an association of this kind had existed, professing the same views—he alluded to the United Irishmen. Their object was Catholic Emancipation; but their subsequent proceedings proved that their covert intentions were rebellion and separation from this country. What, he might now ask, must be the consequence if Parliament did not interfere? Could they expect that the Protestant body, left to their own means for protection, would not constitute themselves into a counter-association (hear, hear)? Would they not be justified in assuming the same powers—in interfering in the like manner with the proceedings of the government, and of the courts of justice? They would be driven to this course in self-defence. The courts of justice, especially the subordinate ones, would be converted into arenas for the disputes of Catholic and Protestant advocates, who would appear, one on each side, in every case where the parties differed in religion. It was impossible for Government to allow this double domination. The Association must be put down. Two years ago he had introduced a bill for the suppression of secret societies; and he believed that subsequent experience had proved its expediency. In many parts that bill had not only modified the proceedings of these societies, but in many instances the societies dissolved themselves, though they had perfectly legalized their proceedings. Some of them had substituted for their secret oaths, the ordinary oaths of supremacy and allegiance, taken before a magistrate, as the only qualification necessary to become a member. He proposed to extend the provisions of that act. He proposed to make all societies unlawful, whose duration was permanent, and which appointed committees to meet for above a certain time, and levied or collected money. He proposed also to render illegal all affiliated societies, which excluded persons of any religious faith, and which took oaths otherwise than as directed by law. There would be exemptions of certain societies, which met for purposes connected merely with trade, agriculture, charity, and others of a harmless nature. The offence of belonging to such a society would be prosecuted by indictment alone; so that in cases of vexatious prosecutions, the Attorney-General might have an opportunity of interference. He believed that these measures would restore peace to Ireland, because he conceived there were no other means by which that house could show its due regard for its own rights—by which alone it could prove its disapprobation of measures that tended at once to overthrow the prerogatives of the Crown, and to destroy the privileges of the people. On former occasions attempts had been made against the power of Parliament; but he was one of those who thought that, when properly exerted, the great body of the people would still be brought to love and revere the legitimate power of Parliament.*

The question having been put, Mr. J. Smith said, that a great part of the rt. hon. gent.'s speech related to the conduct of the Association, of which he had given many details and statements. If they were to decide on mere personal statement, then certainly he should be as much satisfied with the statements of the rt. hon. gent. as he could be with those of any other individual. This would be justifiable in a private case. But when a great public measure was concerned, he could not rest satisfied with any details which came from the rt. hon. gent. unless they were borne out and corroborated by other authority. He should on this occasion, take the course which had been adopted on others—he should call for evidence. He regretted the scenes which took place in 1791: but as the rt. hon. gent. had touched upon it, he would call on him to look at the transactions of 1795. Did the rt. hon. gent. remember the cry of "To Hell or Connaught!" fulminated against the Catholics? Did he recollect the confiscation of their houses, and the destruction of their properties? It had fallen to his lot to present the petition of a person whose cottage had been forcibly entered, whose property had been destroyed, and whose arm had been broken—he believed by a party of Orangemen. They were subsequently tried and acquitted. But what had afterward occurred? The Seneschal of the district went to the house of this unhappy person, and took away his only cow (hear). If he went into this subject, he could show, that justice had not been properly administered, especially in the north of Ireland. If he wanted an authority on this subject, he could not quote a better than the late Lord Chancellor of Ireland (Redecliffe), whose observations spoke volumes on the subject. That noble lord had emphatically said, after an acquaintance with the country for many years, that there was one law for the poor, and another for the rich; and he added, that both were equally ill administered (hear, hear)! He contended that the association of the Catholics was produced by the union of the Orangemen. If the Orangemen were so united, was it wonderful that Catholics should also unite? The Orangemen were united by a common profession of faith, by common interests, by common passions and feelings. Independent of this, the whole established church in Ireland, had taken a strong part in the Catholic question; and they were connected with a most powerful party here. It was no less authentic, that Lord Sidmouth had held office, for a considerable time, as the security for Catholic exclusion. Such was the understanding; and what were the Catholics to do, when they found such power

vention Act, which prohibited all representative assemblies in Ireland, and stating the late evasion thereof by self-appointed societies; the bill proposed to enact, that every society acting for redress of grievances in Church or State, and renewing its meetings for more than days, or appointing committees, &c. or levying or receiving money; and every society composed of separate branches or divisions, or corresponding with any other society, or excluding persons of any religion allowed by law, or taking any lawful oath at any time or place or occasion not required by law, should be declared unlawful. ful bodies united against them? With respect to Orange Societies he had a strange story to relate. A letter had been put into his hand, purporting to be from the Earl of Liverpool, on the subject of these associations. From this it appeared, that in the year 1819, a private soldier died, amongst whose papers were found oaths and declarations, which proved that he had been a member of an Orange Lodge in his own regiment. The information was forwarded to head-quarters; and it produced an answer on the subject, in which it was stated that in accordance with two acts of Parliament, any soldier found connecting himself with a political society, was, for the first offence, subject to two years' imprisonment; and for the second, to seven years' transportation. This did not appear to be the case in Ireland. Now was it not extraordinary, that while notice of these two acts was given in a particular quarter, individuals here, of the highest rank, were allowed to join an association with which others could not become connected without running the risk of seven years' transportation? In Ireland, Orange lodges were suffered until two years ago to exist without molestation, when they became so troublesome that Government was obliged to take notice of them. If the acts to which he had alluded had been extended to and enforced in Ireland, he believed there would have been no Catholic Association whatever; and as that body assembled for the purpose of self-defence, he thought their conduct might be palliated (hear). The rt. hon. gent. said that he expected this measure of his to restore tranquillity. Let him look to the Insurrection Act. That also had been expected to produce tranquillity. But what had resulted from these harsh measures? They had been the means of continually irritating the people. He knew, from persons who held situations of trust, that of all the convicts sent to New South Wales, the Irish were the most decent and the most orderly. The reason was obvious. Most of those unfortunate persons were sent out of the country under those oppressive acts. There was one mode, and one mode alone, of tranquillizing Ireland (hear, hear); by granting to the Catholics a full participation in the rights of their Protestant brethren. Was it not shameful that such disabilities should exist, at a moment when they saw, in his Majesty's Hanoverian possessions, the most extensive toleration? When they saw the same toleration in Canada? In all those instances, that was done which ministers would not do for Ireland; no disturbances occurred amongst those large communities; they formed a population as peaceable and united as that of any parish in London. He would defy the rt. hon. Sec. (Peel) and the whole of the University he represented, to point out an instance, in ancient or modern history, where the most unbounded toleration had produced any thing but good (hear, hear). That was the true mode of managing religious sects (hear, hear). It was with grief that he perceived the measure was supported by the rt. hon. Sec. for Foreign Affairs (hear, hear). He certainly had hoped that if the Government really intended to check the Catholic Association, they would have acted in a very different manner—by measures of conciliation, not by measures of coercion. Why should the rt. hon. gent. support measures which blasted the feelings and exasperated the minds of those who sought for a fair participation in civil rights? If he took a different course, no temporary popularity, no fleeting fame, would be his. A lasting and living fame would attend him who healed the wounds of Ireland. Let the rt. hon. gent. (Mr. Canning) accomplish it. The recollection of rescuing that country, of restoring it to those rights which had been so long withheld, would cheer him in his latest hour (hear, hear).

Mr. Abercrombie:—If this were an ordinary bill, he would willingly postpone its consideration at the present moment; but it was against the principle, the object, the foundation of this bill that he contended, and he could not even for a moment withhold his opposition. If he were asked, "Do you regret the existence of this society?"—he would say he did. And why? Because it proved the existence of those grievances which had long been complained of, and which should long since have been removed. He wished not for its continuance, because he wished that the grievances on which it was founded should cease. He lamented its existence, because it told him of wrongs inflicted and rights withheld. But he could not therefore support the proposition of the rt. hon. gent. By an Act of Parliament, they might destroy the Association in its present form; but it would rise again in a different shape, and how were they then to put it down? He was for destroying the cause which produced the Association, by emancipating the Catholics. So long as they refused justice to the Catholics, so long would they keep up the Association. Some time ago, the Irish Protestants had all the knowledge and wealth of the country; but now the Catholics had acquired knowledge themselves—they knew their strength—they felt they were the preponderating power—and they demanded their rights with that force and firmness which they thought their claims required; under such circumstances this bill could have no other effect than to aggravate the feeling which the evil had produced. It was urged that Emancipation would only affect a small number of Catholics; that it might give Mr. O'Connell a silk gown, and Lord Fingall a seat in Parliament; but that it could do no more. This, however, mattered not to him; he looked to what the Catholics, and not what the Protestants thought about it. If they think themselves excluded from common rights, can you blame them for endeavouring to obtain redress; had they not a right to associate to procure redress? Were there no other associations in Ireland? Were there no Orange lodges in that country? Or was it surprising that other societies should be opposed to them? If there were any law against this Association, it would be easy to show that it had been invaded. An attempt had been made—he would not designate it as it deserved—to bring one of its members to justice; but it had entirely failed. While the Orange Societies existed, in defiance of law, the House were called on to put down the Association which had violated no law—not even in collecting "rent," which had been so much reprobated. As concerned with the rent, the conduct of the clergy had been blamed. The rt. hon. gent. disliked the union of priest and Associator. He disliked it as much, and considered it as mischievous as the rt. hon. gent. could do—as much as he did the union of Protestant bishop and political intriguer. It was nothing to him that the bishop was rich and lived in a palace, while the priest dwelt in a cottage in

throughout the country. Priests read it from the altars in preference to preaching a sermon. Was it surprising that the Protestants should view these proceedings with alarm, or could Government be justified in allowing the existence of a danger which threatened, not only to perpetuate political divisions, but to re-awaken religious animosity in all its bitterness? It was nothing to him that the bishop was rich and lived in a palace, while the priest dwelt in a cottage in penury. Why was it wrong in a priest to supplicate that House for a restitution of just rights? Was it not as wrong in a Protestant dean or prebendary to take part in a contested election, or to invite his flock from the pulpit to petition against Catholic Emancipation? It was the principle he hated. His opposition had nothing to do with persons. Another topic now presented itself—did this Association interfere with the administration of justice? On that subject he thanked the rt. hon. gent. for the two cases to which he had alluded, because they enabled him to substitute for the rt. hon. gent.'s conclusion, the true and rational one. With respect to the first case, the most important part of it, as represented by the rt. hon. gent. was, that the influence of the Association would make an impression on the jury, unfavourable to the ends of justice. In that case, the jury acquitted the prisoner. What conclusion, therefore, could be drawn from it but this—that the influence of the Association, if it existed, was perfectly impotent, as arrayed against impartial justice. He was not acquainted with the facts of the latter case, but if they were as they had been stated, he had no hesitation in condemning the conduct of that priest. But, not to mention that here also the accused had been acquitted, he must ask what this had to do with the Catholic Association? When the rt. hon. gent. opened his case to the House, he began to think that he intended to bring home to the Association, the charge of having procured the illegal convictions of persons whom they had assisted to prosecute. But, so far from his having done so, he had selected, in support of his charge, cases in which acquittal had been the result, not conviction; and where justice, by his own showing, had prevailed. The rt. hon. gent. had laid great stress upon the paper which had been put forth by the Association. For his own part, abating some of those expressions, which Irishmen were in the habit of using, he thought there was nothing in that paper which existing circumstances would not only excuse, but justify. After recommending the Catholics to cease from outrage, they reminded them that wherever offences should be committed by Whiteboys or Ribbonmen, innocent persons might be convicted, and suffer punishment for crimes which they had never committed. If they had said that innocent persons had been convicted, this might have had the effect of inflaming the minds of the people to whom the proclamation was adopted; but in the way in which it was put, nothing more was said, than what was very likely to happen. The Association went on to conjure the people to keep the peace, "by the hate they bore to Orangemen." If they had said, "We conjure you to hate Orangemen," then, he agreed, no terms of reprobation would be too strong for it; but the exhortation was to peace, not to war. Even if he could take the phrase in the exaggerated sense which had been applied to it, he could not therefore concur in legislating against the principle upon which the Association existed, and punishing the Catholics of Ireland, for one objectionable phrase. With regard to political associations; every body was familiar with the result of that Convention which was organized by the late Mr. Grattan, and which gave to Ireland the advantages of a free commerce. So long as the Convention adhered to the principles on which it was established, it continued powerful and successful.

The moment it departed from those principles, it was destroyed. So with this Association; whilst they adhere to just and reasonable principles, they will endure, and no longer. The rt. hon. gent. had asserted that the rent was collected by compulsion. If it were really so, then it must be nearly at an end; for no compulsion could be exerted for any long period. If it were really so, the more reason for letting the Association alone; a natural or violent death must shortly await it. If it were not so, this Bill would make it ten times stronger, and would unite all the various parties who were interested in the Catholic claims. Before the announcement of this measure, it was a problem whether the Association would be able to subsist, and obtain the confidence of the Catholics. The Bill had removed all doubts, and had raised the leaders of that body at once into eminence. Should the Bill be carried, it would infuse a greater steadiness and zeal, with a clearer sense of the necessity of attaining their object, into the minds of the whole Catholic population of Ireland. It had been said that this Association would throw the question of Emancipation further back. He was not dismayed by the assertion. The truth would make its way when the divisions would have been forgotten. Whenever that question came on, he would speak that which he knew to be truth, in the firm conviction that sooner or later it would sink into the minds of the intelligent public of England. If Emancipation had been granted at the union, it might have been conceded on much easier terms to its enemies, than it could be now, and every succeeding year must increase the disadvantages to those who would withhold it. But of all years that could be selected, the year 1825 was the most propitious, on account of the happy results which must follow such a measure now. Capital would be let loose by it from this country, and cover Ireland with prosperity; and he was not certain that the question might not be carried in the year 1825, and that in an unexpected manner (hear, hear). He should not be surprised at hearing some Orange member propose the emancipation of the Catholics, on condition of abolishing the forty-shilling freeholds; and thus afford a proof of that opinion, that the real ground of opposition to Catholic Emancipation is Protestant monopoly (hear, hear). With regard to Lord Wellesley's policy, he conceived it had totally failed (hear, hear). Lord Wellesley's known opinions had the effect of placing him in a delicate and difficult situation; but he wished to see him have fair play, and that he should neither be embarrassed by the Orangemen, nor made their instrument. His lordship's government had been represented as absolutely perfect. Now since the house was called upon to pass a bill which admitted that the state of Ireland was such, that the Government required extraordinary powers, it was plain that Lord Wellesley had failed; and he was convinced that every system must fail until Emancipation should be granted (hear, hear). Feeling that justice had not been and never could be done to the people of Ireland, and that all other measures would be hopeless, till Catholic Emancipation were conceded, he, for one, would resist to the utmost of his ability the proposition of the rt. hon. gent. (loud cheering).

Sir H. Parnell said that among the numerous charges against the Catholic Association, the rt. hon. Sec. for Foreign Affairs had stated that there was no identification between that body and the Irish Catholics. He had denied it, in the name of the Catholics themselves. But the rt. hon. gent. (Mr. Goulburn) had taken great pains to show that the whole Catholic nobility, clergy and laity, were united with that body in feeling and opinion; thereby taking away the whole and only grounds upon which his rt. hon. colleague rested all his charges against them, on the first day of the session. It was true this last assertion had been qualified by a declaration that the nobility had pandered to the power and popularity of the Association; that, however, was sufficiently contradicted by Lord Gormanstown's letter, by the excellent letter of Lord Kenmare, and the declarations of Lord Killeen, the representative of the whole Catholic nobility, as president of the Catholic Association; all of which expressed a deliberate and voluntary approval of the conduct of that body. As to the legal proceedings of the Association, he was surprised that the heavy charges of the rt. hon. gent. should have ended in two cases, in both of which he completely failed to substantiate his allegations. He must relate some cases in his turn. He would begin with the first in which the Association was concerned. A quarrel between a Protestant and a Catholic was to be settled by a boxing match. The parties and their friends met; but the Protestants being provided with fire-arms, fired on the Catholics, killed one man, and wounded others. Notwithstanding this outrage, the magistrates refused to act. The whole business was on the point of being passed quietly over, like hundreds of similar cases, when the Association sent down an agent and a barrister to inquire into the transaction. The prisoners having been put upon their trials, the jury found a verdict of manslaughter; whereupon the judge assured the prisoners that they owed their lives entirely to the lenity of the jury. Another case in which counsel had been employed by the Association, was one relating to the misconduct of an officer of the police. This had excited much attention, as it was supposed to be a direct attack on the Government; yet the case was completely made out against the constable, and he was subsequently dismissed from his office. A third case occurred in the county of Cavan, in which there had been a riot and assault between an Orangeman and some Catholics. On that occasion a Catholic Counsel was sent down by the Association, and certainly nothing could be more decorous and proper than the manner in which that gentleman had conducted himself throughout the trial; there were no allusions on his part either to religious or political feelings,—he simply went through the business of the day. A verdict passed in favour of the Catholics against the Orangeman, a circumstance scarcely to be met with throughout the annals of Ireland. He knew the details of a fourth case, in which all the circumstances—the conduct of magistrates and jurors, and the state of party feeling in the county, fully justified the interference of the Association. Nothing could be more oppressive than the conduct of many justices of the peace in Ireland; and as far as the Association had lent their aid to bring delinquent magistrates to account, all reasonable men approved their efforts. As to the Catholic rent, if the money were subscribed for indefinite or unknown purposes, he, as well as others, should have been inclined to suspicion; all suspicion, however, was removed by the regular accounts of the funds, and the appointment of comptrollers. No order had been sent by the Association, as the rt. hon. gent. had stated, for its collection by the Catholic clergy; they had only forwarded a request that voluntary meetings should be held in the parishes; but in no one instance that he was acquainted with, had either the collector or the treasurer been clergymen. A Catholic bishop had observed to him, that the Protestants were alarmed at the rent. It was not, he said, their object to raise a large sum otherwise than to contradict Lord Liverpool's assertion, that the Catholics of Ireland were indifferent to the question of emancipation. The rt. hon. gent. had referred to the Convention Act, and had rested the foundation of his measure on the policy of preventing delegation. But the principle of preventing delegation was not the principle which the Legislature had acted upon in 1793. The principle on which it acted at that period, was that of checking the progress of revolutionary principles. The members of the Association of United Irishmen were Protestants; their object was not Catholic Emancipation, but Reform in Parliament, and if they shewed a disposition to the cause of Emancipation, it was for the purpose of procuring the co-operation of the Catholics. He thought the principle of delegation a constitutional principle. The Catholic delegates were presented to his late Majesty by Mr. Dundas, and were graciously received. The opinion of Burke was favourable to the principle of delegation; it was scarcely possible to open any part of his works relative to Ireland without finding something relevant to that subject. He spoke of the impolicy of putting down opinion by force, and declared that it gave him no pleasure to hear of the dissolution of the body of Catholic Delegates. Mr. Grattan expressed similar opinions. He would put it to the House, whether, after having agreed in 1821 to repeal the penal laws affecting Ireland, they could now consistently pass this Bill against the Catholic Association? That Association was conducted by men of great talents; it had excited general attention to the Catholic claims, and had produced an unanimous feeling even in this country in favour of Emancipation. It seemed to him that Mr. O'Connell had listened to the advice both of his Catholic and Protestant friends, and when they considered the attacks made upon him by the Orange press, he seemed to have behaved with great discretion and moderation. The rt. hon. gent. had said that the measure was to be only temporary. Did he mean to say, that when this Bill passed, the country should hear no more on the subject? Let the house recollect what had already happened in Ireland. The penal code had for a long time enfeebled the Catholic mind; but there now existed amongst the people a more accurate notion of their condition. The conduct of the opposite party tended also to excite this feeling; he would mention that Dr. Magee's celebrated charge had produced an effect on the minds of the Catholic clergy not to be described. The rapid circulation of Bibles, and the lengths to which the spirit of proselytism was carried, convinced the Catholics that an intention was entertained of rooting out their religion. These circumstances, followed up by this measure, would show the Irish Catholics what they had to expect from Government. Let the house bear in mind, that the union between the two countries, in the present state of the public mind, was a union only upon paper. Looking to what had passed before, on similar occasions, he should not do his duty as an Irish representative if he did not warn the house of the danger of this measure. He implored the house to consider the effects which this Bill must produce. How would the people bear it, and what was their numerical strength? In 1765, the population of Ireland was two millions. In 1795, it was four millions, and in the present year he did not overrate it at eight millions. What would be the situation of the empire, with a population of eight millions, the greater portion discontented and irritated? If a measure of this character were persisted in, he feared that in a short period the whole country would be in a state bordering upon insurrection (hear, hear).*

Mr. L. Foster took that opportunity of expressing what he thought of the Catholic Association, now exercising all the functions of a Parliament in Ireland. They had avoided the form, but secured all the reality of representation. To the business of a Parliament they superadded the functions of the executive power, which were so wisely separated in the British constitution. They set apart one day in every week for open discussion, but the application of their immense pecuniary resources were settled by committees whose proceedings were secret, whose debates were not reported, and who were in communication with large bodies of men in several parts of Ireland. One of their most important functions was levying money, under the name of rent. In many parts the people said that they had already rent enough to pay, and did not want any addition. But when it was recommended and enforced by their own clergymen—when its objects were described and enlarged upon, the effect was different. What was at first unwilling and involuntary, became afterwards not only voluntary, but highly desirable (hear, hear). The resources of the Association became thus strengthened and extended from week to week. Confidence was excited by the increase of the rent, and in proportion as the confidence of the Catholics seemed to increase, so did the apprehensions of the Protestants in the same undue degree. The effect was immediate disunion between the religious persuasions. The moment rent was collected in a district, adieu to all good feeling in that neighbourhood (hear, hear)! The House had heard of Orange Societies; it was well understood that these societies were chiefly confined to the north of Ireland. In the south they were little known; but the peasant who got access to the speeches of the Catholic Association, in which the name of Orangeman was applied, not only to members of the Establishment, but to the whole Protestant people, was led to cherish hostile feelings against all but his own sect. Was it right that an assembly should be suffered to represent the Protestants of Ireland as hostile to their Catholic countrymen? The effect of this conduct was to sow disunion amongst all parties, and fill the country with alarm. In a few days after the address of the Association was published, a rumour was spread that some personal mischief was intended on a particular day against the Protestants; and to such an extent did this belief prevail, that in several districts the whole male Protestant population remained up on the night in question, with arms in their hands loaded. This was particularly the case in Cloyne. Suppose that on the night in question, a cottage had accidentally got on fire—Might not a whole county have been involved in bloodshed by what these people would have considered as a retaliation for a supposed attack upon themselves? The expectation in which the rent was subscribed was, that some great spiritual advantage to their church would ensue. The success of the Catholic question would never satisfy this feeling. It was this which produced the readiness to contribute, and that extensive confidence in those who were trusted with the money. The Catholic clergy of Ireland were paid by voluntary contributions amounting to not less than 200,000*l.* a year. It was by applying to the contributors of this fund, at the same time, and by the same persons, that the Catholic rent was collected. How easy was it at such time, and for such persons, to suggest an addition of 25 per cent. to the usual contributions, and what a sum would it place (50,000*l.* a year) at the disposal of the Association? He said thus much of the effect of the Association upon the peasantry. With respect to the upper classes, there appeared in the Association a bold spirit of penetration into the affairs of private life, which, in matters of public discussion, were usually spared, save only in periods of revolution. The gentleman who was believed to be hostile to them, was held up to odium in all his public and private relations. His conduct, whether as father to son, as landlord to tenant, as neighbour to neighbour, or as host to guest, was exposed in its least favourable light, and he was publicly upbraided with speeches or actions which had passed in the privacy of domestic life. This was a practice not sparingly resorted to by some members of the Association. Was it necessary to point out the injurious effects of such a system? They must be evident at a glance;—but they were not its only evils. Another effect of the Association was, the power which it assumed with respect to elections. Was it fitting that a body with 50,000*l.* a year at its command, with all the influence of religion at its back, and with such means of annoyance as it possessed through the press, should name those who should, and denounce those who should not be returned as Members of Parliament? It was said that the Association contributed materially to the present tranquillity of Ireland. He granted it; but the tranquillity was contingent upon the granting of what they sought. In the interim, there would be silence—a silence of breathless expectation (hear, hear! from the Opposition). Ireland, however, possessed better guarantees for her internal tranquillity. It was unnecessary to go into details, but in defiance of Captain Rock, British capital was daily infusing itself into that country, and the good effects of it were felt in every part of the island. It was only lately that many restrictions upon the trade of Ireland were removed. With their removal her resources increased. Formerly, she was not allowed to export cotton. In 1822, the first year after the removal of that restriction, she exported 17,000 yards. In 1823, she exported 2,700,000; and in 1824, more than 6,000,000 yards. The linen-trade was spreading its benefits over the southern and western parts of the island. Since the removal of the restrictions upon the export of Irish spirits, there had been an extraordinary increase in the distilleries. In a word, there never was a period when British capital was so generally employed in that country. As to the past disturbances, the troubles of 1822 were, in fact, consequent upon the famine of 1821; so that they could furnish no argument against the generally improved condition of the country, arising from permanent sources. Another source of tranquillity was the excellent system upon which the police was now established. But a main cause was the tithes' commutation law, from which the greatest benefits had resulted. He was not indisposed to give the Catholic Association credit for having been instrumental in this tranquillity; but he must add, that it was the only power in that kingdom which was capable of interrupting the tranquillity which it had partly caused. If their power were allowed to go on, the peace of Ireland would be in the hands of the Catholic Association. A duplicate parliament was a favourite scheme with the Irish. In 1782, the volunteer association summoned a convention at Dungannon. Those who returned representatives to that assembly were among the most intelligent of the Irish population, who, with muskets in their hands, exercised this elective franchise. The parties returned were their colonels and officers, and merchants and men of substance; and they spoke of their House of Commons as if it were an assembly of venal and profligate members, who were bartering their votes, and selling their country (loud cheers from the Opposition). In 1793 a convention was again summoned at Athlone, and in 1810 the Catholic Board was set up. All these assemblies had been reduced by the exertion of a proper firmness on the part of Government, and he thought the same means must be now employed, to preserve tranquillity in Ireland, and to prevent any bad influence from impeding her advancing prosperity.

Mr. J. Williams was convinced that there had never been a question of such vital importance to the Irish people, and indeed to the whole empire, as this. It was unnecessary to wait for the development of the measure proposed; it was enough for him to know that the principle was vicious, and that no sort of qualification could make amends for this defect in the bill. As he anticipated no good from the old system of Acts of Parliament on one side, to meet violence offered on the other; as he expected no good from any thing but a removal of the causes of complaint; and as he had heard nothing that afforded a prospect of composing and conciliating Ireland; he felt it necessary to oppose the bill in its very first stage. Upon what principle did the rt. hon. gent. proceed? For, admitting the violent excesses imputed to this Association—to what did all the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite tend? Where did the excesses of the Catholics, supposing them to have been committed, arise? Was there nothing to account for them in the severity of disappointment? Had no expectations been held out? Had the House of Commons never encouraged them by the result of its own votes to expect the boon they asked for? Was the grant of that boon never held out to them, even in the Cabinet—or had no portion of his Majesty's ministers encouraged their hopes? Was it to be expected that men would, without a murmur, abide the cruel disappointment of those hopes, when that which was withheld from them had been, as it were, within their grasp; and when they who had once been their best friends turned round upon them, in a manner somewhat equivocal, he must say—appealing to a tumultuary feeling in the country, the existence of which he strenuously denied (hear, hear), but which the house might at any time put down, without resorting to measures of so dangerous a kind as that which was now proposed. He could illustrate this, and would embellish his speech by higher authority than any reasoning which he could bring to the subject. In a discussion in 1813, when misconduct had been imputed to the Catholics,—when “particular circumstances” existed—when the Catholics had assumed a threatening attitude—when, in fact, the same state of things was said to exist, as was said to exist now—the rt. hon. person he alluded to (Mr. Plunkett) delivered this sentence:—“Sir, it appears to me most unfair to visit on the Roman Catholics the opinions and the conduct of such assemblies as profess to act for them” (hear! from Mr. Manning). He rejoiced to hear that cheer from the rt. hon. gent.; for he rejoiced in supposing that they should have his powerful support, in addition to the same eloquent authority (hear, hear). The speech went on:—“If they labour under a real and a continued grievance, which justifies, on their part, a continued claim, they must act through the medium of popular assemblies, and must of course be exposed to all the inconveniences which attend discussion in such assemblies. In all such places, we know that unbounded applause attends the man who occupies the extreme positions of opinion, and that the extravagance of his expression will not diminish it. In such an assembly, there may be many individuals anxious to promote their own consequence, at the expense of the party whose interests they profess to advocate; and amongst those who are sincere in the cause, much may be attributed to the effects of disappointed hope, much to the resentment excited and justified by insolent and virulent opposition. But I should unworthily shrink from my duty, if I were not to avow my opinion, that the unfortunate state of the public mind in Ireland is, above all things, imputable to the conduct of the Government” (loud cheering). Now this blameable conduct of Government was, the holding out hopes not meant to be realized; affecting to advocate Emancipation, and proving their sincerity, from time to time, by majorities in that house, and at the same time not carrying the measure distinctly to its end; then, when some opportunity had been offered by the resentment of the parties who were smarting under the delay of justice, severely visiting them for their irritation. To be hesitating and divided upon such a question—to excite expectations from one side of the cabinet and to taunt them from the other, was neither more nor less than to deceive by holding out delusive hopes, and to trifle with the feelings of the people. In the extract he was about to read, the house would recognize the Attorney General for Ireland:—“Sir, I must say that the country has not been fairly dealt with. It is the bounden duty of the Government to make up their minds, and to act a consistent part. If this measure be inadmissible, expectation should be put down; if, on the other hand, this claim may be acted on, it should be honestly forwarded. But how can any honest mind be reconciled to the ambiguity in which the cabinet has concealed itself from public view on this great national question; or with what justice can they complain of the madness which grows out of this fever of their own creating? This is no subject of compromise. Either the claim is forbidden by some imperious principle too sacred to be tampered with, or it is enjoined by a law of reason and justice, which it is oppression to resist. That a measure of vital importance should be suffered to drift along the tide of parliamentary or popular opinion, seems difficult to understand—that Government should be mere spectators of such a process is novel; but, when it is known that they have all considered it deeply, and formed their opinions in direct opposition to each other, that after this, they should consult in the same cabinet, and sit on the same bench, professing a decided opinion in point of theory, and a strict neutrality in point of practice—some holding out an ambiguous hope, others announcing a never-ending despair—I ask, is this a state in which the Government of the country has a right to leave it? (loud cheers)? If he were called upon to answer this grave question, he should answer, No. He should say, that to waste time in dividing and cavilling would be to surrender the best interests of the country. As long as this hesitation prevailed, what was to be expected in Ireland but that fever, that heart-burning to which the rt. hon. gent. had alluded? Did ministers imagine that if they could succeed in putting down the Association, they would put down all other organs of complaint? No—let it not be supposed, that this bill would be effectual in Ireland. To give it effect, force must be employed; and upon this principle, the proposed enlargement of our army was intelligible enough (hear, hear). In regard to the Irish associations alluded to by the hon. gent. who spoke last, he contended that that hon. gent. had failed to draw the obvious conclusion which his premises supplied—that every act of favour or justice had been followed by tranquillity and obedience. Let them receive justice. To the old nostrum of these legislative enactments he was decidedly adverse; the true remedy was justice to the Catholics. Government have begun at the wrong end, and must retrace their steps, instead of persevering in the system of penal laws. To attain the benefits they proposed, it was necessary to do justice and right to all ranks: this was the only mode, especially under the reign of a monarch who had shown in another kingdom how friendly he was, when not trammelled by the influence of his ministers, to measures of a wise, enlightened and beneficent policy (cheering).

Mr. Peel rose to state a few of those grave considerations by which his vote would be directed. He would first notice an argument of a learned member who had said that he would not vindicate the acts of the Association, and could not stand forward as their advocate, but still he conceived that these people laboured under such a grievance as took from the House all right of interference with their proceedings. Now he maintained, that from the moment they recognized such a doctrine, they would abdicate their legislative functions altogether. It seemed necessary to touch on this argument before he proceeded to any other; for if the principle were once accepted, where was the end of its application? Where were these associations to terminate? There were many persons who considered the representation of this country so defective, that the people had no voice in the choice of the legislators. That, if it were true, would be a grievance of a heavy kind, and would call for an association for obtaining parliamentary reform (cheers). He hoped they would observe the extent of the principle: it would warrant an association for the redress of every separate grievance complained of by any class of persons, and Parliament must not interfere; for the subjects, and not the Government of the country, were judges of the grievance and its remedy. That was not his reading of the law. On subjects of grievance, the Parliament of England was the sole constitutional judge (hear, hear). Those who might think themselves aggrieved would have a right to their constitutional remedy by petition; and their petitions would be considered; but they must not act independently of Parliament. He should, therefore, unhesitatingly call for the interference of Parliament, if it could be shown that the proceedings of this Association were at variance with the constitution. This he would consider, in the first place, as a body interfering with the administration of justice. He should here follow the example of the learned gent. and quote the opinions of eminent men which applied to the present subject. He would refer to certain doctrines that had been mooted with respect to a confederacy which was formed about three years ago, and which called itself "The Constitutional Association;" but which, by those, who in that house were the advocates for decency and decorum, both in act and language, was termed the "Bridge-street Gang" (a laugh). Although he had never patronised that society, he saw a marked distinction between that and the Catholic Association; and that every argument which had been brought forward against the former, was applicable with tenfold force to the latter. But intending to follow the learned gent.'s example, and to embellish his speech with authorities (a laugh), he should now begin by quoting, with respect to such Associations, the words of one whose name was dear to every friend of liberty, and one that he mentioned with that respect which was due to his private character and public consistency, although he differed from almost the whole tenor of his public life—he meant Mr. Whitbread (hear, hear). "He did not pretend to any deep knowledge of the law, but he would contend that the association was formed against the common law of the land, and in opposition to the Act of Maintenance. That act was passed to prevent oppression; and he thought that subscribing to prosecute individuals at the suit of the King, came under the description of maintenance, and within the contemplation of the act" (cheers). He did not know whether the Catholic Association were aware of this act or not; but if this doctrine were true, that confederacy came within it. But he would resort to legal authorities, and would first refer the house to a learned civilian (Dr. Lushington), who was reported to have "commented upon the difficulty which persons, if maliciously prosecuted by the Constitutional Association, would have in recovering damages from the society. If counter-associations should be resorted to, nothing but dissension and ill-will would be seen, instead of that peace and quiet to which the country was so anxiously looking." Why, suppose the individual aggrieved were the soldier whose case his rt. hon. friend had represented; would he not be exposed to this difficulty? And, in fact, would not the whole passage apply to the Catholic Association? But to resort to the ornaments of the common law: he would first cite the opinion of the Common Serjeant, that "the great objection to the constitutional and all similar associations was, that they could not exist without becoming a seminary for spies and informers." The case of the soldier who had been proved innocent, not by the verdict of a jury, but by the unanimous decision of a bench of 43 magistrates, differing in religion and politics, proved that the Catholic Association had given rise to a swarm of spies and informers. The learned gent. then went on to say, that "as to the formation of a counter-association, nothing could be more injurious to the administration of public justice than for two parties to be constantly running a race with each other, endeavouring to pour their several friends into the jury-box, and thus to gain a triumph over the law." Now, if all the Catholics of Ireland were subscribers to the Catholic Association, and if other associations were to be formed to counteract its proceedings, there would undoubtedly be a constant endeavour in both parties to pour into the jury-box their several friends, and thus to obtain over the law that triumph which the Common Serjeant had predicted. There were some who would ask him, "How is it that you, who approved of the Constitutional, are now so eager to repress the Catholic Association?" He was sorry to be diverted from the line of argument in which he was proceeding; but a fit opportunity was now offered of pointing out the broad distinction which existed between these two associations. For instance, he thought that the Constitutional Association, supposing a murder to have been committed, would never have published an ex-parte statement of the evidence by which it was to be proved; and sure he was, that they would never have got together a band of spies and informers to prove the commission of a murder which had never been committed (hear, hear). Yet all this had been done under the influence of the Catholic Association (hear, hear): so that there was the widest distinction between the two societies; the one limiting its prosecutions to the case of blasphemous and seditious libels, and the other extending them to the highest offences—the neglect of magistrates to perform their duties, and such crimes as murder. He had made this digression before quoting the opinion of the learned member for Winchester, who had said, that "in his opinion, a man might with perfect consistency approve of other societies, and yet disapprove of that under the notice of the house. The argument drawn from the societies for the prosecution of felons could not apply to the present Association. How was it possible that a man's feelings could be so interested in the case of a theft, as they would be upon a political question? Party feeling would interfere, and even the jury become contaminated with it, by the encouragement of such a society as this. The remedy proposed would be an aggravation of the mischief; for, as had been well observed, it would lead to the pollution of the very fountain of justice." The learned gent. had in these words described the case of the Catholic Association. It prosecuted for offences which, in their nature, were purely political; and, by so doing, tainted the administration of public justice. They took upon themselves legal functions,—they sent agents to the country to prosecute for political offences, and from that moment they tainted the administration of justice (loud cheering). He should now advert to what had fallen from one of the most distinguished ornaments of the Court of King's Bench, who was entitled to have the opinions which he stated in that house, on points of law, viewed with the most profound attention. The learned member (Mr. Scarlett) went further than any of his learned colleagues. He said that "this society usurped the functions of the Attorney-General, and that a set of men arrogating to themselves such a power of prosecuting for political offences, assumed an unconstitutional power, which he considered dangerous, and which he could not easily be persuaded was legal." Having, then, these concurrent opinions from the other side of the house, that an association founded upon such principles, was, if legal, at any rate unconstitutional; that its proceedings were fatal to the impartial administration of justice—seeing that all the arguments which applied to the Constitutional, applied with still greater force to the Catholic Association—had he not gone a great way to prove that the house ought not to reject a remedy for so acknowledged an evil (loud cheers). He must now notice the discussion which took place in the Court of King's Bench, respecting the legality of the Constitutional Association: he need scarcely observe how strongly it bore upon the present question. A prosecution had been instituted by the Constitutional Association against Dolby, for libel. The sheriff, Mr. Garratt, who had been a subscriber to that association, had returned the panel from which the jury were to be chosen. A challenge was made to the array. It was objected to this challenge by the sheriff, that he had withdrawn from the association, and that he had publicly declared so in a letter to its secretary at the time of his being elected sheriff; yet, as he had paid his subscription, the Court held that he was disqualified. In the course of the trial his evidence was rejected on the same ground—that he was not indifferent. The same objection would apply with greater force, if a person in Mr. Garratt's circumstances had been a juror. Now, apply this rule to the Catholic Association. Was not every Catholic who had subscribed one farthing to this Association disqualified from sitting as a juror on any prosecution which it might institute? They had been told that evening that every peasant in Ireland was a member of the Association. If this were so, was not justice likely to be tainted (cheers), when nearly every person qualified to sit upon a jury was disqualified by his own act? Parliament had recently enabled Catholics to act as jurors; and grand jurors; and yet here was an act of their own body, which set them aside as jurors, if they had subscribed to the Catholic rent (loud cheers). Suppose an offence which involved a party question came on for trial, in what a situation would the Court be placed? His rt. hon. friend had detailed two instances, as a specimen of what was now going forward. To show, however, the extent of the nuisance, he would read an extract from one of the latest Irish newspapers, from which it appeared, that at a meeting of the Association on Wednesday last, a gentleman made a report on the case of John Cahir, and the hon. and rev. Augustus Cavendish. This Association had appointed a committee to report upon the conduct of a magistrate, who, if the report were unfavourable, would be put upon his trial at its expense. Not content with this, they had resolved that a memorial should be presented to the Lord Lieutenant on the subject, and that a petition should be presented to Parliament, praying that Mr. Cavendish should be removed, as an unfit person to act as a magistrate. The Association, if its aim were justice, might, at least, have postponed these measures till the conclusion of the judicial inquiry. His knowledge of this transaction was obtained from a letter of the Earl of Donoughmore, which a gentleman who had not opposed the report, had read to the Association. Lord Donoughmore declared, that as governor of the county he had examined the charges against Mr. Cavendish, and had found them groundless; that he had transmitted depositions, taken during the examination, to the Lord Chancellor, who had not only acquitted Mr. Cavendish, but had applauded his conduct on the very grounds intended to criminate him. Now, when such was the opinion of a nobleman who had always been friendly to the Catholics, of the nature of their conduct, was it possible that the gentlemen of Ireland would undertake the duties of the magistracy, if they were to be liable to such attacks in the performance of them? For the vindication of the magistracy—for the maintenance of the laws—for the impartial administration of justice, he called upon the House to apply some remedy to this afflicting evil (loud cheers). He would proceed to call to their recollection the political nature of this body, which had now been in existence for more than a year, under the pretence of preparing a Catholic petition to Parliament. That body imitated, or, he should rather say, travestied the proceedings of that house—a matter of little importance in itself, but which, combined with others, assumed a certain degree of consequence. Its meetings were followed by alarm throughout the country; an alarm which an hon. bart. had attributed to the Bible Societies, and Missionary preachers. The strange notion of the hon. bart. recalled to his mind a fable, in which it was represented that a great pestilence had fallen on the beasts, and that they had an association to inquire into the cause. The lion, the tiger, and the other animals that delighted in blood, all asserted that they could have nothing to do with it; but having discovered that an ass had eaten a thistle on the Sabbath, they agreed that the ass must have been the animal that had called down the anger of Heaven, and sacrificed him to appease its vengeance (laughter). Did the hon. bart. make nothing of that address which had been so often quoted? Could he find nothing in it to excite alarm in the breast of every Protestant, when he found the Catholics adjured to unanimity by their hatred to Orangemen—a phrase which meant all the Protestants of Ireland (cheers). He did not mean to say that this body was expressly organized for the purposes of mischief; but it was calculated to excite suspicion. It had its agents in every parish, and its correspondent in every town. With such machinery, how easily might it be converted into an engine of the greatest mischief? They declared it to be their intention to raise 40 or 50,000*l.* a-year. Of this sum 5000*l.* was to be employed in enlightening the public press of England; 5000*l.* in preparing petitions to Parliament. Then part was to be expended in keeping an agent in England; 5000*l.* in sending priests to North America; and 5000*l.* more for the conversion of their haughty and heretical neighbours in England (laughter and cheers). Then it had its committees of finance, of grievance, and of education! The assumption of such powers was, in his opinion, inconsistent with public liberty. The house was accustomed to admire the popular part of its constitution; but with what checks was it hedged round! They had their freedom of speech from the Crown, which could suspend it at any moment. If the house wished to prosecute an individual, it was done by addressing the Crown. But the Catholic Association was under no control as to its debates; and it instituted its own prosecutions, and even went to create prejudices against the accused by distributing ar-parte statements of the evidence to be produced against him. The consequence of all this must be, the establishment of counter-associations by individuals for their own protection; for if Parliament would not provide them protection, it might be taken as a certain truth, that individuals would very soon provide it for themselves. It appeared therefore to him, both with reference to the political mischief, and the corruption in the administration of justice which this association was calculated to create, that the house was bound to apply the remedy which his rt. hon. friend had proposed (loud cheering).

Mr. Donnan said that he had been so far misled as to suppose that the argument attempted to be drawn from the Constitutional Association had been completely disposed of on a former evening. As, however, it had been again produced, it required to be decisively answered, and if he failed in showing the total dissimilarity of the two associations, he would be content to vote for what he thought a mischievous measure. The rt. hon. gent. had referred to the manner in which he expressed himself three years ago on the Constitutional Association. Did that association meet to repel attacks made on itself, or to complain of the unequal administration of justice among its own members (hear, hear); or to volunteer the office of Attorney-General, and to undertake the prosecution of state-offences (cheering)? They acted as if the Attorney-General were either blind, or negligent, or inadequate to his duty; and thinking themselves very superior persons, when in point of fact, they were very inferior ones, instituted a series of jobs (great cheering), which they called prosecutions against individuals for offences, for which, if they had been guilty, they ought to have been attacked with ar-officio informations (cheers). The Catholic Association, on the contrary, subscribed only to prosecute those who had injured Catholics, and to repel aggressions under which he trusted that no class would ever rest quiet (hear, hear). They were aggrieved by degrading laws and unjust exclusions, and in consequence were treated with a degree of partiality by the magistracy of Ireland which was hardly credible in this country. They had therefore subscribed to repel injury and to organize a system of defence. It was not clear to him that the Catholic Association had ever prosecuted any offences which were in their nature strictly political. There was one particular case, that of the Courier, which had inserted a libel on the Catholic college of Maynooth. He asserted that this—an attack on the College where priests for the whole Catholic body were educated—if it were a libel at all, was a libel on themselves. But the Constitutional Association prosecuted individuals for libels, which but for their interference, would have died a natural death, and which the Attorney-General had acted wisely in leaving in their own obscurity (cheers). Such being the objects of the Constitutional Association, his hon. friend (Sir F. Bardett) had proposed to have the law enforced to put a stop to it, and not to make a law for the purpose. Nothing was so poor as great legal wits exerting their ingenuity to put down every artifice by which their cobweb clauses might be defeated as soon as they were passed (cheers). The rt. hon. gent. had rightly told them, that as the subscribers to the Constitutional Association had been disqualified to act as jurors in any prosecution instituted by it,—so, too, were the subscribers to the Catholic Association. But it was said they knew nothing of the names of the contributors to the Catholic rent: suppose they did—would that enable them to detect prejudiced persons, and disqualify them from sitting on juries, when the whole Catholic population must be held prejudiced, on account of the bitter exclusions to which they were exposed? The Catholic was not disinterested, as between Catholic and Protestant; but why? Not because he paid rent, but because he was oppressed by the Protestant. It had been said, that the Catholic Association had in point of fact fallen within the provisions of the Convention Act, for conducting prosecutions by delegation. If such were the case, the Constitutional Association had infringed the law, for they also had instituted prosecutions by delegation, and yet Government vindicated their proceedings. But with respect to the Constitutional Association, the Chief Justice of the King's Bench had laid it down, that it was competent for any body of men to prosecute offenders as they had done. Then why not for the Catholic Association? How was the distinction to be drawn between such societies as were legal in this sense, and the contrary? Had they not societies for the protection of religious liberty, formed by congregations of Dissenters, who co-operated to protect the law of toleration from being violated, and which, at every assize, were found conducting prosecutions for an obstruction of the right of worship; carrying them on with the greatest moderation and propriety, and raising money for defraying the expenses of such proceedings? They all knew what the Methodists had done, and the money they had raised, when in 1811 and 1812, Lord Shilbourn wanted to qualify the right of preaching in the Methodist congregation; and were the Catholics alone to be denied the privilege of complaint? With reference to the two cases of prosecution instituted by the Catholic Association, he was ready to justify both, from first to last. In the case of the soldier, suppose they had been misled by false information—how was that to have been known before the inquiry. He was acquitted, it was true; did it necessarily follow that he ought not to have been put on his trial (hear, hear)? The other case, that of the supposed murder of the Catholic by the Protestant, had not, he thought, been fairly stated; and there again he would ask, did not satisfaction, and not injury, follow that inquiry? Was not the party acquitted upon the evidence of the prosecutors themselves? The same observation applied to the magistrate's case. Were magistrates to enjoy perpetual impunity? After the recent case in the Court of King's Bench, he hoped not; that case (Mr. Kenrick's) was a salutary lesson. They had been told, that the newspapers in the interest of the Association had blazoned forth the charges before trial, and excited an unjustifiable prejudice against the prisoners. Far be it from him to palliate such misconduct; but if it were true, there were laws enough to punish such injustice without fresh enactments. There was no necessity for this or any other purpose which he had heard stated, to call for a revision of the Convention Act, that consummation of legislative absurdity; an act, in which a clause was inserted to put down all representative bodies, excepting the two Houses of Parliament and Convocation, and certain corporations. Although, why the House of Commons should have been excepted, he could not conceive, as no man could have accused it of representing any part of the people (a laugh). The act deprived the people of the natural vent for their complaints. They then met in secret clubs and cabals, and a political explosion was the consequence. He hoped Parliament would profit by their example, and avoid this precipitate legislation. When the rt. hon. gent. (Mr. Peel) supported this bill for putting down the Catholic Association, did he forget his own letter, in which he had wisely and avowedly recommended the abolition of Orange processions? Why did he take a different course now? Why did he not take those gentle means? Why deprecate legislative interference, with the tremendous Orange Associations, and now call for penalties and coercion against the oppressed? It was time that Parliament should seek for some other remedy for the evils of Ireland, than the augmentation of penal statutes. Why not try the only remedy—Emancipation? Let them not be met by excuses about the unfitness of the time. Was the time less fit now, than it was two or three years ago, when the rt. hon. gent. (Mr. Canning) introduced his bill of relief for Catholic Peers? What right had that rt. hon. gent. to say that the labours of Fox and Grattan had wrought no conviction upon the British mind respecting this measure? Was the proof of his opinion to be found in the increasing votes of Parliament? It was strange that just as the rt. hon. gent. was balancing about a re-union with his old friends in the Cabinet, he usually discovered some alteration in the public mind of England upon the Catholic question. So when he was preparing to embark for India, he discovered that the Catholic question could not be carried, and therefore ought, for the present, to be postponed. But how did the fact support the rt. hon. gent.'s calculation, when in the following April, in a house of 500 members, the Catholics had a majority, which increased in every stage of the bill that then passed the House of Commons? The majority comprised the members for Northumberland, Durham, York, and Middlesex. Looking at the towns as well as the counties, there appeared at least an equal division in favour of the measure. Among these were the members for Newcastle, Durham, York, Lincoln, Nottingham, Derby, and Northampton, to say nothing of the members for Westminster, Middlesex, and Southwark. In London, the members were three to one against the measure, though they had been three to one in its favour in the preceding Parliament; so that the whole estimate was decidedly in favour of the Catholic claims. He admitted that the rotten boroughs had sent forth opponents to the question. He found such among those who represented nobody, except the treasury, the peerage, or their own pockets. He knew, indeed, that the Church, with the exception of its most enlightened members, was opposed to the Catholic claims; and if he looked round, he found them as active in getting up petitions, as the other clergy were represented to be in collecting the Catholic rent (a laugh). He was not surprised at this in the Church, which, as a great chartered body, that had separated from its elder sister, was of course tenacious of its monopoly. How they flung at obnoxious tenets in the religious belief of their opponents! Thus, they had a great objection to its arrogating the power of absolution. Now, where was the great difference, after all, between this branch of the doctrine of the two churches? In the ordination of the Protestant priests nearly the same form of ritual was observed. It was true, this doctrine was capable of being grossly misapplied; and, when it was so, let the abuse be complained of, and not the doctrine. The spirit of Protestantism had greatly mitigated some of its particular tenets, and if persecution were withdrawn from Catholicism, the same result would follow. It was a mockery to treat Christianity in this way, and pick out names as grounds of exclusion, after the fashion of this wretched Convention Act. The Established Church formed a compact extensive body, which presented a dangerous hostility in such a cause; and there was a similar hostility in another high quarter in the state—he meant the Lord Chancellor, an eminent and illustrious man, remarkable for the ability with which he had succeeded in securing to himself for twenty-five years the honours and emoluments of the state—a man who had law in his voice and fortune in his hand, and who, whether he opposed the schemes of liberal feeling at home or abroad, was undoubtedly a formidable opponent. But why was the successful exercise of such power permitted, when justice and the tranquillity of the country required concession and liberality. He was astonished that the rt. hon. Sec. (Mr. Canning) could consent to accommodate his sentiments upon subjects of vital importance to the taste of such a person. But the cause of Emancipation had been betrayed throughout by its official advocates. The Attorney-General for Ireland had introduced the measure with his customary pomp of eloquence, and carried it through that house with his customary power of persuasion. A few months after, that learned gent. slipped into office without the slightest stipulation for the Catholics. The Marquis Wellesley was their firm and steady friend. But no sooner was he appointed, than his Government was neutralized, and deprived of all masculine power (loud laughter) by the addition of a Secretary who was totally opposed to liberality. Another party, the Grenvilles—who had honourably sacrificed office in conjunction with Mr. Fox, rather than give up the Catholic question, had in the end been no more faithful than the rest. They had some time since returned to office, yet nothing had been done for the Catholics.—The learned gent. sat down, after declaring his conviction that this was one of the most unjust, unfounded, and as he believed it would prove, the most destructive measures which had ever been applied in this or any other country (cheers).

Adjourned at a quarter past two o'clock.

FRIDAY, FEB. 11.—The adjourned debate being resumed,

Mr. Grattan said, that justice had not been done to the Catholic Association. All the violent speeches of its members had been quoted, but none of their opponents. When they had heard so much of the press of Dublin and the Catholic clergy on the one side, they ought to be informed of the press of Dublin and the Protestant clergy on the other. The Association had in fact arisen out of the vituperation of the latter party: they were in fact a counter-association for purposes of self-defence, and they ought, at all events, to be heard by counsel before this bill was enacted, which was no less than a declaration of war against the Catholic party; it was an Orange bill, not one framed by the English Cabinet, but hatched by the corporation of Derry (hear, hear). The effect of coercive measures in Ireland had always been to alienate the affection of the Catholics from the state, and to split the community into parties acrimoniously opposed to each other. He knew that many of the plots which were conjured up to disturb the peace of Ireland were the work of spies, who were formed by the present system of police, which partook of the defects universal in the administration of justice in Ireland. He justified the expression, "by the hate you bear to Orangemen," which was naturally provoked by the gross abuse of the Catholics and their priests, who were treated by a large portion of the Dublin press as traitors and demagogues. The rt. hon. Sec. for Ireland knew that such was the language of the Dublin Mail, the Antidote, the Star, and other Irish papers, which while they were prosecuted by one part of the Irish Government, were supported by another.

Capt. Maberly complained of his Majesty's Ministers bringing forward this ruinous measure on the pretext of notoriety, when they were not even themselves agreed as to the facts on which they pretended to found it. The rt. hon. Sec. for Ireland said, that the Association was a virtual representative of the Catholic population. The rt. hon. Sec. for Foreign Affairs contended, on the contrary, that it was not, and maintained that it ought to be put down on that ground. The term virtual representation had no meaning. It was coined in this country at the period of the American Revolution. The Americans were told that they were virtually represented in Parliament. Finding some difficulty in the expression, they cut the knot, and had a Parliament of their own. It was said, that the Catholic Association affected modes of proceeding similar to those of the British parliament. They had a president, undoubtedly, because, without some head, their proceedings could not be conducted; but there the analogy dropped. All their other forms were modelled with a regard to convenience and to the dispatch of business. He had had some experience of the condition of Ireland during the last recess, and he could testify, that in the parts he had visited there reigned the most perfect peace and submissive obedience to the laws. In those parts which had for many years been distinguished for murder and commotion, all was quiet; rents were collected where they had never been collected before; leases were eagerly sought—an unfailing proof of returning order, since, in times of disturbance, the peasantry chose to trust to the chapter of accidents rather than burden themselves with the obligations of a lease. He gave ministers due credit for their measures; much good had arisen from the tithe commutation and the insurrection act, and a great deal more from the police act. But it was not to ministerial policy that the tranquillity of Ireland could be attributed. Ireland was improving, because she was more prosperous; the condition of the people was rising, and their morals rose with it. Agriculture, which was the basis of their wealth, was rising in prices, and English capital was rapidly flowing into Irish commerce. Some causes of irritation remained which had not been noticed. He particularly alluded to the Bible Societies—those crusades, as he might venture to call them, against the settled sentiments of morals and religion which prevailed among the Irish. He had tracked their course through the counties, and he had observed agitations and tumult to be their uniform effect. With education on their lips, proselytism was the object hidden in the hearts of the Bible Missionaries, and they refrained from no measures, however detrimental to the public peace, to effect it. With the permission of the house he would read a few passages from their own account of a meeting of the Carlow Bible Society. There was a strong disposition to theological controversy between the Protestant and Catholic clergy, and at this meeting three sufficient champions were appointed on each side, to try what was deemed to be one of the chief questions between them. But he would proceed:—

“Mr. M’Sweeney:—I choose to personate a Socinian: how will you convince me, on your own principles, of the divinity of the Saviour. Novus Pater est major me—my father is greater than I. How do you explain that?”

Mr. Pope:—By fair legitimate reasoning. If the Redeemer be declared God in very many passages, as I have shown this morning that he is, then we must look for some explanation of the passages that will not militate against them. I inquire, ‘Is there any sense in which the Saviour was inferior to the Father, without compromising his essential divinity?’ The answer is obvious—in his mediatorial office, and in his human nature. This, then, is the explanation I would give: Christ, while one with the Father, and equal to him in his Godhead, is inferior to the Father in his mediatorial capacity, and in his manhood.

Mr. M’Sweeney:—That will not do, Sir; you have proved nothing—you have given an explanation that may satisfy yourself of there being nothing in the passage inconsistent with the equality of Christ with the Father, considered as to his divine nature.

Mr. Pope:—I don’t know what the gentleman means by ‘proving nothing.’

Mr. M’Sweeney:—‘The Father is greater than I.’ You have not, Sir, explained this text so as to satisfy a Socinian, though you spoke for three hours and a half, and during your speech you wandered considerably from the subject” (laughter).

“Mr. Pope:—I certainly did speak for a long period, but I deny that I wandered from the subject (loud cries of “answer the question now”).

Mr. Daly:—Mr. Pope has answered the question, and I appeal to you all if this is not fair play. Should not he answer the question now? You are all honest Irish fellows, and I am sure like fair play.

Mr. M’Sweeney:—I will refer to the Chairman, whether you have answered the question or not.

Colonel Rochfort:—I must decline pronouncing an opinion on the subject (bravo, and loud cheers).

A gentleman noticing the disposition to riot, proposed to adjourn the meeting. The scene of tumult which followed this proposition lasted for several minutes. The Chairman endeavoured to calm the meeting. The Rev. Mr. Shaw endeavoured to address them; but it was impossible to catch a word from him. It appeared to be the intention of the mob, not only to prevent the rev. gent. from being heard, but to proceed to acts of violence towards the Protestant clergy on the platform. The temporary barriers were thrown down, several of the candles extinguished, and a scene of riot and confusion took place; at once disgusting and disgraceful. The doors of the chapel had been closed, and the violent knockings and yells of those without contributed not a little to the horror of the scene. The officer commanding the police, intimated to the clergy of the Established Church, that he could not answer for their lives, unless they immediately retired. The Rev. Messrs. Wingfield, Daly, Pope, and Jameson, were obliged to scale a wall eight feet high, and escaped the attacks and insults of an infuriate rabble.

Mr. Clowry asked if the meeting was adjourned, and for what period.

Chairman.—The meeting is adjourned sine die.

Mr. Clowry.—Then I am quite satisfied for the present (loud and triumphant cheers).

The Rev. Mr. O’Connell then ascended the pulpit, and gave thanks to God for the triumph which had been achieved, and also to Col. Rochfort for the manner in which he had contributed to it” (loud laughter from all sides of the house).

This was a specimen of the effects produced by the efforts of those gentlemen who went over to Ireland for the purpose of educating and giving religious instruction to the Catholics or Ireland. Since the institution of the Association, however, these heats and animosities were given up by the Catholic clergy. They trusted their political interests to that body, and hence their readiness in contributing to the rent. He could assure the house, on his own experience, of the entire confidence of the Catholics in the Association. Should this measure, therefore, pass into a law, all hopes of obtaining redress by constitutional means would be at an end, and no man could answer for the extent or mischief of the consequences.

Sir N. Colthurst, after observing that the Catholic Association was at variance with the laws and the constitution, said that he had been told of a person of great respectability, who had set his face against the collection of the Catholic rest upon his estate, having received the following letter from the priest of the parish:—"Dear Sir,—A report is current here, that you have interfered to prevent your tenants from contributing to the Catholic rent. May I, in the most respectful manner possible (loud cheers from the Opposition) request that you will give me leave to contradict, in the most positive way, a report so unworthy of you, as I am obliged, in the course of a few days, to render an account of those persons who are opposed to the collection of the rent" (renewed cheers from the Opposition). He could not but view such proceedings with alarm, and he trusted in the wisdom of Government, which had done so much of late for the peace and welfare of Ireland, to put down the Association.

Col. Davies, upon mature deliberation, could make out no case of such exigency as would justify the passing of this bill; and without that exigency the house would not be justified in passing it. It was fallacious, to say that this measure was levelled equally against the Orange Societies as against the Catholic Association. The Orange Societies were held together by ties much stronger than their hatred to Catholics; and the power they found themselves in possession of was a much firmer bond of union than any oaths by which they might bind themselves. If it were really the intention of the legislature to put down that society, and the spirit of party of which it was the main cause, the ready and the only means of effecting that intention would be, to close all those offices to which the Catholics were by law ineligible, against Orangemen also, and to make the tests of eligibility to all candidates for any office, that they should belong to no secret societies, either of one sect or the other. He was not the advocate of the Catholic Association, but he must say he thought it was too hard to treat the debates of that body with the severity which had been applied to them, and to scan with such unusual rigour the expressions which had been used by the natives of a country not famous for that cautious prudence which distinguished other parts of the kingdom. The calculation which had been made of the amount of the rent, which the rt. hon. gent. (Mr. Peel) had represented as 50,000*l.* a year, was extravagantly exaggerated. The fact was, that the rent was dying a natural death when the Government announced its intention of checking its future progress. The consequence was, that the next weekly collection was double the amount of that preceding this announcement. He had been informed, by a friend of his, that not one shilling had been contributed to the rent in his immediate neighbourhood, nor in the greater part of the same county. He was satisfied that the only object of the people who contributed to this fund was to ensure that fair administration of law, which had been heretofore in so many instances denied to them. It was too notoriously true, that in Ireland there was one law for the rich and another for the poor; and he was persuaded, that if the Catholic peasant could be convinced that justice would be meted out to him with impartiality, he would refuse to part with any portion of his miserable pittance to swell the amount of this rent. Another cause of discontent was the small number of Catholics in public employment. Of two thousand offices in Ireland to which they were eligible, they only held one hundred; in other words, the proportion was twenty to one, instead of being, as with reference to the preponderance of the Catholic population in point of numbers it ought to be, directly the reverse. Could we be surprised that the people of Ireland should feel a soreness at such treatment, or that they should express their feelings in somewhat unguarded language? To illustrate the manner in which justice was administered in Ireland, he would observe that a young man, who had been out shooting, happened on his return to pass the farm-yard of a Catholic in which there was a dog. For some cause or other this person shot the dog; and when the son of the farmer came out to remonstrate, he shot him also. The father then came out, and seeing his son lying dead before him, addressed the perpetrator of the crime in no very measured terms, upon which he was shot too (a laugh). For this, the person who had committed the outrage was tried and acquitted. He would add, that this story had been published repeatedly, without being contradicted. The hon. member concluded by expressing his determination to oppose the measure before the house.

Mr. Doherty had more than once heard it said that the Catholics of Ireland had never had so great an enemy as the Association; and the two speeches which he had last heard convinced him of the truth of that opinion. The gallant colonel who had just sat down, had invariably opposed the Catholic claims, and yet was found on the present occasion, supporting the Catholic Association. The hon. bart. (Sir N. Colthurst) had invariably supported the Catholic claims, and now came forward, to vote for putting down the Catholic Association (hear, hear). Could any doubt remain after those speeches, as to the light in which the Association was held by the friends and the enemies of the Catholic claims? To those claims he was decidedly friendly; but he must also avow, that in his opinion the Catholic Association was irreconcilable with the spirit of the constitution. The alarm which that Association had created in Ireland was deep, general, and, in his mind, just. It pervaded the whole Protestant body, and was not only felt by Orangemen, and those who opposed the Catholics, but by every sober, rational man. Any man acquainted with Ireland must know, that one of the greatest evils which had in late times beset that country, had been the existence of delegated bodies. In England, they had riotous mob-meetings; and the laws in each country were pointed against the evils peculiar to each. The Act of Charles II. was framed for the suppression of mobs in England, while laws had been passed in Ireland for putting down illegal associations. Of all the assemblies which had ever been seen in Ireland, none had yet gone the length of the Catholic Association (hear, hear). He had read the debates of the Association in the papers, which were considered its organs, and he must say, that their tendency was to excite discontent, and the plain intention of the assembly was to frighten Government into a compliance with their demands; not by argument, but by intimidation (hear, hear). Such an assembly would not be tolerated in England for one week; and if it would be dangerous in England, he begged leave to ask whether it would not be obviously far more dangerous in Ireland (hear, hear). The declarations of the assembly were addressed to what they well knew to be the state of the people, and to that incapacity which they sedulously endeavoured to promote. One of their orators (Mr. Shiel) had declared, "that there was in Ireland an immense mass of population uniformly acting under the influence of passion, rather than of reason; men who have injuries to revenge; who are bound to the soil by no tie, cheered by no solace, and who have nothing but animal instinct to attach them to existence; who mount the scaffold with alacrity, and leap from it with a bound!" Such was their avowed language, and such the state of things on which they founded their hopes. He proceeded to say, that frequent allusions had been made to the partial administration of justice in Ireland. Now, he would say, and the experience of some years entitled him to say it, that the Catholics of Ireland enjoyed the fullest and fairest administration of justice. He affirmed, without fear of contradiction from any Irish member, that the courts of justice were equally open to the rich and the poor, without distinction of religious sentiments (hear, hear). Two years ago, a petition on the mal-administration of justice in Ireland, had been intrusted to the member for Winchelsea (Mr. Brougham). Upon that occasion the learned member said, that he was sent into the house briefless, and without a fact to sustain the charges. That his own statement might not deserve that character, he would proceed from assertion to proof. The minutes of the evidence given before the Committee appointed for inquiring into the state of Ireland, had been laid on the table of the house, and would in a few days be in the hands of the members. From this evidence he should state some points. In the first place, Mr. Blackburn, a gentleman of many years' experience, and who enjoyed a high character for intelligence and uprightness (hear, hear), had been examined. He was asked what was his opinion as to the administration of justice in Ireland. He answered, that he believed it was purely administered. The next witness was Mr. Bennet, who had been a King's counsel for 18 years, and whose experience was very extensive. He coincided entirely with Mr. Blackburn. The third witness was Mr. Justice Day. He was asked whether he believed that the people had as much confidence in the administration of justice in Ireland, as in this country—and this question was explained as not referring to the superior courts of justice, but to the local administrations, and to the juries of which they were composed. He answered, "that in his opinion justice was everywhere fairly administered in Ireland. On the circuits before him, the juries were fairly composed of Catholics and Protestants, in equal proportions. The grand juries generally contained a majority of Protestants, because the Catholic gentlemen who were eligible to serve, bore only a small proportion to the Protestants of the same class." He begged to call the attention of the gallant colonel to the latter fact, as it explained a circumstance to which he had alluded, respecting the small proportion of Catholics who held offices in Ireland. Mr. Justice Day was then asked, whether he thought that Catholics and Protestants acted impartially, and without reference to their religious sentiments. "Oh, Lord!" replied the judge, "in their capacity of jurors, religion never enters into their minds at all" (a laugh); and he further stated, that "he never met with any mixture of religious opinion which had prejudiced the administration of justice." God grant, that after the attempts of the Association to poison the fountains of justice, no future judge might have to say that his experience has led to a different conviction. He was sure that if the administration of justice in Ireland required to be purified, it was not by such means as that Association had recourse to. A case had recently happened within his own experience, which showed the mischievous tendency of the Association. A transaction had taken place which the Association undertook to investigate; and having pronounced it to be a fit subject for an action, proceedings had, in consequence, been commenced. That action, in which the defendant was a Protestant, now stood for trial in one of the most Catholic counties of Ireland, where the proportion of Catholics to Protestants was at least ten to one. It was, therefore, more than probable that the action would be tried by a jury composed of ten Catholics to two Protestants. Let it not, too, be forgotten, that the Association had declared the defendant's conduct unjust and flagrant; and he would ask, after this, and after a Catholic prelate had said, that the Catholic, who was not with the Association, was against his religion and his country, could the jury come unbiassed to the trial? This Association was altogether an abuse. They had announced the object of their assembly to be for the purpose of petitioning; they had sat from February to July, and they had done any thing but petition. They had endeavoured assiduously to inflame the people, they had travestied the forms of this house, they had appointed a committee, had received reports, and had investigated and pronounced upon what they considered to be crimes. All that was wanted to render the parody at once complete and mischievous was, that they should levy taxes—and had they not now done so? They were told that these were voluntary contributions; but they could know little of Ireland who believed that wealth was there so redundant, as to afford any voluntary contribution. It was a tax, and was levied by the most powerful engine that could be brought to bear upon the feelings of the people—the influence of the Catholic church. This Association was in fact a Parliament. If, indeed, they said that they represented the people of Ireland, they would then fall within the provisions of the Convention Act; they said, therefore, that they virtually represented them; that they were not appointed, but adopted by the Catholics; while, in fact, they were for all mischievous purposes as much representatives as if they had been actually appointed. He, for one, would rather, if this Association must exist, that the security of election should be placed round them. The Catholic Committee was appointed in this way; but if that were not permitted, a fortiori, the present association ought not. But it was said, that though the Association could not be defended on legal and constitutional principles, yet they had done something which entitled them to favourable considerations—they had tranquillized Ireland. That Ireland was tranquil he knew; and he likewise knew that the Association existed; but he could not discover any connexion between the two facts (hear, hear). In his opinion, the wise and temperate measures of the illustrious nobleman at the head of the Irish Government had won the country to tranquillity; but suppose that Emancipation should not be granted to the Catholics, would they continue to tranquillize Ireland? If they had the power of pacifying her now, they would then be able and willing to excite domestic troubles. And were the members of that body to be allowed to tell the people of Ireland, that six millions of united men could not be subdued—that they would find in every field a redoubt, in every mount a fortress, and that they would shake off their oppressors like “dew-drops from the lion’s mane?” He, however, entertained such an opinion of the good sense of the Catholics, that he was convinced, if Parliament should decide that the Association was an unconstitutional body, that they would at once submit. He knew that they possessed among them talents and abilities sufficient to enable them to foil the efforts of Parliament for a long time; but he was quite sure they would not attempt to do it. It could not be supposed that the respectable part of the Catholics—such men as Lords Kenmare and Glengall—would lend themselves to any illegal proceedings. It would be recollected that in 1793 the Irish Parliament passed a resolution for suppressing the volunteer associations. In 1793, Mr. Justice Day, who had been one of the volunteers in arms, spoke of that measure in the following terms:—“Providentially this House at last awakened from its torpor, and by a single resolution put down the Convention. The Convention was composed of many excellent men, who were not aware that they were acting illegally; but the moment they were informed of their error, by the resolution of Parliament, they dispersed.” That such might be the conduct of the Catholic Association was his earnest wish, both for the sake of the Catholics themselves, and for the tranquillity of Ireland.

Mr. Dominick Browne said, that whatever alarm the Association had created in this country, it had done more to advance the Catholic cause than any thing which had taken place during the last twenty years. It had been said that the Association was not consonant with the spirit of the constitution; he would not say that it was; but it was more so than the Insurrection Act, the Whiteboy Act, and the 20,000 troops kept up in Ireland (hear, hear). If this country would persist in refusing to grant to the people of Ireland their just rights, he could not feel himself justified in imposing any fresh restriction upon them. If the bill should pass, it would only have the effect of changing the shape of the danger, supposing danger to exist. He did not mean to say that the people of Ireland would be driven to rebellion; he knew, from his own observation, that the Roman Catholics, from the highest down to the meanest, relied upon the justice of Parliament; but disappointment must produce disaffection, and disaffection in Ireland would now be a more serious matter than it was twenty years ago, since which period the people had become richer and better educated. If the system of coercion should be persisted in, Parliament could not stop with a bill for putting down illegal assemblies; they must pass a perpetual Insurrection Act, and maintain an army of 100,000 men. The people of Ireland, at the present moment, were full of hope; and it behoved the Parliament and people of this country, to take care that it should not be disappointed (hear, hear).

Mr. W. Williams remarked, that in his opinion, the chief cause of the present unfortunate condition of Ireland, was the religious animosity which pervaded every portion of society, and entered more or less into every transaction. It was desirable to allay that animosity, and to unite Catholics and Protestants in Christian love; to negative the motion before the house would be considered as a triumph of the Catholics, and so confirm the present irritation. On that ground, he would give his vote for the bringing in the bill, though he would not pledge himself to support it in all his details hereafter.

Mr. R. Martin thought that this bill must fail in its operation, and should therefore oppose it; although he was not disposed to think the Association the less dangerous, because it had tranquillized Ireland. If they could allay the angry billows, they had the power to raise them again. He would suggest that the Catholics had committed a great error in intrusting their petition to the hon. bart. (Sir F. Burdett); because, when the Catholic question was agitated last session, the hon. bart. and ten or twelve other members, walked away, and took no part in the discussion.

Mr. Watts believed that the diseases under which Ireland laboured, required a very different remedy from the present bill. Let the Association be put down, as it might, in name;—in spirit, not a week could elapse before it would be renewed. It was curious to see the policy of England, as regarded religious toleration, so far behind that of many other countries in Europe, her immediate neighbours. The opponents of Catholic Emancipation seemed to be standing still in point of intellect and civilization, while all the rest of the world was advancing. What was the case in Germany—what in Holland and Belgium? The people in those countries, disunited upon every other point, had no religious dissensions; because they had no religious exclusions. The present bill, like its predecessors, would place Ireland in a worse condition than that in which she stood at present.

Mr. C. W. Wynn was far from flattering himself that the measure now proposed, or any other, would tranquillize Ireland, unless accompanied by Emancipation; but he did not therefore agree that because the grand remedy for existing evils in Ireland could not be obtained, the house should sit still supinely, and not apply to these pressing evils, the best remedy which lay within its power. He regretted the conduct of the Association, chiefly for the mischief which it had done to the Catholic cause. But mischievous as the Association had been, they might rely that worse was yet to come. He would not dwell upon the state of exasperation into which such a body would at last provoke itself: let the house look at the effect, in the way of exasperation, which it would produce upon others. The principle upon which the Catholic Association had formed itself once recognized, what was to prevent the formation of counter-associations among the Protestants? And then would such bodies proceed coolly, and with forbearance? Or would they not go on contending from day to day with increasing exasperation—one act of quarrel or violence leading only to another still more outrageous, until, in the end, the whole country became inflamed, and involved in the dispute? In justice—in common sense—the house had no alternative; it must either put down the Catholic Association, or repeal the laws forbidding all other Associations. The laws must be equally operative. He had always been desirous to put down the Orange Associations, not so much from a fear of the mischief which they did in themselves, as from the dread that they would lead to the formation of such bodies as the Catholic Association. In fact, the system of association was one of the great curses of Ireland. Whether it was a Catholic Association, or Peep-of-Day-Boys, Whiteboys, Defenders, Hearts of Oak—no matter the name, so long as such associations existed, prosperity in the country was hopeless. The origin of these societies was differently accounted for;—some said that they proceeded from the feebleness of the law, and the uncertainty of its administration; others that they produced that feebleness and uncertainty themselves. Perhaps it was impossible to say precisely how the fact was. Where the law was weak, and its administration uncertain, men would be driven into associations for the sake of obtaining justice: on the other hand, while such private leagues were in operation, public justice never could be done. This principle was universal. In Scotland for years after the Union, the administration of justice had been most feeble; before a jury of one clan, no man of another could have a fair trial. No longer back than 1756 an instance to this effect had occurred in the trial of one Stuart. The panel had observed, that it was the first time it had been supposed possible that a Stuart could have a fair hearing before a jury of Campbells, with a Campbell (the Duke of Argyll having gone down expressly for the occasion) sitting as the judge. With reference to the present measure, had it been an act peculiarly to put down the Catholic Association, he would never have consented to it—for he would never have consented to any law which was to make a difference between Protestant and Catholic; but he supported the present bill, as one which struck equally at societies on both sides. Hon. gent. said that the measure would be ineffectual; he hoped otherwise, and he thought that the mere expression of parliamentary opinion would have its effect. Let the house look at the acts of coercion which it had been found necessary to pass in this country. They were full of loop-holes, every one of them, by which they might be evaded; but they had succeeded, because the country had a willingness to conform itself to the desire of the legislature; nor had he a doubt that even the discussion, which had already taken place with respect to the Catholic Association, would induce many to abandon it. Those who really desired to promote the Catholic claims, would feel that, in continuing with the Association, they injured the cause which they believed they were supporting. For himself he should support Emancipation, from whatever quarter, or under whatever circumstances, it was brought forward.

Mr. Calcraft could conceive no question more important to the empire at large, than that before the house. With regard to the professions of some members of the cabinet, he would say plainly, that, so long as they held place under a Government which made the concession of Emancipation impossible, so long he should have no faith in their assurances, and should caution both the Catholics and the country to place no faith in their assurances; for he thought, and he had no hesitation in avowing his opinion, that men who could be faithless in one point, were not very likely to be trustworthy in another. The rt. hon. gent. (Mr. Wynn) said, that he would put down this Association, because it led to counter-associations. Why, it was in itself nothing more than a counter-association, created in opposition to those Orange Societies which the rt. hon. gent. had denounced. He hoped that the Catholics of Ireland would continue united; and as long as they assembled in a legal and constitutional manner, he trusted they would continue to press their claims upon Parliament until they obtained them. He never remembered to have heard a minister demand the suppression of meetings to discuss grievances upon proof so defective as that offered by the Sec. for Ireland. Here was the country in an unexampled state of tranquillity; a society, the proceedings of which were all public; no insurrection threatened; no green-bag produced; none of the ordinary paraphernalia set out which should give weight to such a demand; and yet the House was called upon to pass a bill which forbade the Catholics from seeking to attain their rights. True it was alleged that great fears as to this Association were entertained in Ireland; but he was assured that no such apprehension existed. The timid might, perhaps, be alarmed; the designing would pretend to be so; but ministers knew that no cause for alarm existed. To talk of the Catholic Association resisting the bill was absurd; they would anticipate it. Before the measure could pass, the Association against which it pointed would have faded away, to meet again in some other form, equally suited to its purposes. But if the house thought, that by bringing in this bill, the progress of their great work would be impeded—that the concentration of their numbers would be checked, and their collections of money for general purposes prevented—they would find themselves disappointed. He then adverted to the charges against the Association; to the alleged intemperance of their discussions, and particularly to the phrase—“By the hate you bear to Orangemen!” The words had no such tendency as that sought to be cast upon them. The hatred alluded to, was not the hatred of Orangemen personally, but hatred of a system of bigotry, and misrule, which had plundered them, crushed them, and trampled on them for centuries. It was in the name of their hatred to this system, that they were adjured to peace and good order, from joining illegal societies, from associating with Whiteboys, or any other boys (laughter). An hon. gent. said, “What will you do? Would you let this Association go on?” He certainly would let it go on; and he believed that, as far as it was attended with the collection of money in one of the poorest countries in the world, however it might go on in other respects, in that respect it would soon go off. For, as to the immense sums which had already been collected, and of which the possible application gave so much alarm, what might it be supposed the total amount collected throughout Ireland was?—9,000*l*. Why, look at the Bible Societies—at the Methodist Societies—their funds were three, four, fifty times as great. He could not but wonder how Ministers, in a session which might otherwise have been a quiet one, could have fallen into the present measure. It was suggested that this measure had arisen on the Irish side, and had been adopted in England; but he did not believe this; nothing should induce him to believe of the Marquis Wellesley, that he had recommended the present measure, uncoupled with concession. He would not go into report and rumour; but it would sometimes happen that all despatches did not suit the purpose of an administration. When that was the case, it was better to get rid of the inconvenient ones; and say to the House, "You must legislate in the dark," even although it should become necessary to plead, as the rt. hon. Sec. for Ireland had done, upon two facts, both of which had put his case and argument out of court. Instead of adopting this tinkering, pettifogging, little-minded mode of proceeding, they should grant Emancipation, to which, he believed, the Catholics were now fighting their way by means of an increase of property—by means of an union of sentiment—by means of an extension of information, which ultimately must secure their cause, and that, ere many years had passed.

Mr. Plunkett confessed, that he never had risen in that assembly with emotions of greater pain, nor did he ever approach any question with feelings of deeper apprehension, than he approached this. It was said that the measure now proposed was contrary to the popular principles of the constitution; and that it was intended, through a breach of those principles, to wound the Roman Catholics. The measure was denounced, by gentlemen whom he highly respected, as one likely to be attended with circumstances of the most ruinous nature. These were heavy imputations; but he must say, that down to the present moment, they rested on mere assertion—they were unsupported either by argument or proof. Coming, how ever, from persons of so much sincerity and ability, he was led almost to doubt the evidence of his senses, and to distrust the proofs which the converse of the proposition laid down by those gentlemen was capable of receiving. He trusted that it would appear to the house that the proposed measure did not interfere with the popular privileges of this country; that it did not affect the Catholic question; and he confidently trusted that none of those disastrous consequences would flow from it which some gentlemen seemed to anticipate. But, independently of this, the question rested on another ground; on one which was paramount to every other, where the safety of the State was involved—on the ground of imperious necessity (hear, hear). Before he proceeded further, he would recall the attention of the house to the real nature of the question. It had been argued on the opposite side, that this measure attacked the privileges of an association professing to support the Catholic claims; but he begged leave to say, that it attacked all illegal associations, whether arrayed on behalf of the Catholics or against them. This was not a single measure; it was adopted in consequence of a recommendation from the Throne, in reply to which they had bound themselves to take the whole state of Ireland into consideration in the course of the session—not with reference to any particular point, but with reference to all points; and amongst those, of course, the Catholic question would be included. He could not, therefore, conceive, how the sincerest friend to

Emancipation could object to the proposed measure, accompanied as it was by the declaration contained in the Speech. His hon. friend (Mr. Calcraft) wondered why such a measure had been resorted to, when it was admitted, on all hands, that Ireland was in a state of peace and prosperity. True, she had participated in the general prosperity of the empire. She had been enabled, by the wise and temperate measures of the noble lord at the head of the Irish government, to enjoy the blessings which were the offspring of internal tranquillity. The noble marquis, when sent to Ireland, found that country bordering on rebellion. By his impartiality and decision he softened down the feelings of exasperation, he liberalized the system of Irish policy, and led the way for that state of public feeling, which enabled Ireland to share in the prosperity which was then flowing over the empire. She was lying, almost a wreck on the breakers, and by nothing but his skilful management could she have been again righted, so as to have taken advantage of the auspicious tide. He could not agree in the assertion that the return of tranquillity in Ireland was attributable to the exertions of the Association. But, even if that position were true, it formed only another reason for adopting the present measure. All argument as to the measure was at an end, if the existence of so formidable a power were once admitted. If the Association could put down those who were illegally inclined—could they not raise them up again, if they thought proper? And here he would beg leave to say, that amongst the persons who were most active in effecting this restoration of tranquillity, were the Catholic priests of Ireland—not the Catholic Association, who arrogated all the merit—but the Catholic clergy. It was they—and he said it in justice to that useful and calumniated class—it was they, who had preached to the people the principles of religion and of peace. Having borne this testimony to the tranquillity of Ireland, it was proper to revert to the question, "Why, in so flattering a state of things, do you bring this measure forward?" He would answer, that, although he never remembered a period of greater prosperity in Ireland, yet he never recollected a time of so great political excitation. That alarm had been raised in the minds of many Protestants, by industrious efforts; that it had been exaggerated by interested persons, he readily admitted. But the desperate conduct of this society had tended to verify the fears that had been thus conjured up. The hon. member for Northampton had admitted that amongst the Catholic population, he had observed a more intense feeling of expectation than he ever before witnessed; and he asked, whether this was not a reason for granting the Catholic claims? He sincerely wished to grant their claims; but if they could not be granted, was the legislature not to make provision for any circumstances of danger which they might have reason to apprehend? The hon. member for Westminster appeared extremely attentive to this proposition. He would therefore repeat his question—If Catholic emancipation were not granted, were they to adopt no means of obviating the effect of the refusal? Would this refusal be submitted to, or resisted (hear, hear)? The answer to that question involved the justice of the measure then before the house. With those who contend that the Catholic question was of vital importance, and called for im-

modest adoption, he went to the full extent; but if it were put as a proposition, that its refusal should have the effect of drawing out the physical force against the Government, even to the Catholic question, with all his opinion of its importance, he would give his decided negative. He would not argue the question with such an alternative before him (hear, hear, hear); and the friends as well as the adversaries of the cause were bound to adopt the same course, if they valued the constitution. He would remind the house what the Catholic Association was. It was clear that the Association was founded upon a different principle from any of the "numerous defiances of the law" which have been wielded in that unsettled country from time to time. A number of gentlemen had, it seemed, formed themselves into a club, not merely for the purpose of forwarding the Catholic question, but "for the redress of all grievances, local or general, affecting the people of Ireland." With this view they had undertaken the great question of Parliamentary Reform—the Repeal of the Union—the question of Tithes—the Regulation of Church Property—the Administration of Justice, from the highest Court down to the Court of Conscience. Not content merely with an interference with the courts, they were resolutely bent on interfering with the adjudication of every cause which affected the Catholics, whom they styled "the people of Ireland." They had associated with them the Catholic clergy—the Catholic nobility—many of the Catholic gentry, and all the surviving delegates of 1791. They had established committees in every district, who kept up an extensive correspondence throughout the country. The Association, which at first was very small, then amounted to 3000 members. They had permanent sittings for the discussion of every question connected with Ireland. But there was also a Catholic rent; and in every parish of the two thousand five hundred into which Ireland was divided, they established twelve Catholic collectors, making at once an army of twenty thousand collectors; unarmed, he admitted, in every thing but prayer, entreaties, and influence. Having raised their army of collectors, they brought to their assistance two thousand five hundred priests, the whole ecclesiastical body of that religion; and thus provided, they went about levying contributions on the peasantry. Now this he would not hesitate to say, that an association assuming to represent the people, and in that capacity to bring about a reform in church and state, was against the spirit of the constitution. Did he deny the right of the people to meet for the purpose of promoting the redress of grievances in church and state, by discussion and petition? Most certainly not. But they had not a right to depute any persons, as a body, to obtain such redress. The moment the Catholic Association became representative, that moment they infringed upon the privileges of Parliament, and the spirit of the constitution. He must contend, that if a body of people in Ireland, stood forward as representing 6,000,000 of their fellow-subjects, such an assembly was illegal. It was not the amount of the rent; it was the principle that he complained of. The Association, through the medium of the priests, declared to the people, "We are the persons who represent the Roman Catholics, and who, in case of necessity, ought to wield the physical force." Was this to be endured? If they did not put it down, could they answer to themselves and the people for such a dereliction of duty? If the Associators were the wisest and worthiest men that ever wielded a state, he would not allow them to exercise that species of power, unless they were subjected to the salutary control provided by the constitution. But to whom were these men accountable? By whom were they to be tried—by whom were they to be rebuked? If the Executive wielded great powers, the constitution pointed out the mode in which they were to be exercised. But this society assumed both the legislative and executive power, and rejected all the checks by which the latter was surrounded. Let the house look to the nice balance which was preserved in our popular constitution. If the House of Commons could assemble—if it could sit whenever and as long as it pleased—in a short time the whole authority of the state might be swallowed up in the representative body. But these gentlemen met when they pleased; and, in point of fact, they sat from January to December, and exercised their powers with as little temperance as an absolute monarch. Many members of that house were not aware of the formidable power—more formidable than the sword or the purse—the power of public opinion, which was exercised by this Association. They went into the relations of private life; they denounced individuals on public and private grounds, with so little moderation, that it required more courage than belonged to ordinary men to defy them. The numbers of the Association were increased in consequence, by a body of unwilling conscripts. Even persons of high rank and character had been some persuaded, and others compelled, by the terrors of public opinion, to swell their ranks, till that body which, in its outset, was viewed without jealousy, had actually met 3000 strong. There was but one other topic, to which he wished to refer—he meant their interference with the administration of justice. He could not conceive a more deadly instrument of tyranny than this. For who are the persons who interfered? They were persons claiming to represent 6,000,000 of people; claiming the right of denouncing, and of bringing to the bar of justice any individual whom they chose to accuse of having violated the rights of that people. Could the party so accused come safely to trial, when the grand inquest of the people of Ireland, with the people's money at their disposal, were his accusers? Magistrates and persons in authority must yield to such a power, or array themselves against it. Party would be opposed to party, and the courts of justice would become scenes of factious contention. Such being the state of things, was the Marquis Wellesley to be reproached for not having allowed this institution to die of its own folly? Of what materials did gentlemen believe the Protestants of Ireland were composed, if they were content with being passive spectators of such conduct? Would they not combine for self-defence? He did not believe that there was any present intention amongst the Catholics of having recourse to force. But they were not their own masters; they must obey the commands of those who professed to represent them. He would not say that it was the intent of those leaders to adopt violent measures, but if the population they commanded became irritated, however good their intentions might be, desperate men would take the lead of them, and produce a catastrophe which they did not con-

temple. They would be forced over that precipice where they now meant to stop, like a man pressed forward by millions. It was, therefore, no answer that the intentions of the Association were honest (hear, hear). But it was said, if the Association were representative, they would fall within the provisions of the Convention Act, which provided for the case of election and actual delegation. It did not, however, touch the Association, where no election or delegation took place. But if individuals assumed to act on behalf of the people, was not the principle the same, and the mischief equal? Then salus populi, which was truly suprema lex, called on them to interfere and put an end to this institution. But it was said, although the mischief were great, there was another remedy. On this subject he would state his opinion once for all. He considered Catholic Emancipation as a measure, without which all others must be ineffectual. As a claim of right and justice, it would baffle human ingenuity to furnish any argument against it. He lamented that it should be deferred a single hour; for the longer it was deferred the more difficult it would be to grant it. These sentiments he had always expressed, and he never would abandon them. But when this alternative was proposed, instead of the present measure, the question was, "Can we have it?" He thought not. Then said those who opposed the present proposition—"Because we cannot have that measure, do not put down the mischief." If there were persons who had the power to do away with the necessity for the present proceeding, and neglected the means, they were answerable for the consequences (hear, hear). He would now, with the leave of the house, endeavour to examine that question, and to meet it fairly, and would be ready to take his own share of the responsibility (hear, hear). In 1813, the Catholic question was introduced by his hon. friend Mr. Grattan, to whom the Catholics had already owed so much. His hon. friend, on that occasion, was pleased to put a value on his services to which they were not entitled, but undoubtedly he could not overrate the zeal which dictated them. The speech which he then delivered was afterwards published. Hon. members might be familiar with parts of it, for they had from time to time been quoted in that house by several. A part of it had last night been read by the hon. member for Lincoln. He did not mention this as having any objection to it; he would not even object to the whole being entered among the standing orders of the house for gentlemen to read when they pleased (a laugh). In that speech he said that it was to be lamented that the Cabinet were divided upon the Catholic question. He added, that if they could not as a body make up their minds upon it in one way or another, they were answerable to the public for the consequences of leaving such a measure as a constant source of irritation. He had also said, that as a friend to Catholic Emancipation, he could not with honour join any administration divided upon that question. This was a full and fair admission of what were his sentiments in the year 1813. Now he as frankly and distinctly declared, that he had changed that opinion (loud cheers from the Opposition—echoed back by the ministerial benches). But here the question arose, Was he justified in having made that change? Had any circumstances occurred since, which called for that change on his part? He thought there had, and in defending himself on that ground, he could not avoid throwing some blame on the conduct of hon. members opposite. In 1813 he stated, that he did not think the support given to the question by some members of the Cabinet was much to be depended upon (a laugh). He could assure his rt. hon. friend, (Mr. Canning,) that his doubts in that respect had never any reference to him, whose sincere support could not be doubted. They had reference to the conduct of a noble friend now no more (Lord Castlereagh); in the support which that noble lord then gave to the Catholic question, he did not then believe him so sincere as he had afterwards found him. His noble friend, on that occasion, stated that he (Mr. Plunkett) was inconsistent in expressing unwillingness to act with a Cabinet divided on the question of Emancipation, as he had before acted with a ministry who were not all united on that question—that which existed when the Duke of Bedford was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. In the Grenville Administration, it was urged by the noble lord that there were some who were decidedly opposed to the Catholic question. Lord Sidmouth was one, and Lord Ellenborough another. He did not think at the time that this argument was sufficiently conclusive to alter his opinion; but he thought that a united administration might be formed out of that side of the house with which he then acted. In making this declaration of his former sentiments, and of the change which had since taken place in them, he begged to be understood as doing so, solely in justice to his own character and motives. He did not consider himself bound to give an explanation of his conduct to any man or set of men in that house. He came in unconnected with any man or any party. There was not one of the gentlemen with whom he had formerly the honour to act, by the wisdom of whose counsels he would in all matters have been guided, except Lord Grenville. But no man—for he was pledged to none—had a right to complain of him, or to ask his motives for joining administration. But to return to the progress of the Catholic question. Through the zeal and activity of Lord Castlereagh, it obtained an extent of legislative support which, while it left no doubt of its ultimate success, removed every suspicion from his mind of the sincerity of that noble lord. As the discussion of the measure proceeded, the number of its advocates increased, and before the death of Mr. Grattan it had already gained considerably on public favour. After the decease of his lamented friend, he had the honour of introducing the measure. It was warmly supported by some of His Majesty's ministers, and though opposed by others, it passed that house, was carried to the Lords, and there, after a warm discussion, was rejected by a very inconsiderable majority. Now, when he saw those things occur, had he not a right to believe that the question could be carried by a divided administration? He had seen it pass this house, and he had seen it accidentally negated by a small majority in the other. Was not this one fair ground for the alteration of the opinion he had formed in 1813? But he had other reasons for abandoning the other side of the house. Without ceasing to sit there, and joining opposition where he could, he had had frequent occasion to dissent from their opinions. On the important question of the continuance of the war he differed from them. On the questions which arose out of the disturbances in

1819, he felt obliged to take his stand on public grounds, and differed wholly from the view which they took of the situation of the country. On the question of parliamentary reform he also differed; in short, upon almost all the cardinal points connected with the general administration of public affairs, he found that his and their opinions were wholly different. But it was not he alone who differed; the public also differed from them on many material points. Not possessing the confidence of the public on so many questions, he thought they did not contain the materials out of which a Cabinet could be formed with any prospect of carrying the question of Catholic Emancipation. He thus found, on one side, a set of men, who, though not altogether agreed, could carry that question; on the other, a party, who, though agreed, did not possess sufficient influence to carry it—and when he knew that on many leading questions he was opposed to that party, to which he had never stood pledged, where, he asked, was his inconsistency of obeying the sacred commands of his Sovereign, and taking office? He thought these reasons a sufficient justification of the course he had pursued; yet, if there should still exist any one who, directly or by implication, should impute to him that he had accepted office merely for the sake of place, and without regard to political consistency, he would appeal to the history of his life, and he would say that such an imputation would fall as an unfounded calumny (hear, hear, hear). The learned member for Winchester had said that the influence of the Catholic Association originated in a feeling on the part of the Catholics that they were deserted by their old friends. If this were intended as an allusion to his conduct, it was not borne out by the fact. He had, on four occasions, since he accepted office, received the public thanks of the Catholics for his services in their cause, accompanied with expressions of confidence in the continuance of those services. That confidence was not withdrawn even when he refused to present the petition as from the Association. In November last, when it was resolved that the Catholic petition should be committed to the hon. bart. (Sir F. Burdett), it was resolved, on the motion of Mr. Wolfe, that the Catholics, though they confided the petition to another, still relied confidently upon the continuance of his usual support. He did not think they could have placed their cause in more efficient hands than those of the hon. bart. and when the measure should be introduced, the hon. bart. might feel assured that he would not walk out of the house leaving him (the hon. bart.) in the unpleasant situation in which he (Mr. Plunkett) had been placed on a former occasion (hear, hear! from the Treasury benches). He did not blame the hon. bart. for he believed that neither in nor out of Parliament there existed a more just or consistent individual, whether viewed in the various relations of public or private life (hear, hear). The hon. bart. needed not any praise of him, but justice compelled him to say so much. He then adverted to an extract from his speech in 1813, which had been read yesterday by the learned member for Lincoln as evidence of another act of inconsistency on his part. The argument contained in it was, that it was unjust to visit on the Catholic body the errors of their advocates. Were those arguments inconsistent with the opinions he now held? He then condemned these associations: so he did at present; but he thought now as then, that the conduct of a few individuals ought not be visited upon the whole body. But as he had made another remark at that time which would more fully explain his present meaning, he thought it a want of candour in the learned gent. not to have made any reference to that part of the speech. If he had only read the paragraph preceding that which he quoted, it would have put his present and former sentiments on this point in their proper light and shown that he was perfectly consistent. The passage omitted by the learned gent. was this:—"Sir, the conduct of the Catholics has been resorted to as an argument for abandoning the pledge of the last session. I am not an advocate of their intemperance; I am free to say that there have been some proceedings on the part of the public bodies who affect to act for them, altogether unjustifiable. Their attempts to dictate to the entire body how they are to act on each particular political occurrence—their presuming to hold an inquisition on the conduct of individuals in the exercise of their elective franchise, and putting them under the ban of their displeasure, because they vote for their private friends, and abide by their plighted engagements—all this is a degree of inquisitorial authority unexampled and insufferable; and this by persons professing themselves the advocates of unbounded freedom and unlimited toleration, at the moment when they are extending their unparalleled tyranny into the domestic arrangements of every Catholic family in the country." One would have thought, in reading this passage, that by a happy anticipation he was foreseeing at that period that which was happening at the present. The passage proceeded thus:—"Sir, I am equally disgusted with the tone of unqualified demand, and haughty rejection of all condition or accommodation so confidently announced by them; nor can I palliate the intemperance of many of their public speeches, nor the exaggeration and violence of some of their printed publications. To this tone I never wish to see the legislature yield; but as this indecent clamour is not to compel them to yield to what is unreasonable, I trust it would not influence them to withhold what is just." Now if he had wished for an opportunity of proving the consistency of his opinions as to the Catholic Association, with those he formerly held, he could not have found a better one than that with which the learned Member for Lincoln had indulged him.—One word more as to the effect of the Association. It was calculated to check the disposition of the people of this country, which he perceived was daily inclining them in favour of the Catholic claims. He differed from his rt. hon. friend (Mr. Peel) on this point. The people of England were beginning to see that the game of governing by division would no longer succeed, but that success could only be bought by conciliation. They began to be aware, that if a great deal were not done to blight the gifts which Providence had bestowed upon her, Ireland would become one of the most fertile sources of British prosperity. The idea of the separation of the two countries was idle and absurd. As a sincere and zealous friend of the Catholics, he would advise that they should leave off the high tone which they had so long used. To threaten the Legislature with their physical force, was a proof of ignorance; Parliament would never yield to such a threat. Let them take better grounds. Their cause had great merits, and needed no such adventitious aids. But it was said that the Association spoke the sentiments of the Irish people. So they did—so did he, and so would every man who advocated the cause of Emancipation. But beyond that, the Association did not represent their feelings; and he denied that the people of Ireland would resent its abolition. The clergy and the country gentlemen were tired of seeing their usual influence with the people taken from them by this body. Even the members of the Association would acquiesce quietly in the law which would put an end to their power. They were, many of them, sensible men, who would be aware of the inutility of opposing the will of the legislature. Mr. O'Connell himself—would be of this opinion. Mr. O'Connell was a man of great talent and acquirements, although in his political opinions somewhat wild and extravagant; nevertheless, he was persuaded that neither he, nor Lord Fingall, Lord Gormanstown, nor any other gentleman connected with the Association, would descend to any pettifoggish tricks to evade the operation of this measure. He believed that the great body of the people would regard the bill as an honourable excuse to get rid of the influence of that body (loud cheers).

Mr. Tierney wished to avail himself of the earliest opportunity of stating his opinions upon this subject. It had so happened that he had never before opened his lips in any debate on the question of Emancipation; nor should he have done so now did he not consider the present to be a crisis of great danger to the empire. The measure of Emancipation, according to the learned gent.'s admission, would render the present one wholly unnecessary; but as that could not, in his opinion, be obtained, he preferred the present to none at all. The Cabinet could not agree upon a measure of general conciliation; so, in lieu of it, they hit upon an expedient which was to have directly the contrary effect (hear, hear). Was it not strange that this Cabinet could never pull together, except when some privileges of the people were to be invaded, and that when a measure of conciliation was proposed, then nothing was agreed upon except not to agree at all (hear, hear)? He did not rise as the advocate of the Catholics: for any thing he had done for them, they owed him nothing. What he had done with respect to their claims, he did for the general benefit of the country (hear, hear). His habits and opinions were all with the Established Church, although he was not blind to its imperfections; and no man would be more zealous than himself to oppose the Catholic claims if he thought them injurious to the Church. In offering his reasons against this measure, it was unnecessary for him to go into the Catholic question. Its merits were well understood, and had more than once been recognized by majorities of that house. The dangers of a Popish pretender, and the chance of a Popish succession to the throne, such as they were, had gone by; but there was a danger of another kind, and to that he would confine himself;—it was the danger arising from the discontent of the Catholic population. In tracing it, as connected with this measure, he would advert, as far as his memory served, to the leading points of the learned gent. He should begin by observing that it was unprecedented in the annals of Parliament, that they should legislate against a particular body, without having one fact before them that the acts of that body were wrong. In the case of this Association it was assumed throughout that all their acts were the result of bad intentions. What right had any man to make such an assumption? It might be necessary, on inquiry, to put down the Catholic Association; but he would not take that for granted on the mere statement of the learned gent. There was complaint enough against them, but no evidence. It was complained, that the Association had taken upon themselves to inquire into the Catholic grievances—into the administration of justice in the law courts—into the abuses of tithes, and other matters. Now it was quite competent to them so to do, and they who called upon the legislature to prevent them were bound to show that there was something bad at the bottom of all those things. Unless they did this, they established no ground on which to rest the present measure. He implored the house to consider that they were not dealing with a little knot of men, who might be ill-disposed but powerless; they were dealing with six millions of people; with the great body of the Irish nation. He had not very minutely followed the proceedings of the Association, but as far as he had seen accounts of them in the newspapers, he saw nothing to create an apprehension of danger. He saw a few intemperate speeches. Oh! but those were made by men who assumed the functions of an executive government; and the house were told of the pernicious effects of having prosecutions carried on by such men, of the ill temper it generated, and of the difficulty of obtaining impartial trials under such circumstances. No doubt these things sounded highly, and were likely to catch the country gentlemen; but how was this account borne out by facts? It appeared that one of the magistrates appointed to preside at these trials (Mr. Blackburn) had publicly thanked Mr. O'Gorman for the temper and humanity with which he had conducted those proceedings (hear, hear). With regard to these cases, therefore, hon. gentlemen brought no proofs of their assertions but newspaper evidence. Now, while they were about it, they might as well have given the whole newspaper testimony. But then it was said, that they purposely declined adducing evidence; and he thought they were right; for there was unquestionably a great lack of it on that head. The learned gent. had surely made use of exaggerated statements, when he alluded to the dreadful consequences that must follow upon the acts of the Association. Among other alarming assertions, he had stated that they had an army—an army, as he was pleased to call it in a parenthesis (a laugh)—of 30,000 men; armed with a leather bag in their van; and a slate to register their collections. And this army was headed by 2500 priests (laughter)! If the learned gent. meant to insinuate that these 30,000 collectors and 2500 priests applied their collections to an improper purpose; or if he meant that they collected subscriptions to a dangerous amount, why did he not speak out plainly (hear, hear)? The house would then know the real state of the case, and what to do in respect of it. But was there such a sum collected? Let the house hear that this general contribution of all Ireland amounted to 10,000*l.* (hear, hear). When the rt. hon. gent. (Mr. Goulburn) stated the detail upon which he had framed this bill, he did not understand that he felt any alarm upon this subject; it would be ridiculous to suppose that he did. But if the learned gent. thought so, did he think this bill could put a stop to the collection? If he did, he was utterly mistaken. That collection was confided to the priests. Priests might be prohibited from collecting rent for the Association: but it was well known that they collected monies among their flocks for other purposes beside those of the rent; and did the rt. hon. gent. suppose that he, or any body else, could find out, if the Catholic population continued their weekly subscriptions of three-half-pence each, what became of the odd halfpenny (laughter and cheers)? He could not be so absurd. Why, then, the only difference which the bill could make, would be to convert an open contribution into a secret one. The bill would compel the Catholics to resort to secrecy in furthering what it would declare to be an illegal object. And what could be worse, more impolitic and foolish, than to compel men, who now acted in the face of day for a known object, to work in the dark—to conceal their operations for the removal of the grievances under which no man could deny they laboured, and which they would as surely attempt to get rid of? It was far from his wish to make any inflammatory observations; but he must say, that their grievances pressed heavily upon the people of Ireland, and that if these collections were so employed as to serve the great object of obtaining redress for those grievances, they were very laudably appropriated: such efforts were entitled to success, and to the good wishes of the friends of both countries. Now, that was the declared purpose of this Association. But now came the learned gent. and objected to the Association altogether; because, he said, it was contrary to "the spirit of the constitution." This was a phrase much used in that house; and particularly by gentlemen on the other side, when they brought in any measure like this bill (hear, hear). The worst of it was, that, much as was said about "the spirit of the constitution," nobody could learn what it was (a laugh). There was no getting at the definition of the words even from the speaker who used them; especially if they fell from a lawyer (a laugh). It was in vain, that you explained and inquired: he directly met you with some Act of Parliament; and there was an end of you and the spirit of the constitution too (a laugh). But what was the learned gent.'s own version of the words? Why, that for a body representing 6,000,000 of people, labouring under admitted grievances (hear, hear), to meet together for procuring redress by their own exertions, and with their own means, was contrary to the spirit of the constitution! For his own part, he thought that the Roman Catholics of Ireland were right in taking up the matter themselves. They had been driven to it, by repeated disappointment from the failure of many promises and the treachery of many friends. Why had they been led on to believe—and most honestly as regarded the learned gent. to whose exertions their cause was, beyond doubt, exceedingly indebted—why had they been led to believe that their cause was espoused by the most enlightened men in the country? Why had the learned gentleman displayed such extraordinary eloquence in their behalf? Why did the rt. hon. Sec. for Foreign Affairs, from time to time, hold out the expectation that the day would soon arrive in which Government would give them all they asked for at its hands; and now, when that day was come, say to them, in effect—"we are in a condition to give, but you cannot have what you want, therefore go home without it (a laugh) and disperse yourselves quietly and peaceably. It is true you are cruelly disappointed, but be satisfied (a laugh) with my assurance, that you cannot now have what you want." The learned gent. too, here chimed in with "Nothing can be clearer than this; therefore go home; and if you say another word, I will put you all into gaol" (hear, hear). But the Government must boast of its conciliatory measures towards Ireland; and if language like this was in the nature of "conciliation," undoubtedly here was a very pretty specimen (a laugh). But why was it impossible to carry this question? He would ask that learned person to look back—not to 1813, nor to the circumstances under which it presented itself to Parliament in 1813; but to 1821, when the Bill which had been adverted to was carried in that house (cheers), and when, according to the learned gent.—a fact that it must be very satisfactory to the rt. hon. Sec. for Ireland to hear (a laugh)—"Ireland was a wreck upon the breakers" (loud cheers, and some expression of dissent from Mr. Plunkett). He was much mistaken: his reason must have totally failed him, if the learned gent. when speaking of Ireland, and reviewing the progress of events in that country, did not, after regarding his own handy-work since he had been in office with great complacency, declare that Ireland was then "a wreck upon the breakers" (laughter). And, indeed, he had thought at the time that the learned gent.'s neighbour, there, the Sec. for Foreign Affairs, would have to add a new stanza to his old song 'of the pilot that weathered the storm,' in compliment to this new pilot. For now he found that we are all in sunshine again; there were no more breakers; not a thought about a wreck; and the water we were sailing in was as smooth as a mill-pond (loud laughter). All this beautiful tranquillity too, was owing to the learned gent. by whom, together with the Marquis Wellesley, it had been entirely effected. But he desired to learn what they had done towards ensuring the peace of Ireland? The learned gent. had carried the Catholic claims through that house; but it was afterwards defeated in the other. It was important to look back at that majority and minority. In that house he obtained the great majority of 90 (cheers); in another house—a place which he did not feel himself at liberty to describe, at present, in any other way than by saying it was a place wherein there sat certain gentlemen who had the privilege of wearing white sleeves (laughter)—there was a majority of 38 against him. But of those 38 individuals, it happened that no less than 25 were adorned in the way he had mentioned. Now, was it quite impossible to believe, that if Government had sincerely backed the measure, these white sleeves might have been found in the other part of the division (a laugh)? Could any body blame the Catholics if they thought, at that time, that their triumph was completed—that without any direct assistance from the Government, but by the mere force of reason and argument, they had, at length, attained that which would end, in the course of another year, judging by the ordinary progress of such proceedings, in the acquisition of all they had asked for (hear, hear)? Certain it was that they were again disappointed; and that in the autumn of that very year, the learned gent. took office. He imputed no motives. He was ready to believe that the learned gent. accepted office with the most honourable intentions. But he did take it; and at the same time strode over from that side of the house to the other. Why the learned gent. was made Attorney-General for Ireland, except for deserting the Catholics, he was at a loss to know. But if he had been made Attorney-General for deserting them, he might reasonably expect to be made Lord Chancellor for attacking them (laughter). He must say to the learned gent.—“It is extraordinary that you who kept to your opinion in adversity—when you sat on this side of the house, I mean (a laugh)—should not keep to it in prosperity, when you might adhere to it with effect. If, while you sat among us, you were consistent in this respect, why should you become otherwise the moment you crossed to the other side?” This seemed to be about the strangest thing in the world. But the learned gent. had informed them “that he had since changed his opinion;” and that he had changed it upon the purest and most conscientious principles, there could be no doubt, for he had told them so himself (a laugh). But, however irrefragable his motives might be, he owed a duty to others as well as himself. When he joined that administration, did he reserve this point? Did he stipulate for this vital question? Did he make his own price?—He did not mean in an offensive sense: he was speaking only of the conditions which an individual, who took with him such talent and influence as the learned gent. had done to ministers, might honourably propose and expect. Did he say to those ministers “Here I come, with my wares in this bag (a laugh). You see what I have done for Ireland on this important subject; take me with my talents and my eloquence, but secure to me the successful result of my exertions for this question (hear, hear). But the learned gent. had done nothing of all this; and he said his reason was, that no administration could be formed on the opposition side that could carry the Catholic question. Perhaps he was right; though his reason was not very complimentary: but surely he might have found members enough on that side to make up half such an administration. Pray did the learned gent. in his difficulty, ever try the experiment of forming an administration, half from that side of the house and half from the ministerial side (laughter and cheers)? Had he proposed any such experiment in 1821, when he brought the Catholic question forward? No such thing; and the reason seemed to be, that at that very time he was about to take up his quarters on the other side. He was at that moment, to use a sailor’s phrase, with his anchor a-peak for the Treasury benches (a laugh). He did not mean to quarrel with him on that account; for he confessed that at that time a sort of cloud hung over the Opposition, which was not very encouraging to old practitioners. The learned gent. said, he had never been attached to any party; but when he crossed the floor, they made him Attorney-General for Ireland: and to make a man Attorney-General used always to be considered as attaching the individual to the party of the administration (hear, hear). But then he was not attached to a party, but only to Lord Grenville. Now he would say, that he very well remembered when the learned gent. was once as warmly attached to a noble friend of his (Mr. T.’s), as he had ever been to Lord Grenville. Some differences arose between that noble friend and Lord Grenville upon the question of the war, and the learned gent. came down to him (Mr. T.), and told him, that notwithstanding his attachment, he thought Lord Grenville had taken the most wise, and enlarged, and statesman-like view of the case, and that therefore—he should vote with his lordship. (a laugh). No blame was attributable to the learned gent. on that account. He probably foresaw that the greater number of people would take the same view as Lord Grenville; and the Grenvilles, in fact, soon came into favour. It was curious enough to mark the effect of circumstances upon the opinions of the learned gent. while he sat with the Opposition. On the question of the war he was much alarmed; the six acts put him in a state of dismay; then something else happened which threw him into an absolute panic; and then—he took a place (continued laughter). He begged to know why it was that this Catholic question should now be openly avowed by the learned gent. to be one that nobody but an insane person would imagine capable of being carried? Let the house consider the anomalous situation in which such a declaration placed it. The Sec. for Ireland brought in a bill, the penal consequences of which must seriously affect a vast body of the people of Ireland; but here was this Catholic question, which, if carried, would make that bill unnecessary. The learned gent. had said, that Emancipation would tranquillize Ireland at once. Why, then, delay? Why was not this remedial measure brought forward? “Oh,” says the Sec. for Foreign Affairs, “would you have me to break up the Government?” He would not break up the Government on any consideration; but he had every reason to believe that the measure he spoke of would have no such effect; and if it should compel some members of the Cabinet to retire, the minority of six would not be the men to turn tail (cheers and laughter). There was one noble and learned person, of great influence in that Cabinet, too, who, he felt quite sure, would not go away on that account, notwithstanding the apprehensions that some gentlemen entertained for him. The legal habits and precaution of that learned person would not desert him on such an occasion, but there would be so many hearings on the case—such rehearings, and such arguments and exceptions, that the end of these wise and prudent delays would be, according to a phrase which often occurred in the newspapers, that the noble and learned personage would say to the parties “Oh! you may mention this matter to me next Tuesday” (cheers and laughter). Let the friends of that great question be stout; and they might be assured that its enemies would be weak. He had no doubt that all the members of the Cabinet would be as reconciled to the matter, and as friendly, in the space of one week, as they were at present, if the minority of six would only do their duty as well in the Cabinet, as they did theirs who were out of it. The question should be passed without delay. From a beneficent decree of the most illustrious personage in this kingdom in another country, it might be inferred, that when he was not fettered by his ministers, he was strongly disposed to measures of this enlightened nature. Why, it seemed from the speech of the learned gent. that it was only upon the most vital of all questions that the monarch was not advised by his ministers. He was left to pursue his own course in this momentous matter, unassisted by those counsels which were afforded under such circumstances to every other sovereign in Europe. Could that kingdom be said to be safe in which so dangerous an anomaly existed? Here was a measure that would at once restore peace to Ireland, but which party arrangements did not suffer to be so much as mooted. Let gentlemen look at the consequences of the measures they were pursuing, and not suppose that the Catholics would be satisfied with this bill. In 1821, they were required to suffer under their grievances with patience; but with that, at last, they were not satisfied; they took their affairs into their own hands, and they thought, and they thought justly, that this was their only mode of gaining ground. He lamented very much the necessity of this—he was not prepared to defend the acts of the Association, but he thought great deliberation was required before this bill was adopted; for the peace of the country might be involved in this night's determination. The Catholics were no longer what they had been. They had increased almost to the extent of the whole population; they engrossed nearly all the cotton manufactories and all the distilleries. In time, Ireland would assume a high and commanding situation. She would then obtain what she required. The only difference would be, that what Parliament might to-day grant as a boon, would be imperiously demanded, and obtained as a right to-morrow (hear, hear). If, therefore, they were neglected too long, and any evil should arise, it must not be imputed to them, so much as to that irritation which had been excited amongst them. Twenty-five thousand men might now march from one end of Ireland to the other, in spite of the army of thirty thousand rent collectors, headed by its two thousand five hundred priests. But who could say with confidence that such would always be the case? In the event of a war between this country and a Continental Power, it would be well to consider the state of Ireland. He would ask whether, in case of war, the discontent of Spain at our recognition of the independence of her colonies, might not induce her to return the obligation by acknowledging the independence of Ireland (hear, hear)? Why, he would ask, was all that risk to be incurred? Why, but because some half dozen ministers would not listen to the word—Emancipation. The learned gent. had said to-night, that he was ready to vote for Emancipation whenever the hon. bart. would propose it. He must say, that the learned gent. had found Catholic Emancipation, in all respects of fortune and honour, a very profitable concern for the last five and twenty years. All that the friends of the measure asked of him in return was, that he would now be good enough either to retire from office, or to change his opinion again (a laugh). The learned gent. might reasonably, say, gracefully, state, that he had exerted himself to the utmost in this cause, and in vindicating his own principles; but finding the sense of the country to be against him, he must retire. He must seriously tell the learned gent. that in the present state of affairs there was no chance of carrying the Catholic question. That object could never be carried but by a Government unanimous in its determination. Such a Government, he knew, might be formed. If the learned gent. and the other ministers who voted with him on the question, would withdraw, a new Government, he was certain, might be formed, with the full approbation of the country. It had been said that this country was never more indisposed to grant Catholic Emancipation than at present. Now, he doubted that much. He certainly saw "No Popery" chalked upon a few walls; but that was not the sense of the country. Education had extended, and with it a corresponding spirit of liberality, which might truly be said to pervade all orders. If the rt. hon. gent. to whom he had alluded, would withdraw from the Government, the Chancellor would not merely have to find one, but almost all the new ministers. He must find a new Lord Privy Seal—a President of the Council—a First Lord of the Admiralty—a Chancellor of the Exchequer—a Secretary for Foreign Affairs—a Lord Lieutenant of Ireland—an Attorney-General for Ireland—and a President of the Board of Control. He could as soon raise the dead as do all that (laughter). Then let not rt. hon. gentlemen delude themselves by saying that the measure could not be carried; for, if that were done, it could and would be carried triumphantly (loud cheering). He, therefore, would not vote for the measure now proposed; he would not vote for any such measure, unless it were preceded by Emancipation (loud and continued cheering).

The debate was further adjourned, at a quarter to two o'clock.

MONDAY, FEB. 14.—The adjourned debate being resumed,

Mr. G. Lamb said, the proposed measure still appeared to him exceedingly obscure; the most he could make out, was, that it was meant to be an enlargement of the Convention Act. That act concluded with a proviso "that nothing therein contained should prevent meetings for the redress of grievances." That salutary provision was now, he understood, for the first time, to be abandoned. A matter of deep and serious concern! For whatever intemperance of language might have been manifested by the Association, still the redress of grievances was the object of that society. Ireland was perfectly tranquil; but they were called on to prevent contingent dangers. This prophetic spirit of evil often created the mischief against which its warnings were directed. They were admonished that this Association was contrary to the spirit of the constitution; and that it would be the means of creating animosities amongst those who followed different creeds. The Attorney-General for Ireland had said, "If this Association go on, will not some disturber, some desperate adventurer, force them over that precipice which they have incautiously prepared. The answer was simple; it was time to interfere when they saw the public disturber at work. But the learned gent. had been vigilant too early: he indicted that which was not indictable (hear, hear); and, as in the rattle-and-bottle assassination plot, he was defeated. It had been urged, as one of the best features of this measure, that it applied as well to the Orange Societies as to the Catholic Association. But was that a neutral measure which placed an association perfectly lawful, on the same level with another, the legality of which was of a very doubtful character? The latter had been denounced in that house two sessions ago: an act was passed to check its growth, but it still continued to exist. When this question of Orange Lodges was before the house, the Sec. for Ireland then stated it to be his opinion that the proper method of attacking such institutions, was by giving them temperate advice. Yet those to whom such advice was to have the effect of a powerful spell, were described, by the learned gent. on a memorable occasion, "as a gang—a faction, who wished to overturn the laws of their country, and who had insulted and outraged the representative of the Sovereign." These persons were, it seemed, to be treated simply with advice. Had this conciliatory course been pursued on the present occasion? As the rt. hon. Sec. (Goulburn) was adverse to the Catholic claims, he might think that advice from him would not be well taken. But the learned gent. might have volunteered his services. The learned gent. had boasted that he possessed the confidence of the Catholics. Did he give them any of this temperate advice? His advice came in the shape of a legal process, which was served on one of the most popular of the Catholic leaders. Where then was the supposed impartiality of treatment? Where the impartiality of this bill, when certain individuals belonging to an Orange Society, being called on to answer questions, refused, under shelter of their secret oaths, and were protected at the bar of that house? Witnesses shielding themselves from giving evidence under those secret and illegal oaths, were suffered to leave that bar unpunished. The Orange party had some reason to complain of this measure as well as the Catholics. The former might say, "We have been long countenanced by you; and although some time ago you gave us a little parliamentary hit, yet, since that, members of the Government have complimented us for our loyalty: now, however, you are going to put us down for the acts of another association, which we dislike as much as you do." But why did not the Orange Lodges complain? Because they knew that though the measure professed to be impartial, it would not be impartially executed. Then, however powerful this law might be to put down open associations, it would be utterly ineffectual to put down secret meetings, which were infinitely more dangerous. The learned gent. had asked, "To whom is this Association responsible?" To the laws. They were equally responsible to the laws, whether alone or together, in lodges, clubs or associations, as any other of his Majesty's subjects. The learned gent. objected to the permanency of this Association, to its constant meetings and its frequent discussions; and this might be a valid objection if they had power as well as permanency. But the same power existed in every debating society. They might meet when and where they pleased; and sit, if they fancied it, from January to December. The learned gent. then came to the great graven of the case—the collection of the rent, against which much clamour had been raised. This collection of money was treated as a levying of taxes; but he could not see what right any person had to prevent another from collecting money for a legal purpose. He could not see any difference between this alleged levy of a tax, and the contributions to a Bible Society. It appeared, however, that great offence was taken, because the priest assisted in collecting it. He believed very few went regularly to church whose pockets were not lightened by subscribing to some beneficent project, which the clergyman recommended from the pulpit. The objects recommended on those occasions were certainly laudable, but they could not be more laudable than those which the Catholics had in view. But this voluntary contribution was spoken of as a tax; and a most extraordinary tax it was: he wished the state of this country was such as to enable the Chancellor of the Exchequer to abandon all others (a laugh): when every person was competent to say, "I'll pay my penny towards the exigencies of the state, or not, just as I like"—the idea of a tax would be stripped of all its unpleasant associations (a laugh). He did not approve of the expression "Be tranquil by the hate you bear to Orangemen;" but a single violent expression, accompanied as it was by so much good sense and good feeling, ought not to have so much importance attached to it. The Catholics wished to attain their rights by preserving tranquillity: the Association, in adjuring their countrymen to be tranquil, used an expression which they thought would be most effectual: would to God, instead of calling on them to be tranquil by the hate they bore the Orangemen, they could have adjured them by the affection they felt! They were to be tranquil because it gave them the best chance of being admitted to a share in the blessings of the constitution: that they should be put upon an equal footing would be the sweetest revenge to the Catholics, and the bitterest pill the Orangemen could swallow. This seemed to be the fair meaning of the expression, although it had been spoken of as if it had been pronounced in the spirit of Squire Western, when he asks—"Is not every true-born Englishman bound to hate the French like the Devil in Hell" (a laugh)? Before the session was over, he hoped some part, if not the whole, of what they claimed, would be granted to the Catholics (hear, hear); and he could not avoid indulging in the hope that some effort of Royal beneficence—or, if not, the continuance of that moderation which the Catholics had displayed, might prevent this measure from becoming the law of the land.

Mr. Dawson said, that no man who had marked the state of Ireland for the last thirty years, could support any political association in that country. With one single exception—the Convention of 1782—parties had been ruinous to Ireland. The formation of the Society of United Irishmen, in 1796 and 1797, ended in a rebellion that raged from north to south. What was the result of the Catholic Board in 1812 and 1813? Great heat and exasperation throughout the country. After such scenes as these, he should be happy to put an end to all associations. He could not but admire the consistency of those who supported a bill to put down the Orange Societies; against which nothing was proved, and who now supported an association which was, in all its fea-most unconstitutional body. Its funds easily disposed of, in engaging a paid disseminator the pernicious principles which its members acted. The orators reared as its organs stuck at the assertion of falsehood which might exasperate the orders of the people against the interests of the country. The priests who had themselves with it, were influenced by a singular hatred against the constitution of the country, and its existing institutions. In the report, when the collections of the rent have been very successful, the people were exhorted to awake from the slumber which they had so long kept, and to act as men, and deserved to be like men. This, he thought, was sufficient. Mr. O'Connell, a few weeks after, when the rent had been more successful, he would not press the claim of arm-Catholics, lest their enemies should say they were going to make war at once. What would be the effect of this and of the peasantry, followed up by ditionary bondsmen! know ye not would be free, himself must strike the blow?"

I had recently declared that "the legislature requires the degradation of the people—it is the asylum of intolerance and this character of the legislature animated throughout Ireland! When the Duke of Devonshire, in the House of Lords, gave his opinion on the Catholic question, and said so although his destruction had lately preached in a Catholic chapel in the Association immediately decreed as more of an assassin than the priest denounced, and that his speech was an insult to the people. The Duke of York, too, assailed by the Association, and denounced in broad terms as the enemy of Ireland. The person at the meeting in which place, wished to have the resolution passed, but this was opposed by Mr. O'Connell, that "the heir apparent ought not to be at there was once a Duke of York who ruled and his kingdom." It was in that benefits were conferred upon the people: they were either forgotten or misrepresented by the Association. In 1822, the Archbishop of Tuam had exerted himself with the most charitable assiduity to alleviate the sufferings of the people in his diocese. The Catholic clergy expressed, by a resolution in a public meeting, the gratitude they felt for the services that benevolent prelate had rendered to them and to their flocks. No Catholic Association existed then. As soon, however, as it was established, the same Catholic clergy who had not, and could not have, any real cause for bitterness of feeling against the Archbishop, passed, in November last, a resolution, in which they accused him of having introduced a party of soldiers into a church in which they were holding a public meeting, for the purpose of intimidating, or murdering, all the Catholic priests present. Mr. O'Connell had gone still further, and had given at the last meeting of the Association, a friendly hint to his adherents for getting rid of the Protestant clergy by wholesale. He alluded to the proceedings of the

Covenanters of Scotland, who, he said, did not patiently bear the attempts which were made to oppress them, and to impose upon them a form of religion to which their consciences were averse, but hewed down with the sword of the Lord the Archbishops and Bishops who tyrannized over them; and when, at length, they were overcome by the British force which was sent against them, they retired to the mountains, and having recruited their forces, they came down again and carried desolation to the dwellings of their assailants. This language, he knew, operated very powerfully on the minds of the peasantry of Ireland, whose ignorance aided their credulity, and who, he was sorry to say, were too ready to commit bloodshed upon slight provocation. The same strain of vituperation was indulged in by the Association towards the judges and all who were engaged in the administration of the law. Mr. O'Connell, in speaking of the Bench of Ireland, said "the Chancellorship of Lord Mannors and the Attorney-Generalship of Mr. Saurin had sullied the dignity and degraded the independence of the bar." He believed that those who were more ceremoniously treated—the Judges Moore, Burton, Jebb, and others—would feel more pleasure in being likened to Lord Mannors and to Mr. Saurin than in receiving the hypocritical praises of Mr. O'Connell. To say that the object of the Association was the redress of grievances, real or supposed, was wholly untrue: its object, as was evident from the conduct of its members, was to scatter calumnies, to weaken the confidence of the people in the laws, and to prepare their minds for the measures which were in contemplation. Upon a recent occasion, a Mr. Devereux and a Mr. Hamilton Rowan, had been admitted members of the Association, when the name of the latter was received with thunders of applause. Mr. Hamilton Rowan, it would be remembered, was one of the United Irishmen. He had been implicated in seditious practices in the year 1796, for which he was imprisoned. Previously to his trial he contrived to escape, and remained many years in exile. He was attainted of high treason, but being afterwards, by the lenity of the Government, allowed to return to Ireland, the best return he could make for the mercy which had been shown him was by enlisting himself as a member of an association quite as dangerous as that of the United Irishmen. The name of this convicted traitor was received with thunders of applause, in order that the recollection of the disastrous period with which that name was connected might be revived in the minds of the deluded peasantry, and help the designs of this abominable Association. Much as he objected to the practices of the Association, they would, he believed, be comparatively harmless but for the sanction which they received from the Catholic priesthood. Most of the evils under which Ireland suffered were, in his opinion, to be attributed to the influence of that priesthood (hear, hear! from the Opposition, echoed back from the ministerial side). He differed in this respect from the Attorney-General for Ireland (hear, hear! from the Opposition): the whole tenor of their conduct, for the last six or seven years, convinced him that it was their object to overthrow the Protestant Church, and to establish that of Rome in its stead (cheers). Dr. Curtis, the titular primate of Ireland, told the Archbishop of

Dublin openly, that he was an usurper—that he held his see only by suzerainty, and that he had no more real title to it than he had to the dukedom of Leeds. Dr. Doyle, another Catholic priest, in a letter to Mr. Roberts, said, that if rebellion raged in Ireland from Carrickfergus to Cape Clear, no excommunication would be fulminated by a Catholic priest. One O'Sullivan, also, a priest, saw a man murdered before his face, and refused to give evidence to the facts, alleging that if he did, his influence with his parishioners would be lessened. Mr. Duggan, the priest of Kiltrush, informed the Association that in his parish many of the farmers had promised to devote the whole amount of the corn crop to the Catholic rent, no matter whether their creditors went unpaid, or though the very wants of nature should go unsatisfied. What man but one whose mind was wholly perverted—what man possessing any thing like a sense of morality, could countenance a fraud and robbery which was committed only for the purpose of encouraging sedition? The priest of Mallow, Mr. Kelly, told his parishioners that money was the sinews of war, and exhorted them, therefore, to contribute as much as they were able to the rent, that the Association might have the sinews necessary to carry their purposes into execution as soon as they should be ripe. Was this not plain language? Did such language require any comment? The good which the Catholic priesthood might do if they were disposed to do it, was apparent from the influence which they were proved to possess over their parishioners. The evil use which they were inclined to make of that influence might be gathered from their avowed sentiments. Who was it that industriously sowed sedition throughout Ireland? Who was it that at elections added to the natural excitement of political feeling the fuel of religious animosity? It was the Catholic priesthood. They opposed every undertaking but such as had for its object the extension of their own power, and the erection of their church on the ruins of the Protestant establishment. This was their dream by night—their work by day; and this it was that made them the indefatigable allies of the Association (hear, hear). In such a state of things, it was wholly impossible that the Government could go on. The Association must be put down without delay, or the Association would put down the Government of Ireland (cheers).

Mr. Crew said, that this attempt to check the public feeling would be wholly ineffectual. If put down in one shape, the Association would raise its head in another; and the very attempt might stir up consequences, which, for the peace of Ireland, ought most carefully to be avoided. The Catholic interests in Ireland were not what they had been. Those interests were represented by the Association, and instead of the dissensions which had formerly existed, all classes were at present united in the attempt to recover what they knew to be their just claims. They were now no longer ignorant of their strength, they felt their grievances, and they were resolved to apply the whole of that strength in the just and lawful attempt to obtain redress.

Mr. Spring Rice lamented sincerely the existence of any associations, whether Orange or Catholic; and if it were proved that they were dangerous, and that the remedy proposed was an efficient one, he would be the last man to oppose it. But where was there any evidence before the house which it could safely receive? An hon. gent. had referred to the intemperate conduct of the priesthood; but where was the proof by which he substantiated that statement? The papers produced by way of proof were the Dublin newspapers (hear, hear). The hon. gent. had observed that there were no Orange Lodges in Ireland. But in his Majesty's speech an intention was announced of treating all parties impartially. The bill, then, would have to cope with a phantom on one hand, while, on the other, it would act against the whole population of Ireland. The hon. gent. had quoted speeches which had been made at the Association. He could not justify those speeches; but, he was not therefore prepared to condemn the Association. He knew of no assembly, not even that in which he had the honour of standing, of which the proceedings and debates could be wholly justified. Had there never been resolutions entered on the journals of that house, which no man of common sense would attempt to justify? A resolution had been come to that two and two made five instead of four; would it be fair to conclude that all the other resolutions of the house were of a similar character? He only claimed, then, for the Association, that indulgence to which every public assembly was entitled (hear, hear). As to the alleged violence of the Association, it should be remembered that the two parties were not upon equal grounds. If the party in possession of all the power and influence, should use violent language, it could not be too severely blamed; but if the excluded party, smarting under a sense of wrongs, loaded with burdens and degraded into an undeserved inferiority, should utter its complaints in language partaking of the violence of its grief, could not this be in some degree excused? But the hon. gent. had not acted fairly. In the extracts which he had made from the Dublin papers, he had shown only one side of the picture. He knew there were many speeches of a directly contrary tendency. Lord Killeen, whose character and high station would be duly weighed, had lately observed, from the chair of the Association, that "The Catholics of Ireland could not obtain their emancipation without the co-operation of their Protestant countrymen." He recommended them, therefore, to be temperate. He reminded them that their enemies were on the watch, and that any want of moderation on their part would betray them into the meshes of those enemies. He added, "Let me adjure you, not by the hatred you bear to any men, or to any class of men, for I hope you entertain no such feeling; but by your regard for your own rights—by the love you bear to your children—by the memory of your forefathers, whom neither promises nor threats could induce to forgo that faith which they prized more than their lives or happiness—by your love of liberty, and by your veneration for the constitution—by all these, I adjure you to abstain from all threats and from all violent measures. I recommend you to meet the acts of the legislature, whatever they may be, with the firmness of men, but with the submission of subjects." This speech had been received with great applause by the Association; and even if it were the only such instance, it justified him in calling upon the house not to pass the bill upon no better authority than the statements of Irish newspapers. When a complaint was made last session that the magistracy of Ireland had not abstained from taking improper fees, it was at the time indignantly contradicted; but it had been proved in the committee above stated, that practices of the most iniquitous description had occurred under the authority of the magistracy. When it was proposed to establish petty sessions, it was said that that measure would remove all ground of complaint, because one magistrate would be brought to act as a watch upon another, and it would be impossible for any of the body to take illegal fees, or pursue other improper practices. The evidence before the committee up stairs had, however, shown that the measure had failed in that view. It had been made apparent in the same committee, that there was a general disposition on the part of the people of Ireland against the law. That was not at all surprising, considering the manner in which law was administered. By a return which had been laid upon the table, it appeared that in the course of six years, 6000 persons had been committed under the distillery laws. Those persons were of the poorer classes, upon whom those laws pressed with peculiar severity. In the examination before the commission of inquiry, a witness was asked, "Did it ever occur to you, that it would be desirable to distil fine spirit in order to supply the tables of those who have been accustomed to use potem" (illicit whisky)? the witness answered, that he thought not, "for, except from the dignitaries of the church, the officers of the army, and the magistrates, there was no demand for illicit spirits" (a laugh). These, then, were the persons who countenanced the violation of the law. It was impossible that the population of Ireland should contemplate such a system with respect. He did not censure in every particular the administration of law in Ireland. He paid a willing tribute to the merit of the Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench in Ireland; although he would not travel into a neighbouring court, where buffoonery supplied the place of learning, and the pun of the day was substituted in the place of law. In the observations of the hon. under-Sec. for Ireland respecting the Archbishop of Tuam, he had not been quite explicit. The Catholics did once entertain an affectionate regard for that prelate, which they displayed on one occasion by assembling of their own accord, and getting in his harvest for him; and it was not until the Archbishop went forth on a crusade of proselytism against the Catholics, that any change in their feelings took place. It was lamentable to contrast the present with the last reign, which was, with respect to the Catholics, a reign of concession. But in the present reign, and under different circumstances, as regarded the feelings of the Sovereign, they were called upon to pass penal laws against the Catholics; for he considered the present bill in no other light than a penal law. If the rt. hon. Sec. should succeed in putting down the present mode of discussion, the Catholics would seek for other modes; so that the bill would be inoperative for good, though not for evil. It was the first measure which would bring the legislature in contact with the peasant. There was not a man who had subscribed his penny to the Association who would not feel, if the bill should pass, that the arm of Parliament was raised against him. He therefore implored them to pause before they took a step which would weaken that feeling of respect for Parliament and the constituted authorities of the country, amongst the Irish people, which it ought to be every man's wish to strengthen (hear, hear).

Mr. Brownlow defended the hon. Sec. for Ireland, and affirmed that under the beneficent administration of the Marquis Wellesley, Ireland had passed from rebellion to tranquillity. That tranquillity was again in danger from the effects of the Catholic Association; and the present bill had originated in the necessity of restoring that authority of Government, which had been usurped by the Association. Much did he wish that the petition which he had the honour to present last session, and which he supported with such remonstrances as he thought the subject merited, had met with the attention it deserved. But the hon. Sec. for Foreign Affairs spoke of the Catholic Association as a kind of safety-valve, through which much bad feeling escaped—as a mere exuberance on the surface of the political body, which was an indication of the healthfulness of the system, and which, if left to itself, would in proper time disappear. But now the tone was changed; for a summary measure was proposed for putting down unlawful associations. And what associations? Why the Catholic Association, and the Catholic Association alone. If the measure trench upon the rights of the people, the blame ought to rest where alone it was due—on the Catholic Association. He must state, that since the meetings of the Association, the Orangemen, sworn or unsworn, and indeed the whole Protestant population, had surpassed all former examples of forbearance and moderation, as the Association in the insults and threats which they directed against them, had exceeded all former instances of violence. The Protestant gentlemen of Ireland, in the relations of parents, landlords and magistrates, followed the precepts of their religion, by studying the good of all committed to their charge, in a manner not to be surpassed by any similar body of men in any country. He contended, therefore, that the measure under discussion had been called for solely by the Catholic Association; and as children not sick, were sometimes obliged to take physic to encourage others to whom the dose was necessary, so must the whole of Ireland be subjected to the proposed law; the innocent suffer for the guilty—the just for the unjust—those whose object was to support order for those whose only object was to involve the country in confusion (hear, hear). The disturbances in Ireland had been ascribed to the exertions of the missionaries, and to the introduction of that wicked book, the Bible. He was sorry to hear such an effect attributed to a book which had ushered peace and good will into the world. He denied that the respectable gentlemen, who had proceeded to Ireland on the part of the London Hibernian Society, had been sent on an expedition of proselytism. Was it proselytizing to distribute the Bible, and in the Irish language too? Was it proselytizing to pay Catholic schoolmasters—to send round Catholic inspectors to all the schools which they had established? The fact was, that it was not against proselytizing that the Catholics were opposed, but against education of any kind; for the Catholic faith was founded on ignorance, and they were afraid that education would extinguish it (hear, hear). With the exception of Lord Killeen's speech, he could find nothing but mischief in all that had been said, written or done, by the Association. But the discussion on the present subject should not be confined to what had been said or done by the Association. The mere fact of assembling was a contravention of the provisions of the Convention Act, and a peace officer was authorized to dissolve an assembly of the kind specified in the act, on simply finding them together. In 1811, a court of justice, in speaking of the act, declared that the exceptions which had been made in favour of the House of Commons and Convocation, much as they had been ridiculed by a learned gent. (Mr. Denman), proved the length to which the legislature intended to push the principle of the act, and that they were obliged to make those specific exceptions in consequence of the largeness of its wording. Let not the friends of the Catholic question oppose this measure. The Association had done much to retard the progress of that question (hear, hear). Such had been the bad effect produced by the Association, that Protestants who some time ago would willingly have signed petitions in favour of the Catholics, could now by no means be induced to do so. He admitted that the Association was now a most powerful body. In the beginning it was insignificant; but now it contained amongst its members, peers, and the sons of peers, and the Catholic hierarchy; and every man who had contributed one penny towards the rent, felt himself identified with its interests, and concerned for its existence (hear, hear). He stated these facts to show the urgency of immediately putting down the Association. How did the case stand? The Association said, "Give us emancipation; admit us to Parliament." He would suppose that granted;—that the Catholics were admitted to those offices which were looked upon as constituting the government of the state; for hon. gent. opposite thought that concession should not stop short of that. Then would not the Association, having the complete leadership of the people, say—"Give us the church property; we are the people of Ireland, to whom that property was originally given?" Was it consistent with common sense or experience, to suppose that the people of Ireland would be content with certain privileges being conferred on the laity, when the Church—the god of her idolatry—received nothing (hear, hear)? And if Parliament should reject the demand, the Association would reply, "We are six millions of people; one mind animates us; we can levy taxes; give us the church property, or we will shake the kingdom to the centre." That such would be the result of the continuance of the Association, he entertained no doubt. Such societies uniformly ended in mischief. Upon this point he might quote the words of the present Chief Justice of Ireland, on the occasion of the trial of the Catholic Committee in 1811:—"What man can answer for himself in going into a well-constituted political society? His first steps are good, his first motives pure. His passions warm as he proceeds; applause intoxicates him; success encourages and inflames him; he begins a patriot, and ends a revolutionist. I well remember—who can forget it?—the first national assembly of France, composed of every thing most honourable for talent and respectability in the kingdom, called together for the noblest and purest purposes. What was the result? The wise, and good, and virtuous, were put down by the factious demagogues. They were no longer masters of their will; they knew not the lengths to which they were going; they were drawn on by an increasing attraction, step by step, to the vortex in which were buried even the ruins of every establishment, religious and political, and from whose womb sprang that colossal despotism which now bestrides mankind." He thought the warning contained in that passage was as applicable to the Association, as to the Catholic Committee. He therefore earnestly hoped, that Parliament would adopt this measure (cheers).

Sir J. Mackintosh said, that he listened on all occasions with pleasure and respect to the hon. gent. who had just spoken, as well as to the hon. Under-Sec. (Dawson), considering them as the avowed and able advocates of a party which was, unfortunately, too powerful in Ireland. He should not, however, reply to them at any length, because much of what they had said was more tainted by the acrimony of Irish party, than a member of Great Britain could bring his mind to consider worthy of much importance, when he came to discuss a question of such interest to the empire as the present; although one of the observations of the last speaker was important, as openly admitting the real purpose of the bill. But he rose to employ the first moments of returning strength and health, in performing a great duty on a question of vital interest. He rose to protest against the stigma thrown on the Catholic cause, by the alleged misconduct of the Catholic body; he rose to protest against the new attempt to silence the complaints of the Catholics, without redressing their wrong; to protest against this new discouragement, added to the discouragement of centuries; to protest against a measure, which had been justly characterized as a bill to relieve the Government from the necessity of doing justice to Ireland (cheers). His zeal in behalf of the Catholics was not—as his rt. hon. friend (Mr. Tierney) had said of himself, in a speech exhibiting an unrivalled union of sense and wit, which closed the debate last night—connected with a love of their principles. He venerated the Reformation, and the principles upon which it had proceeded—freedom of opinion, and security from persecution. They who did not uphold those principles were no true Reformers. Protestants they might call themselves, but they were only Papists in Protestant clothing; men desirous of setting up small Poperies in the Protestant church, in lieu of that greater Popery which had covered all Europe with its shadow. So long as the Catholic had remained the natural ally of civil and religious tyranny, so long, had he then lived, he would have remained his mortal enemy. The same principles which would influence his vote that evening in favour of the Catholics, would have impelled him to draw his sword against them at the battle of the Boyne. The principles of civil and religious liberty, established at that glorious Revolution—revealed first to the world, in the Reformation, by men who neither understood nor sought to practise them; but since appre-

elated, acted upon and fought for, by men whose hearts were purer, or whose intellects were more enlightened—those principles formed 'a creed: in them he had lived, and in them he hoped he should die; and in support of those principles it was—never on any occasion pressing upon his mind more strongly—that he now rose in defence of the Catholic cause (cheers). It was now thirty years or more since two systems had uniformly prevailed with regard to Irish affairs. One set of gentlemen ascribed all evils to the conduct of the Catholic priesthood and laity; traced every outrage to Catholic Conventions, Committees, and Associations; and looked at those tumults, which were only symptoms of discontent, as constituting the essence of the disease. Another party, he must say, of higher bearing in the world—persons more thought of in the present age, and likely to be better known by posterity—had adopted a more comprehensive theory; they believed that the miseries which preyed upon Ireland arose from the hatred which burned between two factions, the conquerors and the conquered; and that the successful plan for restoring health would be, to negotiate a reconciliation between the parties on the basis of equal rights and privileges (hear, hear, hear). They did not think, like the other party, that the world was to be saved by coercion. They did not think it wisest to treat the outward symptoms, instead of the disease itself. Their remedy, however, was not proposed as a nostrum—not as any thing which would effect a sudden cure—but as something absolutely necessary to apply in the beginning, in order to render the body politic capable of enduring and profiting by all those circumstances which slowly contribute to the advantage of communities (hear, hear). Now if there were any truth in what the author of the Irish Union (Mr. Pitt) had uttered during his life, or in what his friends had declared for him after his death, this remedy—in fact, Catholic Emancipation, had been the only real ground for that Union. The Union with Scotland had proceeded upon a different principle—the preservation of the Protestant succession in the house of Hanover; an Union which removed the discontented parties from a Parliament in Scotland, where their power was considerable, to one in England, where it became comparatively slight. But, in Ireland, the discontents prevailed among a different class of people; the Union—except in the way of Catholic Emancipation—could not remove them—could not touch them—could neither weaken nor satisfy them a jot (hear, hear). Accordingly, Lord Grenville, a distinguished follower of Mr. Pitt, observed, in presenting a Catholic petition to the House of Lords in 1803;—"We are now called upon to perform the duty imposed upon us by the Union." He meant to speak disparagingly of no man on account of his political opinions; but he would say, that ever since the Union, all the talent and genius of the British nation, with one distinguished exception, had ranged itself on the side of Emancipation. The House of Commons had passed a bill for this purpose; and the House of Lords, in 1812, had rejected, by a majority of only one, a resolution proposed by the Marquis Wellesley, pledging itself favourably to entertain the question. The same feeling prevailed throughout the kingdom—not merely among the educated, but among those who were most likely to be swayed by habit and prejudice. There was not a class of men in England, among whom it would now be possible to raise the yell of "No Popery." It would not now excite a mob to the most vulgar outrage (hear, hear, hear). He dwelt upon this fact, because he heard it asserted, that there was a feeling of hostility to the Catholic claims in this country. He did not believe the fact; and they did ill, believe it or not, who lightly gave it currency. Nothing could be so fatal as to teach six millions of Irish that twelve millions of English were their enemies, inclined to hate, or to despise, or to debar them of those liberties which were their own proudest boast among the nations (cheering). Were he a Catholic, he should feel much disappointment, if, in the 25th year of a union formed expressly for the sake of emancipation, under a Lord Lieutenant whom all parties agreed in praising, an Irish Attorney-General, whom it would be injustice to compare with any of his predecessors—under all circumstances of seeming advantage, he found the Government practising the old tricks, and repeating the old measures of coercion, of which a series had been opened to them in a long and alarming vista by the Irish Secretary, and engaging in an inglorious scuffle with Boards and Committees, in which there was no honour in victory, and great danger in defeat (great cheering). In the remarks which he meant to offer, he would adopt that course which had already suggested itself to the logical mind of the Attorney-General for Ireland. He proposed to inquire—first, whether the intended law would, or would not, be an infraction of popular privileges—next, whether its operation would not injure the Catholic cause—and lastly, whether, through that operation, it would not be pregnant with danger to the British empire. The first argument set up for the bill was its necessity. No man was more disposed to hold necessity "the plea of tyrants and the creed of slaves" than he was; still it might sometimes form the justification of vigour—where it existed, it was, truly enough, not only suprema, but sola lex; superseding all other powers, and exacting absolute obedience. In the first place, it was of great importance that he should distinguish between convenience and necessity; because he by no means allowed the same force to the first of those pleas as to the latter; and—for the rest—he never meant to deny that all associations, or leagues, holy or unholy, or by whatever title they called themselves, which banded great bodies of men together, separating them from, and often making them hostile to, their fellow-citizens—he did not mean to deny that all such alliances were both inconvenient and undesirable. But he would entreat of any gent. intending to address the house, to look back at the history of all such associations, and see whether they had ever existed in a sound state of any community. If they looked to the most remarkable associations, would they find one which had been destroyed by coercive laws? Would they not find that laws, prosecutions, arms, had all been employed in vain?—and that they had never died unless of a natural death, through exhaustion of the zeal which produced them, or in consequence of concession or the removal of grievances? But the question was, how far a necessity existed in this case? The grounds of necessity were commonly mischief intended; mischief done, dangerous language uttered, and so forth. Now, with respect to mischief intended the Attorney-General for Ireland had distinctly acquitted the Catholic Association of any such intentions. The learned gent. had done more, for he had gone on to assign the reasons why he found it impossible to suspect any but good intentions on the part of the individuals of that body, and especially of that eloquent and celebrated person (Mr. O'Connell) who was the principal object of the proposed interposition of Parliament. The talents and fortune, the public and private situation of that gentleman—summi honores, res familiaris amplissima, uxor probatissima, opulentiissimi liberi—forbad any suspicion on his account. But if no mischief were intended, had any been actually done? The case for mischief done consisted in certain circumstances which had occurred in two particular trials at law; and it turned out that these prosecutions had not merely ended in acquittals, but that the judge upon the bench had thanked the counsel for the Association for his conduct of the prosecution; and that in the other, the same compliment from the same quarter had been paid to the Association itself. These were the mischiefs done, in virtue of which it was proposed to suspend the constitutional rights and privileges of six millions of persons (hear, hear). Now the rt. hon. Sec. (Peel) went beyond mischief done or even intended; and declared that if the Association continued, and especially if counter-associations among the Orangemen were formed, an end must soon be put to the administration of justice altogether; "for," he observed, "we stand in this predicament—every Catholic who subscribes to the rent will be interested in any trial in which the Association may be concerned; and so, pro defectu juratorum, we shall have no prosecutions; for such was the law in the case of The King v. Dolby." He gave the rt. hon. Sec. full credit for his argument; it had argued his bill out of the house; for, if there could be no prosecutions at the instance of the Association, where was the necessity for suppressing it? As to the charge of warm and indiscreet language, he should not follow it at length; if true, then that had only happened in the Association which must happen to all bodies of men in a similar situation. But the next charge was a heavy one; it was right that the house should well consider it. It consisted in two sentences of an address to the people of Ireland, published by the Association in 1824. He entreated hon. members to read over the whole address, with the exception of those two passages, and then to declare whether every remaining line was not written in a spirit of conciliation? He should consider it as the strongest proof he had ever met with of the blindness of party feeling, if any person could read it and entertain a different opinion. It was first objected to the address that, among other topics of dissuasion from outrage and violence, it was urged that Whiteboyism had "caused the death of many innocent persons." But could the house be ignorant that this was true? Some might blame the administration of the laws for this, but good sense must convince every man that it arose necessarily out of the employment of informers; and when this was considered, was not this very sentence a defence of the administration of the laws?—Was it not saying to every peasant—"You see your neighbours, whom you believe innocent, suffering by the law. This seems criminal to you; but we who know better, tell you, that individuals in authority are not to be blamed for occasional events of this nature; they are the natural results of that very state of society which turbulence must always produce." Then let the house observe with what caution the address avoided the most inflammatory topics. There was not a word about the Insurrection Act (loud cheers), a subject upon which one word would be sufficient. But the Association used every pains to avoid danger or offence; and their reward was a bill to put them down, and a charge of libelling those laws which it had been their anxiety to vindicate. He could not conceive a greater distortion of plain English, than the meaning which the rt. hon. Sec. (Goulburn) had put upon this address; its intent to pacify was so obvious! Next, for the word "hate," upon which so much stress had been laid, and of which he would only say, that he had never before heard the object of a word so much exaggerated, even by those who were apt to employ terms freely in their own case, which they blamed as freely in others. He had read of a kind of critics, who illustrated the value of the doctrines they preached, by their constant violation of the practice. This "hate," which the Attorney-General for Ireland, with a dignity worthy of his intellect, had disclaimed to notice, he could hardly make up his mind to treat seriously. Dr. Johnson had said of some friend of his, that he was a good hater—he hated a Whig, and he hated a Scotchman. Now, he had the honour to appear in both those characters; and was moreover a member of an institution which the doctor himself had founded. But he had very little doubt that, if the learned person could rise again, he should be able to conquer that hatred; indeed, he should only fear that the doctor might hold him very silly if he went so far as to notice it. For who supposed that hatred to a party implied any thing like hatred to the individuals who composed that party? Suppose he should say, he hated Tories—he should only use a natural language (laughter and cheering)—because he disliked their opinions. But, if these words were taken in their strictest sense, he should receive great injustice, inasmuch as many individuals for whom he had the highest respect and love, had chosen to take the name of an enemy to the house of Hanover. It was so with the Association—it was the party they meant, not the individuals. Would an historian be blamed for saying, that the evils of Ireland proceeded from the hatred of the rival factions which divided her? And besides—take the words in their broadest sense—how long had it been immoral to excite men's passions against their vices. If there were not a tendency to counteraction in men's vices, few would boast of very material virtues. He who by rousing one ill disposition in a man's mind, found means to extinguish a worse, deserved to be applauded, not condemned. The adjuration of the Catholics, enlisted the passions on the side of peace. It was only saying in poetical terms, "By all you most hold ill, and by that vice which most naturally besets you; by your religious principles and your political privations, we adjure you to peace;" that is—"We adjure you to peace and forbearance, by those very principles which would induce you to a contrary conduct." He now came to the admission of the hon. member (Mr. Brownlow), that this measure was levelled at the Catholics alone. The proposition of equality was false; the partiality was avowed. Now the hon. member had said—speaking of the form of the proposed measure, and complaining of its affecting the Orange party, even in appearance—that there were some fathers, who, if it were necessary to give one child in a family a dose of physic, would make all the rest take it for company. Now he was a father and a grandfather, and he would tell the hon. member what his view would be on such an occasion. He would give the sick child a dose of physic, and the others a glass of lemonade—but then he would tell the children who had the lemonade to make wry faces, which the hon. gent. did not do. And, after all, was equality possible? The bill might act upon the Association, but not against the Orange Societies; for the proceedings of the Catholics were open, and therefore could be come at; but the Orange party would evade the law as they did already, by that secrecy which formed the essence of their proceedings. Besides, the Orange party was made a party by the law, they were brought together on grand juries, in corporations, and at Quarter Sessions; with them association was a formality which might be dispensed with. They, therefore, would not be injured by the bill; they would not suffer, like the Catholics, from inactivity. Inactivity was no evil to a body in possession of monopoly. They could well afford to let things remain as they were, who had the whole sweep of the kingdom in their power, especially if the friends of freedom were compelled to be idle; but the parties were not equal (cheers), and this measure, pretending to be impartial, was most unequal and unjust. To revert to another topic, the learned Attorney-General for Ireland, unable to rely upon mischief done, and not prepared to allege any thing like mischief intended, expatiated on the danger which might result from the ascendancy of the Association over the minds of the people of Ireland. To this, then, they came at last; the learned gent. spoke not of what had been done—his case was on a may! Certainly the present was the first occasion on which it had been proposed to suspend the liberties of six millions of people, on a possibility. But as no cause could be shown to justify the measure, the next course was to show that it required no justification. Accordingly, the learned gent. declared that it was no encroachment on popular privileges. This was, plainly speaking, a contradiction in terms; for, to say that a limitation of an ancient right of meeting was not an encroachment, was much the same as to assert that a whole was not equal to its parts. Whether it was just or necessary to limit that right, might be a question; but not to see that limitation was innovation was impossible. He would now advert to the assertion that the proceedings of the Association were injurious to the Catholic interests. He denied the fact. But it was curious to observe that this objection came from the avowed opponents of the Catholic claims. Was not this fact sufficient to prove to the Catholics that that body was acting usefully for their interests? If it were not unnatural to be taught by an enemy, it would be the height of folly to be advised by him on that point on which he avowed his greatest hostility (hear, hear). Next, it was said, that this Association interfered with the administration of justice. To tamper with the course of justice should, certainly, and in this country, where it is fairly administered, would, be looked upon with alarm. But were circumstances the same in Ireland? The house were engaged not long ago in an inquiry into the conduct of a sheriff of Dublin. They had there abundant proofs of the interference with the course of justice on one side. They had seen how attempts had been made, and not without success, to tamper with and bias the regular course of the law. Remembering those facts, he would ask the house, were there not some grounds for interference on the other side? Might not such interference correct the poison which had been infused into the fountain of justice, by those presumptuous assertors of the moral obligation of an oath, who had marched away from the bar of that house, triumphing over Parliament (cheers)? An evil of such magnitude on one side must give rise, however objectionable both might be, to its corrective on the other. A learned gent. (Mr. Doherty) had profusely eulogised the learned persons who administered the law in Ireland; both judges and magistrates. The purity of the administration of justice was not complained of, as far as the learned persons appointed to preside over the several courts were concerned; but what he complained of was, that attempts were made to prejudice it by the conduct of a faction supposed to be hostile to the interests of the great body of the people—that the means of doing so were exclusively in the hands of that faction, and that they were disposed to use them against a conquered and oppressed party. It was impossible to expect that one portion of men, acting on principles hostile to the feelings, wishes, and hopes of another, could be impartial towards that other, where the power lay so entirely in their own hands. That they were not so, was notorious: and in fact, the assumed resentment of the learned gent. looked like a vain attempt, by vague panegyric, to exempt men from the common failings of human nature (hear, hear). The success of the present measure would be looked upon as a victory over the Catholics by the Orange men. It was a maxim with all who had any knowledge of the world, that all men knew what best contributed to their own interests. The present measure was unanimously called for by the Orangemen. It was deprecated with equal unanimity by the Catholics. Both parties saw how their separate objects might be promoted or retarded by this bill. It was beginning a system of coercion which would be injurious as a precedent, and the more so as it would be found ineffectual. The bill, it was said, was in the spirit of the Convention Act, and it went upon the assumption that the Association, if not the chosen, were the adopted representatives of the Catholics. Now what was meant by "adopted representatives" but that the Catholic leaders had the confidence of the people, as acting against their opponents? And what would happen if they should still find the way to keep up that confidence? Would not another bill become necessary in the spirit of this, as this was thought expedient in the spirit of the Convention Act? Would it not be thought right to put down leadership on the one side, and confidence on the other? Was it to be expected that such a system could be continued?

If it did, the consequence would be, that anger would be succeeded by anger, and irritation by irritation, and the results would be similar to those of our early disputes with America. Mr. Burke had pointed out the consequences which would ensue, from attempts to coerce a feeling which could not be controlled while the evil which gave rise to it remained. Human nature had not altered since then. The causes which produced the irritation of public feeling in Ireland were not the same as those which existed in America, but they arose from circumstances which were much more difficult to deal with. A question of religion was mixed up with the present struggles of the Catholics to free themselves from the penal code. To vex a man for his religion was to oppress him for that which he held most sacred; and was ever considered as the most tyrannical indignity which the wickedness of man could exercise towards his fellow-creature. What was it which caused the union of all classes of Catholics in Ireland? A general feeling that all classes were equally the objects of penal laws. It was true, that in effect, they operated on the few of the higher ranks; but they were not the less bitterly felt by the many, for the high were excluded for the same cause as the low. The insult was common to all. An hon. member had alluded to the Bible Society, and to the reception which some of its missionaries had met with in Ireland. He honoured the intentions of that society; but he did not at all wonder at the opposition which they had met with. The Catholic priest inculcated, that the sacred word contained in the Scriptures was not to be interpreted but by the church. That doctrine was not a new one; nor was it confined to one religion. He would state what had been said on this subject, not by a rev. M'Sweeney, nor a rev. O'Shaughnessy, but by a writer who differed widely from them on theological matters, and who had said, that the Scriptures were only to be explained according to the Book of Common Prayer. The opinion was that of Chillingworth, and of the writer of the book from which he quoted it, the right rev. Dr. Marsh. If the missionaries found difficulties in Ireland, let them not ascribe them to an hostility to the Bible, but to the conduct of those from whom the missionaries were supposed to come. It was believed, and not unreasonably, that they who endeavoured to keep the Catholic excluded from his civil rights, could not come with any friendly disposition to interfere with religious belief. He had alluded to the possibility of separation between the two countries. Was this measure calculated to cement the tie between the two countries? His hopes, however, rested on the good sense of the people on whom these indignities were heaped. If he were considered worthy of advising the Catholics of Ireland, he would say to them, that to sever themselves from this country would be the beginning of a worse system than any they had yet experienced; it would be the last day of England's greatness, but it would be Ireland's ruin. He trusted that no feeling of the kind could be entertained by the people of Ireland, though such measures as this were not ill calculated to excite them. The proposed bill he viewed as a cruel addition to the penal code. It was a part of the prison-dress—a remnant of the fetters which were still suffered to gall that country (hear, hear). He would ask how could Government think of providing for the lesser danger, and neglect to obviate the greater? How could any man imagine that an effectual remedy could be applied to the effect, while the cause was allowed to continue? For his own part, he was too far advanced in life to be influenced by any fears of witnessing the consequences of these measures; but he could not disguise his apprehension that there were, among hon. gents. opposite, some who would live to rue their effects, and repent their rashness, when too late (loud cheers).

Mr. North said, that the learned gent. instead of confining himself to the question before the house, had entrenched himself in the strong bulwark of the Catholic question, from which he scarcely deigned to look down on the actual subject of debate. Instead of following the learned gent. through the course of his extended arguments, he would go at once to that with which he had set out. The learned gent. had referred to the principles of 1688. Those principles he would not deny; but he would examine how far they were consistent with the proceedings of the Association. According to the principles of the constitution then established, the House of Commons were the sole representatives of the people. If this were so, it followed that any other assembly, however chosen or adopted, affecting to represent the people, must be unconstitutional. The Convention Act was passed for restraining the abuse of the representative principle, and that act had been violated by the Association. He cared not whether it was appointed by election before, or by adoption after its assembling; it was enough for him that it existed. If a stranger came into his house, controlled his servants and acted as if he had a right to be there, was he to be told under such circumstances, that he was not to consider why the stranger came, or how he was to be ejected, but whether he had got in through the door or the window (hear, hear)? So of the Association. It was of no consequence how it was appointed; it existed, and was acting mischievously; and the only question was, ought it to be repressed? Could any man doubt that this Association affected to represent the people? A learned member (Mr. Brougham) had drawn a distinction between actual and virtual representation; but this difference was not recognized by the constitution. It was repudiated by the Association. If Mr. O'Connell were told, that the Association was not elected—that there was no polling—no show of hands—he would answer, “I care not for the forms and shadows of election. If you doubt that we are really the representatives of the Irish Catholics, ask the priests, who support us; ask the peasantry, who contribute to our treasury; ask the peers who are enrolled amongst our members. If this were so, the only question was how to suppress it. The rent, in amount, was nothing; but considered as an index of the public mind, was of vast importance. It led the people to look up to other authorities besides the constituted authorities of the country, and to confide in a new source of power, which it at once created and fostered (hear, hear). Every man who paid rent was pledged to the Association; he was with it “for better and for worse, for richer and for poorer;” he was wedded to it for life, and inseparably linked to its fortunes. This was an intolerable evil;

but a still greater was behind. The Dublin Association was comparatively harmless; but the rent meetings, which were minor associations in the country, were pregnant with incalculable mischief. There the people were harangued from their altars by the subordinate orators and agents—men as devoid of caution as of education—not controlled, as their leaders in Dublin, by the censorship of the press and the force of public opinion. From the Association at Dublin there flowed a stream of sedition and turbulence into the country, whence it returned to the Association in a thousand currents, full of every thing mean, narrow and illiberal. Thus there was a perpetual interchange between two streams of bitter waters, which flowing, one from the Association at Dublin, and the other from the rent-meetings in the country, formed a whirlpool of prejudice, in which peace and good order were certain to suffer shipwreck. The leaders, in the first, had no control; in the latter, there was a power, before which even O'Connell trembled: those who wielded it were at once his ministers and his masters, and governed him even at the moment they professed to obey him (hear, hear). It had been observed, that in the Association there were no debates; its members were all of one mind. The observation was just; but had not been pushed to its full extent. For what was the consequence? Why, no man could obtain credit by ingenuity of reply or liveliness of debate; his only chance of distinction was by exceeding the violence of his associates; so that the only emulation excited was an emulation of intemperance. Thus, what was violent yesterday, was considered temperate to-day; and what to-day was bordering on violence, would to-morrow be too rapid for the public palate. Their objects, too, were daily varying. No man could say that he knew them (hear, hear). O'Connell himself, lord of the ascendant as he was in that Association, could not explain them. It was in the nature of these conventions to grow worse in language and design; and the Association of next year, if not suppressed, would be even a greater nuisance than now (cheers). Then as to their interference with the administration of justice, he would refer to the case of the soldier as a specimen of the mischief which their proceedings were likely to produce. If he were asked how it was that the soldier was acquitted, he would answer, because truth had a buoyancy and ascendancy in its own nature, which, when fair play was allowed, was certain to make it triumph. He would suppose, however, that the soldier had been convicted instead of acquitted. The language of hon. gentls. opposite would then have been—"Here is an instance in which guilt would have gone unpunished had it not been for the exertions of this Association." It was assumed, that there was a mal-administration of justice in Ireland, and that the Association was of use as a counterpoise to it. Now, from 1811, when he was first called to the bar, to the ignoring of the bill against Mr. O'Connell, he had always seen justice fairly administered between Catholic and Protestant. He stated that fact not as an advocate but as a witness; and his testimony, though it might not receive weight from his rank, was entitled to respect from its sincerity. Mr. Cobden, who within the two last months had become the oracle of the Catholics, had given them sound advice upon this subject. He had desired them to make out a list of the cases in which justice had been denied, or in which oppression and violence had received a sanction from the law; and he had told them, with his usual good sense, that the people of England would pay more attention to such a list, with the names attached to it, than they would to all the declamation of their clubs. The Catholics, however, had drawn out no such list, because they could not; no such cases of successful injustice existing, except in the heated imaginations of those who had fabricated them. The learned member who spoke last, had offered no other proof of the mal-administration of justice, except the general principle that men would oppress wherever they could with impunity. But if the charge were true, would gentlemen take the balance of justice out of the hands in which it was now placed, and confide it to the Association? Supposing that tranquillity were produced by such a measure, still might not the price paid for it be much too dear? Surely it would be so, if we sacrificed the dignity and authority of the Government to obtain it. Yet this was the proposition of the other side; they would consent to a divided authority and a divided allegiance, and would put a sceptre into the hands of O'Connell, and a broken reed into those of Lord Wellesley (great cheering). He would rather see the people of Ireland existing, according to the pithy language of the common law, in the fear of God and in the peace of our Lord the King, than in the peace of the Catholic Church and the fear of the Catholic Association (cheers). He had heard with great delight, an ingenious defence of the terms "by your hatred to Orangemen;" but its sophistry was too evident to deceive. It was a defence against which good sense and reason rose up in arms. A greater moralist than the learned gent. had asked—"Could grapes grow on thorns, or figs on thistles" (hear, hear)? Could peace be produced by appealing to the malevolence of human nature; and could men be encouraged in forbearance towards their fellow-citizens by appeals to the hatred which they bore them? However this sophistry might smooth over the matter in England, it would fail with the Protestants of Ireland. He had lived long enough in that country to know what was meant by "Orange." He had heard attempts to promote education among the lower classes of Ireland, as well as other beneficial measures, condemned as Orange systems. The term had a wide signification; it resembled the old Irish mantle described by Spenser—"it was a fit bed for a rebel, a good house for an outlaw, and a neat cloak for a thief" (cheers). In the whole proceedings of the Association, there was nothing which justified suspicion and inquiry, so much as that phrase. By the Catholics it would be applied to the whole Protestant body in Ireland; by the Protestants it would be construed—"Be calm, be tranquil for the present, Catholic brethren, for such is the interest of your resentment; but cherish at your hearths and on your altars, the ashes of an extinguishable hate against every Protestant; the time has not yet arrived when you can scatter them abroad with safety to yourselves, and ruin to your enemies" (great cheering from the ministerial benches). God forbid that he should ascribe these sentiments to every Catholic in Ireland; he knew that there were men among them who would disavow them with horror and disgust; men of as high honour and as fine feeling upon matters of religion as himself; but he regretted that they did not step forward to rescue their glorious cause from the hands which were now degrading it. The hon. member would have a civil war of vices in Ireland. Was it not a civil war of the vices which had so long been desolating Ireland;—a civil war which could not be terminated whilst phrases were used which must agitate the Protestant population. There was not a more high-spirited people in existence than the Protestants of Ireland; and the Catholics would never gain the concessions they desired, if, instead of holding out the right-hand of fellowship to their Protestant fellow-countrymen, they sought to create in their minds any feeling of alienation and alarm (cheers). It had been said that the Catholic Association was a counter-association. He denied it. If the Catholic Association had been instituted, when the Orange societies were in their strength, he might, though he questioned the policy, have admired the courage of those who entered into it; but it was instituted at a time when a command had gone forth from Government to discountenance them, and when even the arm of Government was uplifted to crush them (hear, hear); and if these societies were again rallying, which God forbid, it was in consequence of the re-action produced by the Catholic Association (cheers). One hon. member had admitted the existence of such re-action, but had attributed it to the Bible meetings which had recently taken place in Ireland. He had himself witnessed some of these meetings, and till they were broken up by the spirit of faction, a more gratifying spectacle could not be exhibited, as the people in every quarter displayed the greatest anxiety to obtain information about them. The agitation which now distracted Ireland could not be attributed to those meetings by any man who recollected the assertion of the learned gent. that free discussion on religious subjects was the right of every man, established at the reformation. But it was said that this agitation should be tranquillized by the concession of the Catholic claims. He, however, would put down the Association first, and leave Catholic Emancipation to come after it (hear, hear). He had been told that this law would be evaded; he thought better of the loyalty, better of the good sense, better, he would say, of the policy which distinguished the majority of the Catholic leaders; for if there was one way more than another by which they could heap coals of fire on the heads of their opponents, it would be by exhibiting coolness, forbearance and moderation under the law. By so doing they would win the hearts of the people of England, and would thus merit and obtain that success which no man wished them more cordially than he did (cheers). He supported this measure, therefore, because it was in accordance with the spirit of the constitution (roars of hear, hear, from the Opposition, continued for some minutes)—because it was congenial to that part of the constitution which made that house the sole representative of the people (cheers from the ministerial benches)—and because it was calculated to uphold the authority of the law, the dignity of the Government, and, above all, the peace and prosperity of Ireland (great cheering).

Dr. Lushington had heard the speech of the member for Londonderry (Mr. Dawson), not only with feelings of reprobation, but of dismay. In the sweeping condemnation which he had passed upon the Catholics of Ireland, he had uttered a libel upon the Catholic religion, and had given publicity to sentiments which were calculated to annihilate all respect for the Catholic priesthood. He would ask the House to consider what the consequences would be, when an Under-Sec. of the Home Department indulged in rancorous invectives, not against individuals, but against a whole order of men, so important as the Catholic priesthood? He denied the justice of trying any order of men—even the Association, by one or two of its isolated measures. That house, if tried by the same test; would fall under public censure; for he could select several of its acts, which no member would be found hardy enough to defend. He would illustrate this proposition by a more familiar instance; by, that of a society which was to some extent under the patronage of the Sec. for the Home Department, the University Club (a laugh). He was informed, that in the records of this club were two entries of this nature, one following the other:—“Proposed—The Memoirs of Harriette Wilson—Ordered” (loud laughter); “Proposed—a plain Bible—rejected” (roars of laughter). What the Memoirs of Harriette Wilson were, he could not say; but he had heard that many lords of Parliament (a laugh)—ay, and some hon. members of that house (hear, hear) felt an extraordinary interest in the work. Now if the character of the University Club, consisting of sages of the law and dispirited of the church, were to be tried by this isolated fact, which appeared on its own records, might it not be said that it was a society which read loose books, and rejected the Bible” (great cheering from the Opposition)? There were two associations like that now attempted to be put down, which had existed for some time unquestioned;—the dissenting Society for the Protection of Religious Liberty, which had not only a regular committee of finance, but a well-supported fund for conducting prosecutions, and the Society of Friends, who contributed to a similar fund. It was absolutely necessary that the weaker should associate against the stronger. Restore strength to the weak—remove disabilities, and these effects would cease of themselves. The learned gent. who spoke last had asserted, to the astonishment of the house, that there had been no mal-administration of justice in Ireland since 1811. What was meant, then, by the late reformation of the Irish magistracy? That reformation pre-supposed that those magistrates had been found inadequate to their duties. And yet, in the face of this fact, and of others equally striking, it was confidently maintained that the administration of justice in Ireland had been pure, unswayed, and equal to all classes. After all that had been said on the subject of the Association, by way of vindicating this Bill, the sole tangible accusation against that body, was the phrase—“By the hatred you bear to Orangemen.” But the malevolence attributed to those words had vanished in his learned friend’s interpretation, by which they were clearly shown to import “by the hostility you bear to Orange principles.” It was impossible for any unprejudiced man to vict Ireland, and not to hold those principles in abhorrence. It was impossible to have heard the speech of the hon. member for Londonderry, and not to feel it. It was said that the principal support which the Association derived for the purposes of Catholic Emancipation was due to the efforts of the priesthood. Was that meant, to be assigned as a reason for passing this bill? If it were, he begged to ask, whether this bill was meant to go the length of suppressing the efforts of that priesthood for the attainment of the Catholic claims? He had intended to address some further observations to the house; but at that late hour he should content himself with expressing his decided opposition to the measure.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer: Exhausted as the house must be with the discussion that had already taken place, he yet felt some anxiety to express his sentiments on the matter, not merely from the importance of the subject, but also upon some grounds applying personally to himself. He had observed, with no ordinary satisfaction, that in what had fallen from those who had opposed the measure most warmly, little or no attempt had been made to vindicate either the existence or the acts of the Catholic Association (hear, hear). On the contrary, almost every individual who had spoken on this occasion, had studiously abstained from that line of defence. The whole gist of the objections upon which they had opposed the bill, had been simply, that there was another remedy, which would render the measure unnecessary (hear, hear); that the whole mischief arose from the misconduct of the administration and more particularly of that part who were favourable to the Catholic claims, but who did not think proper, at present, to bring forward that remedial measure (cheers from the Opposition). Now as he felt himself to be in this situation—in the situation of those who were charged with this heavy responsibility; and as he should be deeply afflicted if he thought—humble individual as he was—that any part of the miseries of Ireland could be justly attributed to any act of his, he felt anxious to advert to this part of the question. Gentlemen should recollect the circumstances under which the present Government was formed. The administration which preceded it, Mr. Perceval's, had opposed the Catholic claims as a Government question. There might be differences of opinion among the members of that Government as to the grounds of their opposition; some opposing it on principle—others on present expediency; but, as a Government, they opposed the measure. On the death of Mr. Perceval, the House of Commons, disinclined to support a Government systematically opposed to the Catholic question, carried up an address to the Crown, praying that an administration might be formed, deserving the public confidence. Various negotiations were entered into for the attainment of that object, which failed, as he thought, through a blunder of those who supported the measure of Emancipation; for after two attempts to form a Government which should carry it, one was at last organized, in which it was agreed that the question should not be carried (cheers from the Opposition). In making this declaration, he only meant to say, that they could not form a Government out of principles that did not exist. And therefore he contended that his colleagues, by uniting to form a Government, were not answerable for the evil complained of in respect to the Catholic question. He would add, too, that the Government so formed, possessed the confidence of the house and the people. But then it was argued, that though this was a proper principle enough, when the Government came into office, they ought not to act upon it now. They said that the measure of Emancipation was a safe as well as a remedial course; and that Government need not hesitate to adopt it. But when it was replied, that it would, of necessity, break up the Government, they said, "No, that was the last thing they wished for" (a laugh). They used the most ingenious, and—looking to the quarter whence they came—the most unworthy sarcasms (hear, hear) in commenting upon the conduct of administration. They assumed throughout, that there were members of that Government who sacrificed their own principles and duties for the single object of remaining in office, and with a view to its emoluments (hear, hear). This unworthy sarcasm, he was conscious, applied to none of his colleagues. He believed it never would apply to the learned and noble lord who held the seals (cries of hear, hear!), nor to the First Lord of the Treasury, nor to the Sec. for Foreign Affairs. It was admitted that the present administration was doing very well, and he might add, without vanity, that the country was satisfied with it (cheering). It was equally agreed that an attempt to carry the Catholic question would break up the Government. Then should those members of administration, who supported the measure, turn round on their colleagues, who conscientiously opposed it? He should regard such a proceeding as an act of treachery, of which one effect would be to deprive the men who had done it of all public confidence, and so at once to incapacitate them for carrying the very measure they had to press, against strong opposition. The argument, therefore, between gentlemen on the other side and the Government, stood thus:—They said to Government, "For all the evils that have happened you have a remedy;" and Government, admitting they had the remedy, declared, "We shall not attempt to use it, for we think it impossible to attempt to carry the measure with any prospect of success." He must certainly say—that as far as his observation went, a strong feeling existed in the country against this measure (cries of No, no, and hear, hear!)—and he must believe that such feeling arose, in a very great degree, from the acts of the Catholic Association. It was true, the measure might pass, as it had already passed, that house. But in the other house there had always been, and would be, a large majority against it. It was powerfully opposed by another influential body—the clergy (hear, hear). This circumstance had been spoken of as matter of great reproach to the clergy, but surely the imputation was unfair. It was by no means impossible that this body might be influenced by a love for the church as a mere establishment (a laugh); but, supposing they looked upon it with higher and nobler views, it was not at all unnatural that they should contemplate with some alarm the admission of those who had been for ages so hostile to its existence, not only as an establishment, but as a faith, to political power (hear, hear); and when they remembered the influence which the Catholic priesthood exerted over their flocks, there was surely room for jealousy. But though he saw great difficulties at present, gentlemen were not justified in representing that his rt. hon. friend (Mr. Canning) despaired of the question; every body knew of the changes that had taken place, and were in constant course of taking place, in the prejudices and habits of men; nor did he see any reason to despair of a great ultimate change in that house, in the clergy and amongst the people. He ought to be the last to say that no such changes could take place. All his own early impressions—all his hereditary prejudices had been against Catholic Emancipation. He had been taught to believe that the papal faith was always connected with arbitrary power, and he had been as strongly disposed against concession as any of his hon. friends near him (hear, hear). He certainly had entirely changed his opinions in this respect; he avowed that he had done so—and he hoped he never should be ashamed of changing them, when he saw good grounds and sufficient reason for doing so (loud cheers). But he verily believed that such hostility existed against this question, that no administration could pass it; and he thought that the most fatal thing which could happen to the question itself, would be an abortive attempt to carry it on the part of administration: for that would throw it back half a century, and, perhaps, destroy the cause altogether. Having now endeavoured to vindicate his colleagues and himself from the aspersions cast upon them, he would advert to that part of the question which related to the Association. Gentlemen had said that it was not enough to show convenience—they must also show necessity for this bill. Had Ministers thought proper to rely upon convenience merely, they might have done so long ago: but they did not think that they should be justified in calling upon Parliament to interfere, till interference became matter of necessity. Last year, this society had not assumed its present form. Many of the acts complained of had not then taken place—they had not then interfered with the administration of justice. A learned member (Mr. Denman) thought he had fully answered his rt. hon. friend (Mr. Peel) by drawing a distinction between a society like the Constitutional Association prosecuting for libel, and one not interfering in a court of justice on “political” principles. But, according to that learned member, the Catholic Association interfered, because, said they, the Catholics could not otherwise get justice. Why, therefore, their interference was political (hear, hear). In fact every act of this sort was a political act; and the interference of the Catholic Association was exposed to every one of those objections which the learned gent. had, on former occasions, urged with such force against the Constitutional Association. Those objections must apply to every society that intermeddled with the administration of public justice. He had never belonged to the Constitutional or any such Association, and the reasons of the learned gent. would determine him against any society of the kind. But the learned member spoke of their prosecutions as being of no importance; he had argued largely on the acquittal of the parties; but surely he must have forgotten that the grovemen of the charge against the Association related to its previous proceedings. In the prosecution for murder, they assumed that murder had been committed. The consequence was, that the man went to trial, under very unfavourable circumstances; a mode of proceeding entirely at variance with that spirit which had been so much eulogized by the learned gent. in the address of the Association. When he found such principles laid down, and actions committed entirely contradictory to them, he must entertain a very different notion of the feeling which had called them forth. Then as to the “hatred of Orangemen,” and the gloss which had been attempted to be put upon it, he utterly dissented. He could but think that the phrase implied something more than that the Catholics were not exactly partial to their oppressors (a laugh). It was not, however, from a single expression, nor from the language or conduct of an individual, be it Mr. O’Connell or Dr. Dromgoole, that he anticipated any danger; but violent language coupled with violent acts, and the avowal that the Association represented the Catholics of Ireland, augmented danger to Ireland, if such language and such acts were permitted. They were calculated to excite the greatest animosity and fear, and he laid a stress on the word fear, in those against whom these threats were uttered. As to the call for Emancipation as a remedy to the spirit of association, he must be permitted to doubt whether that measure would have such an effect; he was not certain that it would do more than remove the evil from one party to another. The situation of Protestant and Catholic would be reversed. The Protestants of course would continue fewer in numbers than the Catholics, and would lose their present ascendancy. Then, with their disparity of numbers, if they found the Catholics aiming, not only at political power, but at the restoration of the church property in Ireland—and he did not mean to say that it would not be natural that they should entertain such desires (hear, hear)—he thought the alarm of the Protestants would be reasonable; nor could he foresee why the spirit of association that seemed to be peculiar to the country, should not, in that case, extend itself to Protestantism, and promote counter-associations, with all the mischief that must result from them. On this account he thought Parliament would desert their duty if they allowed the Catholic Association to remain. As to the utility ascribed to the labours of that body, he quite dissented. They had been told that the administration of justice in Ireland was so bad, that the Catholics had no means of obtaining it but by means of the Association. Instances had been mentioned of discovered abuses; but how were those abuses discovered? In that house:—and by that house were they remedied. One of those evils was the choice of Sheriffs; that had been remedied. The Magistracy required revision. It had been revised. Other public bodies had been corrected. But all this was done without the aid of a Catholic Parliament in Dublin, by the old-fashioned Parliament here. That Parliament had remedied many evils which existed in Ireland, and it would remedy others. For several years had Parliament been so occupied. All admitted that the present prosperity of Ireland was the result of the policy that had been pursued towards her. Although we had not done every thing that we ought to have done, yet we had done a great deal, and we certainly did not want a Catholic Association to assist us. If they attempted to excite our fears, they would fail; for they would enlist

our pride—at least as strong as any other feeling against them. We should betray our duty to Ireland; we should render her incapable of enjoying the benefits which she had acquired, or which she might hereafter acquire, unless we made up our minds steadily and firmly to put an end to this Association, which he sincerely believed to be the bane and curse of the country (cheers).

The debate was further adjourned at a quarter past one o'clock.

TUESDAY, FEB. 15.—The adjourned debate being resumed,

Sir R. Wilson said that he should not have taken any part in the discussion, had it not been for an assertion repeatedly made, and strongly insisted on, last night, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whose candid and ingenuous character gave a peculiar importance to all that fell from him, that England was not only hostile to the Association, but that the majority of the people were opposed to the Catholic claims. This assertion made it necessary for the representatives of popular places to submit their opinions to the house, and to prevent so erroneous an idea from gaining currency. The Chancellor of the Exchequer insisted that no members on the Opposition side had ventured to assert the constitutional propriety of the Association. Nor was it his intention now to do so; but Ministers had no right to taunt them on that head, when they refused all access to the documents, upon which alone an opinion could be founded. One hon. gent. asserted that the Association interfered with the administration of justice, with vindictive and sanguinary views; and his statement had so impressed an hon. friend of his, as to determine him to vote for the bill. His hon. friend had left the house immediately after. Had he waited, he would have heard enough to prove to him that the very indictment upon which that charge was made against the Association, was the best record extant in their praise, and did honour to their humanity. It had been denied that the Association represented the Catholics, or that Mr. O'Connell held any authoritative or respectable rank in their esteem. Whence, then, did he get that influence which he was supposed by this bill to exert over his countrymen? He could not be terrible in his mere personal capacity, but only as the representative of the people's sentiments. The Association—which, he must persist in, was defensive, not aggressive—ought not to exist; it must be put down; but he protested against this measure as the means, because it would not be effectual—because it would augment the evil—because it would drive the discontents of the country into an under current of sedition and disaffection, which, by and by, swelling and emerging to the face of day, would break forth in a stream which would bear all opposition before it. The only permanent remedy was Emancipation; and was England ever in a better condition to grant a boon of this nature than at present? Let the house reflect on the repetition of those claims for the last twenty-five years—that they were the rights of six millions of people—that the laws complained of were of incredible absurdity and cruelty—that a Catholic priest for instance, was subject to the penalty of death for marrying a Protestant woman to a Catholic and that the parties must give evidence against the benefactor of their affections, on pain of three years' imprisonment. Was this a time to perpetuate such laws as these? When they had disavowed the slavish doctrines of the Holy Alliance—when they had acknowledged the independence of South America—it was deeply to be lamented that they should adopt these measures that could only lead to internal discord, and which were wholly at variance with the rest of their recent policy. In case of war, would not measures of this nature, which estranged the hearts of the people, produce the most deplorable consequences? In that case, if the standard of rebellion were unfurled, would it be the same that was formerly raised on the mountains of Wicklow, and at Tarah-hill? The Catholic Clergy were hostile to the rebellion, because they believed it to be connected with the principles of the French revolution, and they knew that those principles were inimical to their interests. The Catholic nobility and gentry were equally adverse. But now the minds of clergy, nobility and gentry were embittered, and if the standard of rebellion were raised, who could answer for the consequence? He was not the advocate of Catholic dominion. He saw, with terror, the abuse of Catholic power in Spain, in France, and in Belgium. In France, a ferocious and abominable law had recently been proposed (the law of sacrilege)—as if the deity were a demon who delighted in sanguinary punishments. In Belgium, efforts of an arbitrary and bigotted nature had been made; but they had a king there whose wisdom was likely to counteract the evil. In this country, with an Established Church, intimately connected with the state—with an immense body of Dissenters—and, above all, with a free press—what was there to be feared from the Catholics? He was not fighting the Catholic battle, but his own—the battle of all the Dissenters, of civil and religious liberty. He disliked the term Catholic Emancipation; it was too narrow a phrase; he would repeal the disabilities of all Dissenters, of whatever denomination. Those, therefore, who advocated that measure, were not fighting a partial battle, and ought to receive the support of every friend to religious freedom. He was not peculiar in this opinion; it was a common one, at least on the other side. Many persons opposed the emancipation of the Catholics because they were afraid it would lead to the repeal of the test acts, and they dreaded any increase of the power of the Dissenters, whose civil and political, more than their religious opinions, they held in terror (hear, hear). As opposed to such opinions, he would resist this bill. In doing so he was sure he spoke the sense of his constituents, but even if it were otherwise, by a manly exposition of his sentiments he could not but conciliate their esteem.

Mr. Lockhart said, it was an ancient practice in this realm to levy money by the exhortation of the priests in the church; and although it appeared to be a voluntary gift, it could not, if all the circumstances were considered, be fairly viewed in that light. The poor-rates, before the 43d of Elizabeth, were levied in this manner; and if this private levying, under the Association, were not actually compulsory, it went as near it as possible. The ignorant part of the community might think, when this rent was demanded, that they were under the same sort of compulsion as our ancestors, when they received the exhortation of the priests. But what was the character of the Association, according to their chief advocate? What had

Mr. O'Connell said? He told the world plainly, that every effort of human ingenuity would be made to evade the letter of the law, while they acted against its spirit. What was to prevent this body, so resolute in breaking the law, from pressing their views farther than they had thought proper to declare? What did they mean when they talked of the folly of paying tithes in parishes where there was no Protestant congregation or no church (hear, hear! from the Opposition)? What was this, but the indication of a desire to overturn the whole Protestant constitution of this realm?

Mr. W. J. Bankes (Cambridge Univ.) approved of the bill; but he chiefly rose for the purpose of adverting to what fell from a learned civilian, on the preceding evening, when he adverted to the University Club (a laugh). He did not stand there as the champion of that club; but when the learned civilian stated, that The Memoirs of Harriette Wilson (a laugh) were received, and a plain Bible rejected, he was in error. There was no such book as the Memoirs there, nor was any such book proposed. It was, he believed, often inquired for, and very much asked after (a laugh); but it was not there.

Mr. Grenfell said, that the conduct of the Association, in raising money for the purpose of interfering with justice, was contrary to the constitution; and if he were in the house when the introduction of the bill took place, he would vote for it, so far as it would put an end to so dangerous a practice. With respect to Catholic Emancipation, he would on all occasions advocate its cause, in and out of that house. Let not gentlemen deceive themselves. Six millions of Catholics, oppressed, insulted, and trampled upon by one million of Protestants, could not submit; and he trusted to God they never would submit. He was in the decline of life; but were he on his death-bed, he would offer up his most fervent prayer to God, that if they did resist, their resistance might be successful (much cheering).

Mr. Robertson said, they had been told that the gentry of Ireland were opposed to the collection of the rent. He believed it; but he must say, that if the landed proprietors had done their duty, and shielded their tenants from their mortal foes—the law and the proctor—the house would not now have been called on to legislate on this subject. The church of Ireland had been attacked, but, in his mind, were not accountable for the misery of the people. They did not receive one-tenth of that to which they had a right; but the people were still in the lowest stage of want and degradation! What had become of the amount of tithe which the clergy had given up? It had been put into the pockets of the country gentlemen. Did the landed gentry interfere to prevent the oppression of the tithe-proctor? No. The unfortunate peasant was suffered to be dragged to prison, and this was one great cause of the collection of the Catholic rent. It was gathered to enable the poor to procure justice, since the country gentleman neglected his duty, and did not choose to interfere when he saw acts of oppression committed. The blame rested with the gentry; and yet these were the opposers of Emancipation, the only measure which could tranquillize Ireland, or prevent its being separated from this country. Coercive measures would only irritate that country more; and for that reason he had determined to oppose, as far as he was able, the measure now before the house (hear, hear).

Sir John Newport repeated the opinion which he had expressed on the second day of the session, that by deferring Emancipation, and by enacting penal laws against the Catholics, the Government was raising up dangers of such fearful magnitude, that no man living could calculate the consequences (hear, hear). During a rather long life he had watched with anxiety the state of his native country. It had been his lot to partake in its changing fortunes during a long series of years, and he thought that the consequences of the present measure would be infinitely more fearful than those which had resulted from any former one that he had had an opportunity of witnessing. The perils of the American struggle were as nothing when compared with that which now menaced us in Ireland. The struggle with America was a distant one; that with Ireland would be at our very doors. It was a remarkable circumstance in the history of this bill, that it was introduced into the house without a tittle of documentary evidence. The house was asked to rely upon parol evidence. But let the house examine the discrepancies which existed even in this evidence, such as it was. With regard to the Catholic priesthood, let the opinions which had been expressed by the Sec. of State, by the Attorney-General, and by the Under-Sec. of State, for Ireland, be placed in juxtaposition, and let the contrast which they displayed be remembered. While the rt. hon. Sec. attributed so much to their interference, the Attorney-General, on the other hand, said that the Catholic priests had been foully calumniated, and that they had been mainly instrumental in preserving the tranquillity of the country. The Under-Secretary, in a different strain, asserted that the evils which existed in Ireland were mainly caused by their baleful and malignant influence (hear, hear). The opinions of the rt. hon. gents. were at least contradictory (a laugh); and those opinions formed the parol evidence on which the house was called upon to legislate. He would take this opportunity of alluding to a gentleman whose name had been introduced last night—Mr. Devereux. That gentleman had lately become a member of the Association, and because he was one of the Catholic delegates in 1792, he was said to be an unfit person to join the existing society. The house ought, however, to know, that in 1793, that gentleman was one of the five persons delegated by the Catholics of Ireland to wait on his late Majesty, by whom he had been most graciously received. After this, it was surely rather too much to allege the admission of this gentleman as a charge against the Association. An hon. gent. had stated that the Association had waited until the Orange societies were put down, before they avowed themselves. This was not so: the Association was formed when the Orange party was triumphant—when they boasted that they had doubled their numbers in consequence of the attempt of the house to interfere with them—when they triumphed, not only over the Government of Ireland, but over that house; and when one of the Orange officers carried away the palm in the contest he had entered into with the Parliament itself. To show how the Association was regarded by men whose opinion deserved the highest respect, he referred to a letter from the Earl of Fingal, who said, that “he particularly regretted his present illness, because it disabled him from joining in the efforts of the Catholic Association at this important crisis." There was no man who knew his lordship, who would not bear testimony to his uniform moderation, and would not feel that the greatest respect was due to his pre-eminent virtues, which made him more worthy of respect than even his exalted rank (cheers). He would ask those who opposed the Catholics, whether they seriously wished to put down their claims by penal laws? And if they did, he would ask them when they thought it would be expedient to stop? The disproportion between the Catholic and Protestant population of Ireland was fearfully increasing. At the Union, twenty years ago, the general proportion of Catholics to Protestants was as five to two. Now it was six out of seven, and twenty years hence it would probably be eleven out of twelve. Did the enemies of emancipation mean to say they could then resist the claims which were now made? Why, then, should they defer to grant that now, which, in the result, they could not withhold? The public mind was becoming more fully informed of the real merits of the case; and however reluctantly the grant must at last be made (loud cheers).

Mr. F. Fitzgerald: With respect to the abuses in the administration of justice in Ireland, much had been done, although much remained to be done. But as to the interference of the Association with it, he thought that no honest or honourable man would not wink at it if necessary. He was present as a magistrate, at a prosecution in Clare, at the instance of the Association, and he could bear witness to the temperate manner in which Mr. O'Gorman, the counsel for the Association, behaved. He was of opinion, that the Association was justified in much that they had said and done. He was not arguing for the continuance of that body. The Protestant mind in Ireland had been thrown into a state of panic which it would be difficult to describe. He admitted, that means had been unfairly taken to increase that panic; but if so large and important a body felt such alarm at the proceedings of the Association, he asked whether it should be allowed to continue? If it were, counter-associations would be formed; the spirit of opposition would destroy all fellowship between man and man and render the country hardly worth living in. At the same time, he was bound to admit that the representations of the Association, aided by the efforts of the Catholic pastors, had had a considerable share in restoring tranquillity to Ireland. In 1880, the Catholic priests in the county which he represented afforded him material assistance in suppressing the disturbances, and he himself induced many Catholics to take upon themselves the duties of magistrates, on account of the effectual aid which they lent to the bringing about of that desirable object. He regretted that the course which the Association had pursued was likely to deprive the country of the assistance of such an influential body of men. But whilst he admitted that the Association had been instrumental to a great degree in restoring peace to Ireland, he could not forget that the present happy state of that country was also in a great measure the result of the line of conduct which had been adopted by the Irish Government and the Parliament. He felt alarm at all associations; and he could not concur in thinking that the present measure had been called for by the Catholic Association alone. If the Orange Associations had never received the patronage which was bestowed upon them, the Catholic Association would not, if it had ever existed, have comprised nearly the whole of the Catholic population.

Lord Althorp said, that the bill being an infringement on the rights of the people, it was incumbent on those who supported it, to prove that it was not only the best, but the only mode of putting down the Association. Parliament might put down the Association, but as long as there continued to be an union of Catholic sentiments, which he should be sorry to see dissolved, means would be found in Ireland of showing to this country that there were six millions of discontented subjects there. He disliked the idea of a body associating to prosecute; but, as he understood the case, the funds of the Association were only applied on behalf of persons whose poverty precluded them from undertaking their own prosecutions. He concluded by stating, that he would vote against the bill.

Mr. W. Lamb said, that with respect to the phrase "hate of Orangemen," he deprecated the Jesuitical casuistry of his learned friend (Sir J. M'Intosh), as tending to confound all the boundaries between right and wrong. If the effect of particular expressions was to be argued, it must be considered who the parties were by whom they had been uttered. The learned gent. (Mr. O'Connell) whose words these were, was accustomed to public speaking; and from the nature of his profession, used to maintain a command of temper. Such an individual had no right to plead that warmth which sometimes led an inexperienced orator beyond his real meaning; that which he had said, be the effect of it what it might, must be assumed to have been said in earnest, and with deliberation. He went on to say, that some gent. had talked of this assembly as a safety-valve—he considered it as the furnace itself. Was it, he asked, to be endured, that any assembly should take upon itself to open a mart for the redress of grievances and to give itself, in such a character, a permanent existence? There was already too much disposition about the lower orders, even in England, to litigation. Every body knew, that if half the indictments and causes which were tried in courts were entirely omitted, it would be for the benefit of all the parties concerned in them. Then, if people would go to law, and prosecute each other needlessly, at their own expense, and even to their own ruin, where would be the end of petty ill-blood and dissension, when they were enabled to do that free of cost? Over and over again it had been argued, by those who were the advocates of liberal principles, that it was objectionable even for Parliament to order prosecutions, because it sent a man to his trial with an opinion in some sort already pronounced upon him. And here was an Association, causing people to be put upon their trials, before juries taken from among a people on the very brink of rebellion (loud cheers from the Opposition); at any rate they were smarting under restrictions likely to inspire them with any thing rather than impartial spirit or goodwill. He should support the measure.

Sir F. Burdett began by commenting on the observations of the last speaker, with regard to the obnoxious phrase in the address of the Association. With regard to that phrase, he would ask, was it common justice or reason to take a dozen of a man's words, which he had not the power of explaining; to put the worst probable construction upon them which they were capable of, and then to hold him convicted of the intent that construction imputed (hear, hear, hear)? There was no book that had ever been written—not the Bible itself, which would bear that test. Surely Englishmen would not forget the scandalous interpretation which a corrupt judge and an infamous jury had combined to put upon a portion of the writings of their great and true-hearted fellow-countryman, Mr. Sydney—a construction which no honest man could ever have imputed for a moment! In his defence, that great man had said, what he on the part of the Catholic Association, said now. "You take my words without the reasonable exposition of them: take a sentence from the Bible, and you shall find, 'there is no God;' only leave out the first member of the sentence, and the Bible itself asserts that blasphemous proposition." For Mr. O'Connell's words, he would repeat—even at the risk of being charged with Jesuitical casuistry, that they were incapable of fair interpretation, without giving him the opportunity of explaining them (cheers). But there was no necessity for any casuistry at all in the matter. The words were capable of a very honest meaning; if they looked at the only point which a fair and candid mind would keep in view—the intention of the person who had written them. Now what was the plain intention of the passage? To excite them to acts of vengeance, or retaliation? No such thing. It said—"By your hate of Orangemen, we charge you to do no act of violence! We conjure you, by every good feeling—nay, even by the worst motive which operates in your minds, to live in peace, and in the precepts of the Gospel!" It conjured them to observe those precepts in such purity as perhaps few men could lay their hands to their hearts and find themselves capable of realizing. For his part, he felt with the poet—

"An open candid foe he could not hate,
Nor would insult the base, in low estate;
But thriving malice, tamely to forgive—
Tis something late to be so primitive."

Why, it was a new doctrine, that oppressors were not to be hated (cheers). Would the gentlemen who talked about Jesuitical casuistry, have had the Catholics adjured "By the reverence and respect they bore to Orangemen?" To object to the expression of such hatred, was modern doctrine—and most absolutely original! The Scottish hero, in the words of Burns, called on his countrymen

"By oppressions, woes, and pains,
By their sons in servile chains," to vindicate their laws and rights (cheers), showing them every feature of their suffering in the strongest light, and exhorting them to adopt the last resource to put an end to it. But the appeal of the Association was an address in favour, not of violence, but of patience; it prayed the Catholics to prosecute a constitutional object by constitutional means; and not to allow their passions to be irritated, even by the injustice of their oppressors. And who had ever heard until now, that it was unlawful to urge a man by bad motives, as well as good ones, to good conduct? A gross misconstruction had been affixed to Mr. O'Connell's words;

one which it was neither fair nor candid in that assembly to fix upon him, without giving him an opportunity of explanation. What was there in any other part of the address—for he would not catch at a particular expression here or there—it was neither generous, nor was it necessary to criticise every little expression which came from the mouth of a man whose heart was bursting with the wrongs of his country (loud cheering)—what was there which could afford even the shadow of a subject for objection? But this would not do for the hon. member for Hertfordshire; it was enough for him that there existed a Catholic Association. He objected to all popular associations. Mr. Burke, and other writers of authority, had spoken of the advantages of public meetings, as safety-valves through which public discontent, whether well grounded or unreasonable, might escape; but the hon. member quarrelled even with this metaphor, and said that they were not the safety-valves, but rather the furnaces which excited into combustion that matter, which, in its explosion, might bring destruction upon all. "Do you not see," it was asked, "that this Association is the furnace?" He would answer, No; he saw the furnace too plainly beneath—in the wrongs of Ireland (loud cheers). This calumniated Association had so conducted itself as to become the organ of six millions of people in Ireland, including the nobility, the gentry, the clergy, and the merchants, as well as the peasantry; in fact, six-sevenths of the population. Nor was it confined to Catholics. It was worth while to look at the list of those connected with it: and, first among the Protestants appeared the name of Earl Fitzwilliam—a name which no man could pronounce without sentiments of veneration—from the generosity of his character, his courage which shrunk not in the hour of danger, and his benevolence, which exceeded even his ample fortune. Men might disagree as to the proceedings of such a society; but while he saw such names as Lord Kingal upon the Irish side of it, and Earl Fitzwilliam on the English—while it included the Catholics of England, who had ever been ranked among the most respectable portion of the British community, and who, if they were ever held in disesteem, had only fallen into it because they bore with too much patience those wrongs and grievances which some thought they should have stirred more actively to redress—was it possible that the Association should not stand, cleared of those aspersions which the advocates of the present bill thought fit to cast upon it (much cheering)? They had forgotten to remove a main objection:—take all which had been stated to be true—that the Association was all it had been said to be—even then it was not shown how the present measure was to operate as a remedy for the evil. They had tried to show every thing but this, the most important point of all. Instead of this, hon. gents. had pressed a charge concerning the interference of the Association in courts of justice, which seemed to be urged by all, in proportion to its apparent weakness. The whole sum of this argument was—"How can you, who disapproved of the Bridge-Street Association, sustain this Catholic convention without arguing against yourselves?" Now the Bridge-Street Association was a bad thing—although he must say, that he preferred it to an ex-officio—he thought it the lesser devil of the two (laughter). The Bridge-Street Association had been a very impudent body, sending spies into men's houses, and inundating the country with filth and scandal, with the intent, perhaps, of putting that scandal down, when, in fact, it was an unhandy mode of stopping crimes, to encourage the commission of them for the sake of punishing them afterwards; but, with all its mischievous qualities, it was compelled to send men before a grand jury, which he preferred to the Attorney-General (a laugh). But the Catholic Association did none of these things; and as for its pre-judging cases, it was monstrously absurd to talk about it. What they did was this:—they existed in a country inhabited by an impoverished peasantry exposed to every kind of injustice; then they endeavoured to protect from the oppression of their cruel enemies—for they could not protect themselves:—but they pre-judged nothing. The course adopted by the Association was this—they received a complaint; they heard the evidence; they referred it to a committee; that committee took a legal opinion on the question, and according to that opinion, proceedings were, or were not, instituted. Now, what was there here like pre-judging (cheers)? He should rather have called this body a committee of justice, which only collected facts for the purpose of laying them before the proper tribunal for decision. When he first heard the charges against the Association on this ground, he was anxious to know whether they resorted to perjured witnesses or tampered with juries; but even in the showing of the rt. hon. Sec. for Ireland they had done nothing but strict justice; and when that rt. hon. gent. accused others of pursuing unfair means, with a view to impede the ends of justice, he (Sir Francis) accused him of the same unfairness, in merely stating so much of the case as suited his own purpose (loud cheering)—and if the house were to rely on his statements as the basis of the present bill, the evidence was inadmissible, for the rt. hon. gent. by his own conduct had put himself out of court as a witness (cheers). In the observations which had been made on this question on the other side, he conceived that only a small part of its merits were taken into consideration. For his own part, no words could convey his sense of its importance; it was the most important of any which had been brought under the consideration of Government since the Revolution. He would not anticipate what might be the effects of the measure, or say whether the predictions of gentlemen on the other side would be fulfilled; but as the Attorney-General for Ireland had put a question to him on a former evening, when he was paying that attention to his remarks which was due to every member addressing the house, but particularly to the learned gent.'s commanding eloquence, he was disposed to give him his opinion. The Attorney-General had asked whether the member for Westminster thought that if the present measure passed the house, the Catholics would submit? He could not have answered for six millions of people, acting under the feelings which this bill was calculated to produce; but looking at the former acts of the Association—at its general conduct, founded in reason and justice—at the progress which it had made—at the confidence which it inspired, and the causes which produced that confidence, he was, when the question was put to him, disposed to think that the Association would submit, and that there would be no opposition to this measure when passed into a law. But since then, from the protraction of the debate, he was enabled to give a more decisive answer. He came down to the house that evening armed with the answer of the Association. He would say, that they would submit implicitly to the measure—that they would enter into no unseemly contest with the legislature; but they expressed an humble hope, that they might be heard at the bar of the house before it was passed into a law (cheers). This would at least be granted, when almost every thing else was denied (hear, hear); for it seemed that the Catholic question was now to be considered hopeless. The house remembered the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who accounted for his holding a place in the Cabinet, by the fact that a Government (meaning an administration) could not be formed which would agree on that question. There was a practice well understood in committees up stairs, where, when a difference arose, a party seceded, and thus knocked out the brains of the committee, and it could stand no longer (a laugh); and if gentlemen opposite would only knock out the brains of the administration, it was quite impossible they could stand a moment afterwards (much laughing). Without charging them with apostasy to the cause, it was unfortunate, that when an administration could not have been formed without the rt. hon. gent. opposite, the liberal part of the cabinet should succumb, and the enlightened submit to the unenlightened (cheers and laughter). Darkness covered the land instead of that light which should gladden the heart of the country (cheers). There, however, the rt. hon. gentlemen continued, like the two Kings of Brentford, smelling at one nosegay (a laugh); and although tied together they did not pull together, whilst in the meantime the great affairs of the nation must stand still, or make at all events the least possible progress (cheers). What had this country done to deserve so severe a fate—to merit such an infliction as this unnatural juncture of the living and the dead (cheers)? They had heard much about a serpentine line in the cabinet, but he would beg to remind the rt. hon. gent. that, whatever might be the line of beauty, the line of integrity was straight (much cheering). It was here as distinct and palpable as that between knowledge and ignorance—a line, upon one side of which was a little narrow policy, as to this great question—a line which kept up the conflicting opinions of the cabinet, which had produced all the conflicting statements upon which the house was called upon to vote (hear, hear). In fact he could conceive nothing like it, except that cabinet spoken of by the great genius of our country, in painting the eternal anarchy that prevailed, when all the elements of discord were at work:—

“To whom these most adhere
He rules a moment; Chaos empire sits,
And by decision more embroils the fray
By which he reigns; next him, high arbiter, Chance governs all” (loud cheering).

Would it not appear as if the present Cabinet had sat for the picture which Milton drew, or that the passage was the recipe for the administration (cheers and laughter)? The hand of the Almighty had been necessary to draw order out of chaos; but what power was at hand to introduce it into this chaotic Government? Blessed as we were with this united and disunited Cabinet, was it not extraordinary—if any thing could be extraordinary from such a quarter—that Ireland, being in a state of unexampled prosperity—blessed beyond precedent with peace, should now require a coercive law? The observation of Swift must still hold—“What is true every where else, is not true in Ireland.” The speeches of hon. gents. on the other side—the Speech from the Throne—had exulted in the prosperity and tranquillity of Ireland; and thence they inferred the necessity of a general coercive measure (cheers). It had been stated that no man defended the Catholic Association. No man was called on to defend what no man had attacked. The right hon. Sec. for Ireland and his remarks, had been so completely shattered by the speech of the learned member for Calne (Mr. Abercrombie), that nothing more could be said in reply to him; and for the case that remained for the Government, the rt. hon. gent. opposite (Mr. V. Fitzgerald), as if it were not shattered enough, had blown it into the air (cheers). What ground was now left? As to tampering with justice—that charge had been disposed of. He would, however, observe, that one good result had sprung from the prosecution animadverted upon by ministers—it had not only elicited the unqualified approbation of the magistrates of the conduct of the prosecutors, but it was useful as shewing the falsehood of the charges so long heaped upon the Catholic body. If a man were to state that his pocket had been picked in walking through St. Giles’s, nobody would doubt him, because a belief existed that such a circumstance was likely to happen there, although, in fact, the statement might be unfounded. It was the misfortune of the Catholics of Ireland, that any thing which was stated to their prejudice received implicit belief, because calumny had so long represented them as capable of the worst actions. What would have been thought if all the letters which had been published with the signature of Sir Harcourt Lees had been written on the other side of the question—against the whole body of Orangemen? Would not such statements have called forth some explanation from those who were attacked in them? The Catholic Association had done this; they had vindicated their whole body, and thereby rendered a public service, which called for public thanks—and for his part, he cordially thanked them. The Sec. for Foreign Affairs, and the Attorney-General for Ireland, had both, as friends to the Catholics, expressed their anxiety to get rid of the Association, as an incubus upon the Catholic body. He would ask the rt. hon. gent. where he could have dwelt to be ignorant of the sentiments of the Irish people in that respect? Was it possible that Gloucester-lodge was so secluded from the world as to be impervious to what was passing in it on so important a question? Had he dwelt in such Cimmerian darkness, as not to see that which was visible to all others in the country? If he had, let his darkness be lightened by his learned friend the Attorney-General, who had stated that the Association owed its origin to the confidence of the Irish people. Then, as to the legality of the Association:—A legal assembly might be guilty of illegal acts. Now, on which of those grounds was this Association objectionable? The Attorney-General for Ireland had never attempted to disturb it, on the ground of its illegality; but he had tried it by the acts of one of its members, and a grand jury had declared, that there was no ground for the charge. On what ground, then, was it attempted to be put down? On the ground of its illegal tendency—on the ground that it might have an injurious effect hereafter? This was nonsense. It was a childish tampering which could not be justified. The act, it was said, would be only temporary. That might or might not be the case; and if the Catholics were not guided by a sounder judgment than the Cabinet of England, a temporary act would not be sufficient, upon the principles which the bill avowed. But he had no fear on this point. The zeal and earnestness with which the leaders of that body had endeavoured to preserve the peace of the country were notorious, and their success could not be denied. The Attorney-General for Ireland had borne testimony to the conduct of the Catholic priesthood, and to their active and useful exertions in maintaining tranquillity. With respect to the Attorney-General himself, he would say, that if he ever had a doubt of his sincerity in advocating the claims of his Catholic countrymen, it would have been removed by his manly conduct the other night. The Catholics of Ireland had not among their supporters a sincerer friend (hear, hear). It was well observed by the hon. member for Galway, who so manfully opposed the present measure, that it would have the effect of irritating the feelings of his countrymen. But then, said His Majesty’s ministers, “We will not allow ourselves to be bullied into granting the Catholic claims!” To be bullied into doing an act of justice! The language was as contemptible as the feeling which dictated it (hear, hear). Men must wonder how, upon so paltry a feeling, they could think of introducing a measure, which, from the excitation it was certain to produce among the Catholics of Ireland, might be attended with consequences which he would not mention and on which he dared not reflect. The loss of the American colonies, that disastrous event, which had plucked the brightest jewel out of the Crown of England (hear, hear), had cast an ineffaceable stain on its unspotted reputation, and had lopped off a limb from the body politic which he should ever consider to have been of inestimable value, in spite of all the political sophistries employed to reconcile the nation to its loss. Evil as that separation was—evil even as was the long and bloody contest into which the country was unnecessarily plunged by the last war—evil as were the consequences which arose at the close of that war from the unwise policy of ministers, who tamely abandoned all the advantages they had obtained—all these events would be as dust in the balance when compared with the evil which would arise from a war of rebellion in Ireland (great cheering). He would recall to the recollection of those who still took some delight in the studies of their early life, an anecdote very apposite to this point, and indicating in strong colours the difference between the policy of a wise, powerful and magnanimous nation, and that of such feeble and temporising statesmen as those with whom the rt. hon. gentlemen were associated. The Romans having conquered the Privernates, imposed upon them the colonial yoke, which the Privernates at a subsequent period endeavoured to shake off by war. They were

however, speedily subdued; and one of their delegates having been brought into the Roman Senate, according to the custom of that people, was asked what punishment he thought should be inflicted upon those who had so audaciously rebelled? His reply was worthy of the character of a man who sought to obtain freedom: "We deserve," he said, "to suffer such punishment as those ought to suffer, whose crime has been a wish to secure the privileges of freemen." The Roman Senate were of opinion that such a crime deserved no punishment; they came, therefore, to this determination—"Eos, damnet, qui nihil praterquam de libertate cogitant, dignos esse qui Romani fiant" (great cheering). The Privates, in consequence, obtained all the rights and liberties of the state, and were enrolled amongst the Roman citizens (cheering). Would to God that the example of Rome might have some weight in the present times (great cheers)! Would to God that the example of a great nation, which, in spite of the degradation that had now fallen on it, had tapped to mankind the brightest lessons of patriotic wisdom and virtue, and whose name could not now be pronounced without awe and reverence—might have its effect both in deterring us from measures which must lead to insurrection and rebellion, and in teaching us, if insurrection and rebellion should arise, the most efficient means to extinguish it for ever (cheers). We were not, however, reduced to such a lamentable extremity at present; the house might legislate in perfect safety. He had no occasion, therefore, to appeal to their apprehensions—for they had been relieved from apprehension by the declaration of the Catholic Association; but he appealed on that account with double force to their sense of justice, to their feelings as men, to their patriotism as statesmen, to their attachment to the interests of the empire; and he conjured them by all those qualities to give a dispassionate examination to the claims of the Catholics whenever they should be brought under their consideration (great cheering). There was also another sentiment in which he concurred with the hon. member for Galway. The hon. member had stated, that though he agreed with the Association in many points, he had attempted to dissuade it from intrusting its petition into his (Sir F. Burdett's) hands. The hon. member had frankly confessed his reason for so doing; and in that also he concurred. He should do every thing in his power to persuade the Catholics of Ireland to replace their confidence in the Attorney-General for Ireland: he should tell them that they knew the learned gent's ability, and that he believed in his sincerity (cheers); he should inform them, that though he declined to present their petition, he should be happy to assist the efforts of the learned gent; and he should conclude by expressing his hopes that they would soon behold the anxious wishes of so many years brought to a happy and a glorious consummation (cheers). The learned gent. had insinuated, that if he (Sir F. Burdett) now came forward to press the concession of the Catholic claims, he would be acting inconsistently with his former declarations in that house. Without caring whether he was guilty of inconsistency or not, he would answer the learned gent. that whenever he brought that great question forward, no efforts of his should be wanting to render it successful (loud cheering). He hoped that it was now making great advances in this country; but, be that as it might, it was not for him to flinch from the performance of his duty (cheers). The cause was good, the grounds on which it rested were impregnable; and come what might, he would still be found among its supporters, and would take as his motto, the fine saying of the Roman poet—"Ille murus aheneus esto" (immense cheering).

Mr. Conning began by remarking upon the confusion which had crept into the debate from the variety of topics introduced by the different speakers, and of the necessity, before he approached the question, of clearing the confusion in which it was involved, and reducing the separate points of it to their respective magnitude. The question before the house related to the mode in which they should deal with certain associations in Ireland. To that there had been added, not unnaturally, the whole of the Catholic question. To these two questions, another had been added, respecting the general conduct of the Administration towards Ireland; and there had been further introduced a question relating to himself, on which he felt unwilling to obtrude any observations to the house, though a few were imperatively called for. He therefore divided the subject into four parts. With respect to the existence of certain associations in Ireland alien to the spirit of the constitution, and dangerous to the peace of the country, there had not been, as far as he recollected, any attempt from any quarter to gain say it. The question, therefore, which the house had to decide was properly this—whether, having received a description of the evil from the Crown, and having pledged themselves to consider of a remedy, they would now proceed to fulfil their promise: or whether they would turn round upon their former pledge, and say, "We have, on deliberation, determined that the Crown has been deceived—that the description in the Speech is unfounded—that true it is that certain associations exist, but untrue that they are either hostile to the spirit of the constitution, or productive of animosities or obstacles to the improvement of the country—that the Crown has been misled—and that our duty is to leave and confirm these associations in the exercise of their present power." Could any man seriously say, that the Catholic Association deserved any other epithet than that of unconstitutional, when it was recollected that it was self-elected, self-appointed, self-controlled and self-adjourned; acknowledging no equal and admitting no superior, levying money on the people by the force of its resolutions; interfering, laudably according to some, criminally according to others, with the administration of justice (hear, hear); prejudging individuals whom it was going to submit to trial and re-judging and condemning those whom the law had acquitted (great cheering)? If they were of opinion that such a character could be reconciled with the constitution, then they must have formed a very different idea of the constitution from that which he had formed, and must have read its history in very different volumes from those which he had perused. Then, were they prepared to say, that it did not promote animosity? As to the intemperate expression "by your hate of Orangemen," it had been said, that it was unfair to fix upon a particular phrase as indicating the character of a whole body. Granted, if the expression had slipped out in the warmth of debate and had been afterwards recalled; but if it were found in a document which had been prepared with care and deliberation—if it had been pointed out to the body who used it and had yet been retained—then they were justified in considering it as showing at least the animus of those who had used it (cheers). They had been told that the phrase had not the same strong meaning in the Irish that it had in the English language. He did not pretend to be a judge in the Irish language, and therefore that apology must go—valeat quantum valeat. But though all had shown their ingenuity in explaining it away, the palm had been clearly won by his learned friend (Sir J. M'Intosh). His learned friend, with a naïveté which was quite amusing, had told them, that hatred was in itself no bad thing (a laugh). "I hate a Tory," said the hon. member—

"some men hate a cat, One man hates this thing—and another that;"

but still hatred is no bad thing, and if it be properly managed, the Catholics may be persuaded to lie together in amity with their Protestant brethren, and to realize the prophet's vision of the lion and the kid lying down under the same shed. This reminded him of a comedy, which he had no doubt his learned friend admired as much as he did—he meant the Rivals. Mrs. Malaprop is giving her niece a lecture upon marriage. She tells her "it is best to begin it with a little aversion. I hated your poor dead uncle like a blackamoor before I married him; but you know, my dear, what an excellent wife I made him notwithstanding" (laughter). His learned friend had resorted to a piece of casuistry, which was extremely beautiful in itself, but had not truth enough to render it even plausible. He had described it as a judicious suggestion of moral philosophy to lead men to virtue by putting their vices in opposition. Upon this doctrine a man with but one vice was in a bad way (a laugh); but if he had two, he might become a very admirable character (roars of laughter). For instance, he would suppose that he had discharged a servant because he was a thief, and subsequent to his discharge had learned that he was a drunkard. Now, might he not send this man to his learned friend with a very good character? Might he not say, "I send you a man whom I know to be a thief, and have found to be a drunkard: you can't do better than employ him: his drunkenness will come in collision with his thievery, and he will make an exemplary character?" Nay, his learned friend was determined, like Longinus, to be "himself the great sublime he draws." According to Dr. Johnson, his learned friend had two vices; he was a Whig, and he was a Scotchman. Now if that great moralist had adopted his learned friend's doctrine of the collision of the vices, he might have said to his learned friend, "You're too much of a Whig to be a Scotchman, and too much of a Scotchman to be a Whig" (roars of laughter). It was, no doubt, from the collision of these two vices in his learned friend's person, that he had become what all his friends had found him, a perfect character (great cheering and laughter). For his own part, he must say that he could not see any hope of obtaining the great moral victory by the means suggested by his learned friend. But he was that as it might, the phrase, "by your hate to Ormgemen," was the proof of his allegation that the Catholic Association excited animosities in Ireland (cheers). The hon. bart. had talked of the inconsistency between the prosperous account which was given of Ireland in the King's Speech, and the call for this bill. Inconsistency! No such thing—quite the reverse. The indications of the prosperity of Ireland were undeniable; but might there not exist an evil which retarded the increase of that prosperity, by rendering its continuance doubtful—which destroyed tranquillity for the present and confidence for the future, by setting neighbour against neighbour, and arming the prejudices of one class against those of the other, and which thus diverted from Ireland the superabundant capital of England, by which it might make the most rapid advances in agriculture, in manufactures, in commercial wealth and in all the arts which civilize and dignify social life (cheers)? Was it not, then, the duty of the house to remove this evil, to restore the natural course of things and to allow Ireland to enjoy every advantage which might raise her in the scale of nations? With respect, then, to the first question, namely, whether the house ought to put down an association arrogating unconstitutional power, tending to create animosity and to check the march of national improvement—the answer was easy, without entering into the Catholic question, or saying a word on the religious character of the Association; and he would now say for himself, that it was not on account of its religious, but on account of its political representative character that he called upon the house to put it down (cheers). When he spoke of the representative character of the Association, he did not mean to assert that it had ever affirmed itself to represent the people of Ireland. It was more wise in its generation than to commit so impolitic an act: if it had done so, no new act would have been wanted to enable the law to deal with it. But though the Catholic Association had not assumed this representative character, it was universally ascribed to it by others; too universally to admit of a moment's doubt. Then, he would ask, could two bodies peaceably co-exist in the country, one constituted as the House of Commons was, and another to which belonged a representative character as sacred and efficient as that of the House of Commons, though not conferred by the same process (hear, hear, hear)? Without discussing this point at present, the practical question was, whether the House of Commons should not check the Association before it really acquired the strength of a representative body? In debating this question, he had intended to abstain, and he trusted that he had abstained, from uttering any harsh language against the Catholic Association. He entertained no disposition to impute to it motives that were intentionally mischievous: if he had entertained it, the information of the hon. bart. that the Association had determined to submit to whatever the house might enact, made no difference in his mind as to the necessity of passing this bill; on the contrary, they ought equally to pass it, since it would be as great a relief to the Catholics as it would be to the Protestants, and would enable the Association itself to separate without compromising its character, which they would be reluctant to have done by any formal resolution of their own. If the debate had been kept within its proper range, as it had been limited by the King's Speech, he should have concluded his argument at this point, and should have gone confidently to the vote, on the conviction that the house had even then no choice as to the course it ought to adopt, and which now it was imperatively called upon to adopt, by the information which the hon. bart. had communicated. But though the Catholic question had not been originally part of the debate, yet as it had been made so, it was impossible for him to forbear speaking openly and boldly his sentiments upon it. In stating his conviction that the Catholic question had lately retrograded in the favour of the people of England, he begged to be understood as intimating an opinion that he entertained with great pain and reluctance. But he could see no use in concealment. He thought it better to avow, on all questions, the opinions he might entertain, than to resort to any such concealment; and happy should he be, if, in this instance, they should be found erroneous. One great ground of his painful belief originated from a sentiment that had been most ably and justly expressed by the rt. hon. gent. who concluded the debate of Friday last. The rt. hon. gent. with that sagacity which always enabled him to select the topics that would tell best, either with this house or with the country, had on that occasion, when, for the first time in his life, he opened his lips on the Catholic question, thought it necessary to preface his remarks by stating his staunch adherence, from belief and education, to the church of England (hear, hear). A learned civilian had also taken occasion to assert the same profession of faith. He took this for a proof that those hon. members felt the Established Church of England to be firmly rooted in the affections of the people. Now the same sentiment was deeply rooted in the mind of the late Mr. Grattan, and in every bill that he had ever proposed in favour of the Catholic claims, there was a studious setting forth in the preamble of the conviction of that house that the Churches of England and Ireland were permanent and inviolable; and Mr. Grattan contended, that his bill, so far from shaking either of them, went to confirm their settlement (hear, hear). On this point he would refer to the Act of Union between Great Britain and Ireland—"That it would be fit to propose, as the 5th art. of Union, that the Churches of England and of Ireland shall be united into one Church, and that the doctrine, worship, discipline and government of the said United Church shall be preserved as now by law established for the Church of England, saving to the Church of Ireland all the rights, privileges, and jurisdictions, now thereunto belonging. . . . which shall be deemed and taken to be an essential and fundamental article and condition of the Union." Now, in reference to that article every bill which Mr. Grattan introduced for the relief of the Catholics was framed; and the preamble of the bill of his learned friend (Mr. Plunkett), for a similar purpose, was copied from those of Mr. Grattan. That preamble was in substance thus: "Whereas the Protestant Churches of England and Ireland are established permanently and inviolably. . . . and whereas it would tend to promote the interests of the same, and to strengthen the free constitution of both these Churches in essential parts, to" do so and so: great care being taken always to repeat the fact of the union and establishment of the Protestant Churches. Up to the latest period at which bills for the relief of the Catholics had been discussed in that house, the belief of the people of England was, that this article of the Union would be a fundamental part of any arrangement that might affect the existing condition of either Church. But within the two years last past, the people of England had seen propositions introduced into the discussions of that house, which were contrary to the principles thus laid down; and questions had been discussed, and divisions had taken place, which had excited—and he spoke with knowledge of the fact when he said so—the greatest alarm in this country, and had reawakened apprehensions that were previously almost extinct. He would now read certain resolutions that were moved on March 4, 1823. The first was—"That the property of the Church of Ireland, at present in possession of the bishops, deans and chapters of Ireland, is public property, under the control and at the disposal of the legislature, for the support of religion and for such other purposes as Parliament in its wisdom may deem beneficial to the community; due attention being paid to the rights of every person now enjoying any part of that property" (tumultuous cheering). The second resolution was—"That it is expedient to inquire whether the present Church establishment of Ireland be not more than commensurate to the services to be performed, both as regards the number of persons employed, and the incomes they receive; and if so, whether a reduction of the same should not take place, with due regard to all existing interests." The first of these resolutions was negatived without a division; on the second, the numbers were, ayes, 82; noes, 167. Now he would take upon himself to affirm, as a thing which he positively knew, that this departure from what Mr. Grattan thought a necessary preliminary to a chance of a favourable reception for the Catholic question, the spirit, and the degree of that spirit which such proceedings had originated, had been causes of infinite suspicion and jealousy; and had disinclined from all favourable opinion of the question many among those who had but just brought their minds on this subject to a temper—not of opposition (hear, hear). They who thought that Catholic Emancipation was the one thing needful for the salvation of the empire, might also think that it would have been better if the legislature had never been irrevocably pledged to preserve the inviolability of the Church of Ireland. But he would warn those hon. gents. that they must settle that matter not with the House of Commons only, but with the supporters of the Catholic question; and that, before another bill could be introduced into that house for Catholic Emancipation, the movers and seconders of the resolutions he had referred to must have made up their minds to one of two alternatives—either to renounce those resolutions, or to give up the Catholic question (hear, hear). On this statement he was quite ready to go to issue, and would be content to abide by the event. He was ready to support the Catholic question, but he was determined to resist the spoliation of the Church of Ireland. He was ready to extend to the Catholics all the privileges of other subjects; but that was from the persuasion that it might be possible to maintain both religious together; though he believed it to be impossible to maintain those resolutions about the Church of Ireland and the Catholic question together (cheers). That that great question had retrograded, he thought he had assigned sufficient reasons to prove. It was his opinion, moreover, that if the Catholic Association were to continue, after the language that had been used in its name, and the intiminations of which it had been made the vehicle, there would be such a resistance in this country to carrying the question, as would, perhaps, be fatal to it. An observation had been made that all that remained to be granted to Ireland, affected only the higher classes of society, and to the lower, therefore, must be matter of indifference. Now, there was no argument that he should be at all times more ready to answer, or that he should, in times past, have felt more eagerness to combat, than the supposition that the lower classes would not be affected by that which regarded the higher—that there was no necessary sympathy between their cases, although the chain that connected them was one of innumerable links (hear, hear). It was true, that what remained to be granted to Ireland, must now be granted to her higher classes; for, by what he considered to be a great mistake in legislation, every thing which Parliament had yet granted in the nature of concession, had been granted to the rabble, as he might say; while it had been carefully withheld from the peer. All that the argument in question went to, was that the miseries of the lower orders of Ireland did not arise from the withholding of this particular boon. It was a question of feeling, simply, and not of fact. He was satisfied that until all classes were admitted to the full participation of all the rights of their fellow-subjects, the great work would never be complete. These being his opinions, he had to complain of the hon. bart. for impugning it to him as a reproach that he was connected with an administration divided on the Catholic question; and for appearing to insinuate, that his conduct could only be explained by supposing him to have been actuated by a love of office. He defied the hon. bart. to point out the day, or the month, since 1801, in which his animadversions would not have been applicable to any Cabinet. There had been periods, indeed, in which there had been a general determination to resist all concession to the Catholics; but of such a Cabinet he had never been a member (cheers). To the administration under which the Union took place, succeeded that of Lord Sidmouth, of which the late Lord Castlereagh became a member. Next came Mr. Pitt's administration of 1805. It was true, that in respect to Lord Sidmouth's and Mr. Pitt's administrations there was a bond of union, arising from the obstacles to the passing this question, recognized by all their members, which effectually silenced all speculative differences among individuals who concurred in rejecting the question altogether. After the death of Mr. Pitt, the Cabinet of Lord Grenville and Mr. Fox was formed—and he was not recapitulating these facts for the purpose of retorting on hon. gentls. opposite the vulgar reproach of "you have done the same;" but of historically proving the position. In that Cabinet were two persons entirely adverse to the Catholic claims—Lord Sidmouth, and the Chief of a Court, in which he hoped a member of the Cabinet would never be sought again—the Court of King's Bench. Next came the administrations of the Duke of Portland and of Mr. Perceval; in which some sort of division existed. The course which he determined to pursue, was adopted in 1812. On the removal of the restrictions from the Regency, he anticipated that his colleagues would have felt themselves as unfettered by former obstacles as he did; but on applying to the administration, he was informed that the Catholic question would still be refused by the Cabinet. He then took his leave. He next alluded to Mr. Grattan's bill of 1812, and to the motion that he himself then submitted, calling upon Government to take the Catholic question into consideration. While that motion was depending, Mr. Perceval died; and after his death, office was offered to him by the remnant of the Cabinet. He sent but one question—did they persevere in opposing the Catholic question? They answered they were so determined; and he accordingly refused office (cheers). At no period of his life would office have been such a temptation to him. He had been in office before; he had been the author, in a great measure, and in that house the responsible defender of the Spanish war. He had gone through the contests which all the disasters and reverses that attended the commencement of that war called down upon the administration. In 1812, the prospect seemed to brighten—success attended our arms—and the cause which he had so long advocated under less auspicious circumstances, began to promise those triumphant results that ultimately crowned it. He would ask every hon. member who had within him the spirit of an English gentleman, and was animated by a heart-felt desire to serve his country, whether greater temptation to take office could be possibly held out to any man than was at that time extended to him—when he might have reaped the fruits of the harvest which he had sown under such discouraging circumstances (loud cheers)? But the answer of the Cabinet being what it was, he at once declined taking office. After these transactions that house addressed the Throne for a more efficient administration; and the negotiation was confided to Lord Wellesley and himself. Lord Wellesley addressed himself to Lord Grey—he communicated with Lord Liverpool. This proved that his opinions, however erroneous, had been consistent. He did not condemn those who might think him wrong in this opinion, but he claimed from them the candour of a fair judgment of his acts, when he showed that when he was commissioned, not to join, but to frame an administration—not to occupy and conduct the helm of public affairs, but to distribute those duties to others—that then, under circumstances which placed him above personal imputation, he would have formed, if he could, an administration holding different opinions upon this important question, yet agreed upon others which involved the best interests of the community. He might have erred in forming this deliberate judgment as to the best way of composing an administration; but to the charge of sinister views and want of integrity, he disclaimed to proffer an answer (cheers). Here he must take the liberty to complain of a most disingenuous use which had been made of his refusal to join office then, in 1812, and the inference attempted to be drawn, that that refusal was a virtual pledge, never to enter office until the Cabinet had agreed to move onwards with the Catholic question. He had refused to come into an administration united against the Catholic question, and if by that refusal he meant to have said, "I will never enter office until you are agreed upon this question," what madness was it not in him, within one short fortnight after, to have endeavoured to form the sort of mixed administration which he had described? The case merely required to be stated to carry with it its own refutation (hear, hear). These were the circumstances which had preceded his motion upon the Catholic question. That motion was carried by a majority, which would to God he could see again! of 129. The same motion was brought on a fortnight after by Lord Wellesley in the House of Lords, when the numbers were, 126 against, and 125 in favour of it; the measure being only lost by a majority of one. From that time, then, in the year 1812, the Cabinet had gone on acting upon the same basis respecting this measure as at present. To the principle of it he acceded: he might err in judgment; but when the principle complained of in his case had been acted upon for 25 years, why was he alone to be held liable for the whole responsibility? Why was that point of conduct to be selected to fix upon his character a shadow of imputation, or on his actions a suspicion of insincerity (hear, hear)? He could, however, throw some light upon the motive for this selection, for he was perfectly aware why he had individually become obnoxious to some, at least, of the advocates of that cause of which he had been the zealous advocate. It had been uniformly his determination, to introduce and support the Catholic question, without holding any communication with the Catholic body. He had shaped his conduct and advocated their question, not for their sake alone, but for the sake of the empire—not with the feelings of a party man, but with those of a comprehensive benevolence. This was the reason why he was singled out for attack—because his doctrine had been, that when any sect had a grievance to complain of, that it was for Parliament to consider the case, and decide what they ought to give or withhold, and that it was for the petitioners to receive the measure of redress which was provided for them. He had always denied to such parties the privilege of stipulating and meting out for themselves the relief with which they would be satisfied, and of dictating to Parliament the terms of adjusting their claims. Both principle and experience had taught him to exercise and determine his actions upon his own reflection and judgment, and not to be led, governed or restrained by theirs (hear, hear). He had many apologies to offer for thus intruding his private feelings upon their attention (cheers). To be thus taunted with a want of feeling for the claims of the Catholics—to be charged with truckling to a compromise of their rights—to hear this constantly insinuated against him by those who owed him gratitude for his services in their cause—was a species of treatment which called upon tameness itself to vindicate its claims. He had told them, that in 1812, at that period when he would have given ten years of life for two years of office, not for any sordid or mean purpose of selfish aggrandisement, but for a different and more honourable object (hear, hear)—at that period they knew that he had peremptorily refused office, rather than enter a cabinet collectively pledged against the Catholic question. But was that the only sacrifice he had made? Let the house and the country hear him on that point. From the earliest dawn of his public life—ay, from the first visions of his youthful and academic contemplation, there had been one paramount object of his ambition—it was his earliest and latest hope—he looked to it with an anxious and ardent glance—before it all other prospects of ambition vanished—in comparison with it all the blandishments of power, all the rewards and honours of the crown—all vanished into nothing before the one object which, through life, had been dearest to his heart—it was to represent the University in which he had been educated. He was in the fair way of obtaining that highest reward of his labours, when the Catholic question crossed his way. He had adhered to his principles, and thereby forfeited his claim (hear, hear). In that loss, he had lost all: when the question came forward, his pledges and his consistency absorbed his thoughts—they came across him just then, and he redeemed them; but from that hour to this he had never stated, either in private or in public, the extent of the irrevocable sacrifice which he had made at the shrine of his honour (loud cheers). Was it not a little too much, then, to be taunted and twitted as he had been, for his imputed compromise? Therefore let his judgment be arraigned, but let his honour be acquitted (hear, hear). In regarding this Catholic question, if it were ever carried—and sure he was it would—in his opinion it would never be effected by a cabinet expressly formed for that purpose. His belief was, that such a cabinet would not only fail in its object, but create a flame of discord in the country which it would be difficult to quench. If, then, it were carried at all, it could only be done by discussions in that house, leading to parliamentary decisions, which would operate upon the Government, not so much as a deliberative body, but as one consenting to and abiding by the decision of the Parliament. It had been imputed to him individually, with too flattering a notion of his influence, that he had the means of carrying his view of this question into effect. He was certainly at perfect liberty in office, as well as out of it, to move the question whenever he pleased to do so. Whether he did so while in office—whether he did so out of office—whether in either case he should move it at all—was a consideration which he reserved for his own discretion. Imputations or appeals to him would in this view be made in vain; he would hold the reins over his own guidance, and not be driven from his course (hear, hear). He had been asked whether he had no desire for popularity. The man who disregarded it would be unfit for office in a country which boasted a popular constitution (hear, hear). He had encountered too often the vicissitudes of public life not to bear unpopularity without fear; but he desired, like all men, if he could, to retain popularity honourably. His motto was laudis inane sonum, and he should add, in the language of Dryden—

"I can enjoy her while she's kind;
But when she dances in the wind,
And shakes her wings, and will not stay,
I puff the prostitute away." (cheers and laughter)

He would not court her by the surrender of his judgment or opinions. If the learned gent.

(Mr. Brougham), who had on the first night of the session identified himself with the Catholic Association, thought he had gained the palm of popularity, he could not congratulate him upon the fancied acquisition. He did not mean to talk lightly of the learned gent.'s support of this question; he could not undervalue the services of such an advocate in any cause which he thought fit to support—his immense talents, his great acquirements, his profound knowledge, his powerful reasoning, must at all times secure him the applause of those for whom he devoted them; but he would prophesy that in thus applying them, he would find he had in the end mistaken his road to fame—

Contulimusque manus: experto credite quantus

In clypeum assurgat, quo turbine torquetur hastam.”

Differing, then, as he did from the learned gent. as to the Catholic Association; for the sake of the Catholic question itself, he would take his firm stand by the present measure (hear, hear). It was because he thought that all that had been done, had been effected by temporary expedients—because they ought to act with circumspection—because they must remove all obstacles to the Catholic question, one by one, for the purpose of recovering public favour to it, that he supported the bill. As one means of that recovery, the removal of the Association was indispensable; and if the Association should remove itself, it would indeed have been beneficial to Ireland, by having given rise to this useful measure.

Mr. Brougham began by regretting that the numerous personal topics introduced into the debate, more particularly by the last speaker, were attended with this unpleasant consequence to himself, that whereas the rt. hon. gent. had entertained the house with those personal anecdotes, which were well known to chain their attention more than any other description of address, he was compelled to confine himself strictly to the measure itself. He stood before them as the defender of the Catholic Association, as the advocate of the right of the Irish people to meet, to consult, to petition, to remonstrate—ay, and to demand (cheers); and he would declare his solemn opinion, which he hoped would reach the whole of Ireland as well as England, that the firmer and stronger their remonstrances, provided they were peaceable, the greater would be their prospect of success, in obtaining those privileges which alone made life desirable. Were the complainants to become abject in their suit, they would deservedly prostrate themselves and their cause, and lapse into the contempt which was due to slaves. The house would at once see that he did not mean to blink the question: he took not this course from any love of fleeting popularity, which he knew as well as the rt. hon. gent. how to give the wind to. What were the acts charged against the Association? the first and gravest, was their interference with the administration of justice. Their offences in this way were limited by gentlemen opposite to two cases, in neither of which had their attempts been successful. In one, it was alleged that the judge who tried the cause praised the conduct of the prisoner; he had also applauded the conduct of the prosecutor. In the other, the house was led to believe that the efforts of the Association, who had ranged themselves above the law—who had confederated—who had clubbed money—who had borne down upon their intended victim with the weight of their united opinion, expressed in a previous debate—they were told that all these efforts had ended—in what? In an unanimous acquittal. But then, said the hon. member for Hertfordshire, “it might have been otherwise.” Now mark the subtlety—“It might have been otherwise!” To this he would only reply, that had it been otherwise, his view of the present measure might have been otherwise (hear, hear, hear). If, instead of an acquittal, the character of the prisoner had been wrecked by a verdict—if the storm which blew harmlessly over him, because the law had found him innocent, had overwhelmed him, and he had sunk in the waves of persecution—then, he would have admitted that the existence of the Association was not so safe—that its proceedings were not likely to contribute so largely to the advantage of the Catholic population. And this was all which could be produced from that storehouse of expedients, the Irish office! But he had not yet done with them. One of those cases had been grossly mis-stated by the informants of the rt. hon. Sec. opposite. His advisers had mingled the poison of their own wicked invention with the tales which they poured into his ready and willing ear. After the exposure he was about to make, he should like to see the man who would have front and nerve enough, avowedly to support this measure, without papers, without documents, without the form even of a select committee, or the more odious pretext of a green bag, to lead it on; merely because the Irish Sec. had given his word for its propriety. They were told that 43 magistrates had instantly acquitted the prisoner; and some stress was laid on the respectability of their characters; especially that of Mr. Blackburn. They were induced to believe that, with almost the same readiness and unanimity, they had declared that there was not the shadow of a charge against the prisoner. He had read the account of that trial. He found that the minority was considerable of those gentlemen who refused to sanction the assertion, that there was not the shadow of a charge. He had read the whole of the examinations. He found that there was a surprise on the prosecutor. Statements were advanced on the trial which had not been made on the examinations; and others which had been made were contradicted, and no reason assigned. That prevented a verdict, and a large minority of the magistrates refused to vote that there was no foundation for the charge. But he had more evidence. Since the commencement of this debate, he had seen and conversed with the leading counsel who prosecuted for the murder at Ballybay. It had been as forcibly alleged in this, as in the other case, that there was no foundation whatever for the prosecution. On the trial there was the grossest discrepancy of evidence. One set of witnesses proved that the murdered man was knocked down, his ribs broken, and that horrible mutilations were effected upon his person; and this was contradicted by the surgeon, who stated that the body had received no direct harm in the fray, the death-blow being given by the fall. The fact was this—The prisoners were put upon their trial under the deepest and gravest suspicion. One of the witnesses deposed, that another man, whom he should know were he to see him again, but whose name he did not know, nor had he seen him before, came first up to the deceased and struck him violently, so as to cause his death; and that then the officers rushed forward, and mistakingly seized one of the prisoners, who was innocent. Bread and wine were brought to the dead man, and offered to him as he lay on the pavement, dead as a stone, and known to be so. On being cross-examined, he was asked if he had ever revealed these circumstances before? Never. Had he not been before the magistrate? Yes. And before the coroner? Yes. Had he uttered a word of this before either of them? He had not. He was the servant of the prisoner's brother, he was on good terms with his master, and the prisoner and the brother were very well agreed. He was then asked why he had not mentioned a word of this before? The judge who tried the cause refused to allow the question to be put (loud cries of hear!). He was speaking in the presence of many able lawyers—men who had assisted in as many trials as there were hairs upon their heads; who were used equally to the difficulties of prosecuting and defending. He left it to them to defend the conduct of that judge, if they dared. He would notice one extraordinary omission which he had remarked in all the speeches of the gentlemen opposite—the name of the judge who had presided. He would in fairness to that learned person name him, though in fairness he would omit that which had been said of him by an hon. member of that house—that it required the likeness of two animals to describe him: for he had the ferocity of one, and the baseness of another, which the beast of ferocity wanted. That learned judge, was Baron McClelland. He had read over the evidence, and he was not only not satisfied with the acquittal; but his positive opinion, founded on a statement in an Orange newspaper, was that the men had a very lucky escape. At the same assizes, the Association had undertaken some proceedings of a defensive kind. The learned counsel employed by them in that business, was engaged, when it was called on, in a cause under trial on the civil side of the court. Baron McClelland was respectfully entreated to delay the trial till the prisoner could have the aid of his counsel: he refused the request. A messenger was then sent to inform the counsel that the prosecution must proceed. The messenger was prevented by the throng from coming near enough to give him notice. The judge still refused any delay, and the man was hurried to trial in this embarrassed state, without the assistance of his counsel, without preparation of any kind. When the counsel entered from the other court, the first witness had been examined. He begged that he might be allowed to cross-examine. The same judge who had refused to allow the question of cross examination in the case of the murder, and by that means rescued one prisoner from the fate which hung over him, now refused the necessary cross-examination of a witness whose word was staked against the prisoner without any cross-examination (hear, hear). The prisoner was convicted, and sentenced to twelve months imprisonment. Should he be told after this, that justice was administered in Ireland with the same decency and impartiality as in England? They had been told by two learned persons, that the courts of justice in Ireland were open to all; which forcibly reminded him of an observation of Mr. Horne Tooke's, in reply to a similar remark respecting the courts of justice in England. "We are informed," said that acute reasoner, "that the courts are open to all—so is the London Tavern; but with this difference, that unless you have money to pay, you can have nothing." Another difference distinguished the Irish taverns of justice. There, as here, the bars of the tavern were open to all comers; here, however, if a poor man could muster a little money, he could walk in and would be served with the same commodity which the rich man enjoyed. But at the Irish taverns for law—whether the Weather-cock, the Rock or the Bottomless-pit, for such were the names they passed by, they had one commodity for the rich, and another for the poor. For this they had better authority than the assurances of the two learned gentlemen. Lord Redesdale, after serving the office of Chancellor in Ireland, must have known something of the judges, and enough of the proceedings in courts of justice; and it was his opinion—that in Ireland there was one law for the rich, and another law for the poor. Now for the other charges against the Association. And, first, for the charge of impudence: in other words—their acting openly and without reserve, showing their designs and intentions in the face of day. Now if they had skulked from the public eye, they would have heard the opposite charge, that their designs must be dangerous because they were secret—because they did not proclaim their purposes as virtuous innocence always did? Boldness and impudence were now ascribed: then it would have been perfidy and fraud. They were accused of aping and emulating the forms of Parliament—those solemn and authoritative forms which were so often the theme of praise. Had they done otherwise, would not the charge have been inverted? They would then have been accused of daring innovation, of showing in the very order of their proceedings the revolutionary spirit of the French Convention, and an envy of its powers. But now—astonishing impudence!—they encroached upon Parliament—they borrowed and abused its forms—they, who really represented six millions of people; while the house represented twelve millions, with whom they were perpetually at variance. Then they were self-elected, self-constituted, self-regulated, self-adjoined—all of which meant that they did not really represent the Catholic population. No; for if they did, it would be illegal; if they affected the situation of delegates, they fell within the Convention Act: if they elected themselves, they were not true representatives. How unfortunate was this body! If they were open, they were impudent; if secret, designing. If they found open fault, it was turbulence; if they were quiet, there was danger. Did they pronounce censure or blame? That was disaffection. Did they praise? That was hypocrisy. Nothing they could say or do would satisfy their opponents, and the bill stated that the only way of reconciliation was to destroy them altogether. "I don't care," said an hon. member, "about the blustering of Ireland, but beware," added this alarming logician, "when Ireland shows the aspect of tranquillity." This tranquillity was more fatal than the system of 1782, the jacobinism of 1793 and the rebellion of 1798. So that by this ratio the wound given to the public peace was only great because

To which sensible complaint he would make the sensible answer,

"Then 'twould be greater were there none at all."

The fact was, that the Association did contribute to the tranquillity of Ireland, and that without exercising any other control than by the talents of men who sympathized with the people, who participated in their sufferings and felt their wrongs. Did the house really dread their power? He could tell them how to annihilate it ere the morrow of that evening in which he was speaking. Let them take the advice of the Attorney-General, and remove the grievances which oppressed Ireland. Though late, yet there was time: let them begin to do justice. The Association would vanish, and Ireland would bless them, as she would curse them if, instead of redress, they rivetted her fetters. As to the expression in their address, which had given so much offence, he would not special-plead it away: it contained no illegal meaning. If hatred could with fairness be felt and proclaimed by any man, it must be by the Irish Catholics: against the Orangemen, their habitual and malevolent oppressors, especially if this last violent endeavour of Orange oppression should be carried into a law. If they had commenced their address to the Catholic people, by saying, "We adjure you by the love you bear your Orange brethren—be at peace;" they would have been charged with hypocrisy instead of violence; and he certainly, in such a case, should, for one, have turned from the document with disgust (cheers). As to strong language and hasty expressions, not even they, clothed in the real character of senators, could prevent themselves from being hurried into occasional lapses. He would instance the expression of an hon. friend (Mr. Grenfell), who, he was surprised to find, was to vote for the bill, after declaring that in the event of justice not being done to Ireland; were he upon his death-bed, he would pray to God, not only that Ireland might resist but that she might be successful in her resistance. Even the Attorney-General for Ireland had gone too far, if strength of expressions were conclusive against those who used them. In one of his most eloquent speeches he had said, he liked English connexion, and would perish in order to preserve it; but "if he found that connexion inconsistent with the independence of his country, he would give the connexion to the winds, and clasp the independence of his country to his heart" (cheers and laughter). The words were elegant, but strong—they were the effusion of an honest man and a patriot—but they were not used without some risk—they were on the very verge—they contained a pledge which the learned gent. beyond doubt, being an honest man, was prepared to redeem. If called upon, he would not fail his country; but then he could only win his crown of glory by becoming a rebel to England (laughter). Let the house have more patience and loving-kindness towards these oppressed and injured men, and not expect from them the language of kindness towards a set of men who acted on the devilish principle of retaining the shadow of the wrong after its substance was removed, for the purposes of insult and irritation. But then they were not only a self-constituted body; they had the exactitude to collect revenue. Levy and revenue were hard words, especially when the contributions were voluntary. A man paid his penny, or if he could not afford that, his half-penny; he paid his shilling, but if that were not convenient, his sixpence was not unacceptable (a laugh), and if he paid nothing at all, he still received the advantage of the funds of those who advanced their trifle. With their money he was defended from unjust prosecution—with their money he was enabled to bring his oppressor to justice. Such was the system; such the compulsory manner in which these funds were collected. He would read a very few lines from a book he held in his hand, containing minutes of the Conference of the English Methodists—a most praiseworthy, pious and excellent body of men; men whom he had defended when their privileges were menaced—and whom, under similar circumstances, he would defend again. They were in the same situation, with some few shades of aggravation, as the Catholic Association. Instead of 3000 individuals, the society of Methodists comprised 500,000, opposed to, and in direct contact with the Church, and levying their rent without exciting the smallest alarm in the mind of the member for Oxford (Mr. Peel). This was quite correct, although their hon. leader in that house (Mr. Butterworth) was prepared to state that there was not the slightest similarity between the Conference and the Association (a laugh). It was said, that this Irish Association imitated the forms of that house; but they did not come near the Methodists. They had pursued them into their very sanctuary. In this document, they spoke of the "Secret Committee of Privileges for the ensuing year." He saw his hon. friend (Mr. Butterworth) was uneasy on his seat while he stated this fact, as if the Committee of Privileges were already suppressed. The Irish Association never thought of any such thing. They were told that the Association collected rents; and that they were obliged to return them on some day certain. This statement was accompanied by the uplifting of hands and the upturning of eyes (a laugh); and it was said that nothing had ever been like it but the Jacobinical assemblies of the French Revolution. But what said this document? "It is expressly required, that the collection ended in October shall be paid in not later than the 5th of November." This was pretty prompt payment for a private association (a laugh). The Chancellor of the Exchequer did not go to work so quick as that (a laugh). They allowed only fourteen days for payment. Formerly the Chancellor of the Exchequer allowed three months for settling arrears; but the hon. member for Aberdeen had taken the case in hand, and only allowed him to give six weeks now (a laugh). The book went on to direct, that "the treasury accounts should be closed on the 24th of June, that the proper officer might bring before the Conference the state of all their funds. The list of subscription must be brought on or before the 20th of June; and, at the annual meeting, the officer must bring all the additional subscriptions. The sums received would be reported to the superintendants at every district meeting." Now, it was said with regard to the Catholic Association, that they had two books—one for subscribers' names, and one for non-subscribers'. The latter was held in terram over the non-subscribers—being as much as to say, "If you do not come forward, you will be treated in some unpleasant manner." This, however, was not the fact. There were not two books kept. It was impossible they could be kept. This circumstance proved how alarm awakened men's fancies—how it made even the gravest and soberest men most credulous. If any man wished to describe the effects of alarm, he could not do better than state that certain gentlemen got up in that house, in the month of February, in the 6th year of His present Majesty's reign, with a possession of their faculties, a gravity of manner, a sedateness of countenance, that were envied by men of less nerve, and repeated tales of a nature the most baseless and extravagant—which the house believed;—that amongst other things it was stated, that of a population of 6,000,000, the subscribers, to the number of 500,000, were enrolled in one book; and the non-subscribers, the remaining 5,500,000, were set down in another book (a laugh). The document to which he was referring then went on to say, "that annual district meetings should be held, and when any dereliction or gross deficiency should appear, the chairman should make strict inquiry into the cause" (hear, hear). He warranted that it would be a strict inquiry. Where any thing in a financial shape came before these religious societies, it was always strictly looked after. Here, then, was a statement, in nine or ten columns, containing the financial accounts of the Methodists; every item most regularly noted down. And yet it was one charge against the Catholic body, that an account was kept of their funds! He saw something lying on the table of that house, which somewhat startled gentlemen when it came in, for it answered extremely well to its title—"Army Extraordinaries." He found the same item in the accounts of the Methodists (laughter). Here were the "extraordinaries" of the "Army of the Faith" (laughter). There was also in these accounts, as in theirs, a deficit (a laugh), and persons were ordered to go the circuit to make up the deficiency. It appeared that the Methodists took a number of children under their care, and it was directed that every 149 persons should furnish one clear child's subsistence. The Catholic Association collected voluntary contributions; so did the Methodists: but the latter went a step farther; they assessed individuals. Did he state this to blame the Methodists—to cast a shadow of doubt on their motives, or on the legality of their proceedings? Certainly not. But he argued, that what was right in England, could not be unlawful in Ireland—but what the Methodists had a right to do, and rather than give up which they would go to death, could not be a matter of pretext for imposing coercive laws in Ireland. It appeared, however, that the priests were employed as collectors, and were members of this Association. Great was the cheering when the priests were mentioned. But he would ask, if the priests, the poor, and the great commoners, had not been with the association, would they not have been told by the same persons who now made their junction with it a cause of complaint, that those who were stirring up this business consisted of a contemptible faction? In that case, the Catholic hierarchy would have been spoken of with much praise, as men of piety and virtue—the Catholic nobility would have been overwhelmed with compliments to their loyalty—the wealthy Catholic commoners would have been much lauded; and then would have come this conclusion—"If these bodies had given their countenance to this measure, then there would have been some security of the public; but here is a set of lawless men, without any person to curb their passions—men who have no stake in the country as a security for their proper conduct. They must be put down, because there is no property amongst them." They would then have been put down, because they were a priestless, peerless set; now they are about to be put down, because they are neither the one nor the other (hear, hear). The last charge against them was, that they attempted too many things. How stood the fact? Tithes they never had touched. Parliamentary Reform they not only never had touched, but they refused to have any thing to do with it. When a most learned and venerable man, Mr. Bentham, sent his subscription, he called on them to take up the cause of Parliamentary Reform. A committee of the Association sent a letter in answer, that the Association must "stand aloof from all questions, except the Catholic question, and the redress of the grievances of Ireland." So much for the unfounded charges against that body—and so much for the countenance that had been given to them (hear, hear). Before he sat down, he would say one word on the subject of Catholic Emancipation. The rt. hon. gent. (Mr. Canning) defended himself against many charges; some of which had not been made against him. But his (Mr. Brougham's) objection was, that the rt. hon. gent. who had always professed a friendship, and he believed sincerely for this cause—who was its most active, and he believed conscientious supporter—it was to him a most marvellous thing, that he should sit in a Cabinet, where he was allowed to bear sway, where he might have brought forward this question, and have carried it if he list, and yet had not introduced it. This was the charge—and he mentioned it in grief, and not in harshness. At this moment, when the cause of the Catholics was in peril—at this moment, when their claim must be granted, or be for ages denied—at this moment, when their fate was in the balance—at this moment, when the scale was quivering with their destiny—what had the rt. hon. gent. done? He would demand of him, in the face of the Catholics and of the country, whether, at this critical moment, he had not assisted in raising the cry of "No Popery" (hear, hear). He put the rt. hon. gent. on his trial, and he charged him with having done his best to raise that cry; but thank God he had failed. The worst Orangeman, the most unprincipled enemy of the Catholics, could not, with all his ingenuity, have selected a surer mode of injuring them. With that art of balancing his periods nicely, which he had learned from his master, Mr. Pitt, of whom Mr. Windham facetiously observed, that he could speak a King's speech off hand—with that art which enabled him to say as much as left you in doubt, and to conceal what was essential and material—with that art the rt. hon. gent. had acted; and it was impossible to give a greater blow than he had done to that cause which, he hoped he did not speak correctly, when he said, he had deserted. He used no more nor less than these otherwise simple expressions, but expressions in this case of the most pernicious nature—"I stand singly, the whole Opposition with me. I stand alone, the Whigs with me." He was as much a friend to the Catholic question as ever; and yet that friend to the Catholic question said, that the people of England were as a man united against it. This was acting like the Sneerwells, and the Candours, and the Backbites, whom he had this night quoted. One of those characters said, "I like such a person, but I cannot get any body else to like him." So he liked the Catholics, but he could get no one else to do so (laughter). Why not have spoken candidly—"Not only the Whigs in Parliament, but all men of liberal opinions are favourable to the Catholic claims" (hear, hear). London and Westminster, and Southwark, notwithstanding what the rt. hon. genl. said, had declared for them over and over: and was the very heart of the country to be considered as nothing? Even in 1807, when the Whigs were turned out on the scandalous cry of "No Popery! the Church is in danger!" London and Westminster, Yorkshire, Lincolnshire, and Liverpool, had refused to join in it. The argument now was, "I cannot propose this measure, the country are against it." This he denied. Where were the "No Popery" cries—where any expressed dissatisfaction of the public, for which ample time had been given, partly through his advice, by protracting this very debate, whereby an opportunity has been afforded for so many splendid specimens of reasoning, learning, and eloquence, by which such service had been rendered to the cause of civil and religious liberty, and by which he hoped the last blow had been given to a pernicious and scandalous delusion (hear, hear). But he would suppose, for the sake of argument, that the country was opposed to Emancipation; then if Government felt that they were right—if they knew that it was of paramount importance to the safety and integrity of the empire, why did they not oppose themselves firmly to the tide of vulgar prejudice? Were they always so unwilling to run counter to public opinion? The Chancellor of the Exchequer formed part of the Government in 1820, and he would ask him what was the state of public opinion on that most infamous, detestable, and disgusting measure, to which he marvelled that any man on the other side could bear an allusion without the crimson starting to his cheeks—the persecution of the late Queen (hear, hear, hear). Government had then no disinclination to meet the cry of the mob, or to combat the discontents of the army; they were prepared to resist the wishes of meetings in all parts of the kingdom, and the avowed sentiments of many of their most steady supporters. Even the Church for some time, at least, was passive, till the Ministers and their adherents gave it the tone of reprobation. All these great interests were embattled against them—all felt with one heart, and spoke with one voice, yet nothing could induce the persecutors of the Queen to pause for one instant in their disgraceful and disgusting course. Was that course rendered necessary by state expediency? No. Was one half of the empire about to be torn away if the Ministry did not confront public opinion? No: But there was one person in the kingdom who held in his hand the issues of official life, who required that the proceeding should be commenced, and to him the Cabinet yielded their private prepossessions—with an unhesitating baseness unequalled in any European Court (much cheering)—which the Cabinet of Russia, or even of Ferdinand and the Seventh, could never have surpassed. Like the base, crouching, unhesitating, unflinching slaves of the Divan, with the bow-string twanging in their ears, and the scimitar glancing before their eyes, they consented to gratify groundless, but in that high quarter, excusable caprices, though they were without all excuse beyond what might be found in the most anxious desire to retain their places. If he were in want of reasons for conceding the demands of the Catholics, good God! what an ample supply had the Attorney-General for Ireland given him. The great friend and patron of Emancipation—the appointed guardian of the peace and tranquillity of Ireland, with knowledge of many facts with which he alone could be acquainted, had declared that the bill was necessary, because Emancipation was to be refused. How ominous were these words to the people of Ireland! To his ears they meant neither more nor less than this: "Prepare for the coming storm; set your house in order, while you may; the tempest is brooding, and will quickly burst; that is about to be done, which, when completed, may produce, nay, must produce convulsion, unless preventive measures are taken." Had Lord Londonderry been alive, he would at once have recommended the adoption of military measures to meet the threatened danger, and he knew not whether he would not rather see precautions of that kind adopted, which at all events must be temporary, than witness the passing of a bill like the present, which made so violent an inroad on the constitution. If the Association in its present shape, should be put down, he hoped that the Catholics would not therefore be deterred from pursuing all the means which might be left—all that the law had not prohibited. Let them not add to the list of those false friends who had already proved so fatal to their interests; let them not trust to that which was falsely called moderation and mutual concession. Let them renounce, with the contentment which they deserved, those pretended advocates of their cause, who had betrayed it and deserted them; but let them rely with implicit confidence on those old and faithful friends who had proved themselves in all emergencies to be what they professed; let them rely on their distinguished leaders; let them go on in the same honourable course which they had of late pursued—firm and united. Let them look to England, and admire and emulate the conduct of their fellow-sufferers here, who, having tried for ages the effect of moderation, and passive obedience to excess, and finding that they were just as badly off as their brethren in Ireland who had pursued an opposite course, had come forward as one man, and from the illustrious Duke at their head, down to the poorest peasant, had united themselves in the pursuit of their common object, a union, he exulted in knowing which was likely to produce the happiest results (cheers). He had been told by the rt. hon. Sec. that he knew little of Englishmen, if he thought they were to be influenced by the formidable attitude in which Ireland had placed itself. But he found that the Catholics had never got any thing, unless when the Government was placed in difficulty. The gentlemen who pressed the present measure gave a convincing proof, that in times of peace, the Catholics had nothing to hope for in the way of concession. All that the Catholics had obtained, they had obtained in other times. In 1778, and in 1782, all that was granted to them was extorted, in fact, by men in arms. In 1793 there were more alarms, and then the elective franchise was granted. He called upon the Catholics, not by any bad passions which might influence them—since all men were influenced by bad passions—not by that enmity, which he would fain see stifled—not by their sense of injuries, which he wished and hoped to see buried in oblivion, but by every principle which they held sacred as free men and Christians, to pursue the course which was before them (cheers). He called upon the members of the Government, by the responsibility of their stations, by their characters as statesmen, by every principle of policy and prudence, to deal with the Catholics, not with feelings of hatred but of charity—not with measures of oppression but of conciliation; and to reflect, ere it was too late, on the consequences which must result from this bill. It would alienate the Catholics for ever. It would turn discontent to rage, and it would arm rage with new weapons. On their heads would be the consequences of this misguided policy; and they must answer for it, if their present measures should tear Ireland from this country (loud and repeated cheering).

Mr. Goulburn rose to reply. He had been charged with having made a false statement respecting two transactions which he had alluded to in his speech. With regard to one of these, the house should hear Mr. Blackburn's report. He said, "A trial of unusual interest has been held before me, in which a soldier was charged with having administered illegal oaths. It lasted seven hours, and at the conclusion of it the man was acquitted by the unanimous verdict of forty-three magistrates. I regret to say that the evidence for the prosecution appeared to be a foul conspiracy, to accuse and criminate the soldier, and that the most abominable means were restored to for effecting the object of the conspiracy" (cheers). With respect to the other case, the learned member for Winchester had asserted, on the authority of the leading counsel for the prosecution, who was stated to be a Protestant, that that gentleman had not been allowed to put a question to a witness, in consequence of which the riddlers were acquitted. Now it was impossible to answer such assertions off-hand; but he doubted the fact altogether—first, on account of the well-known character of the judge; and secondly, because there had been no notice taken of it—no allusion to it, even, in any of the proceedings of the Catholic Association, although six months had now elapsed since the trial.

Mr. F. Fitzgerald said, that he was present at the trial of the soldier, and could state that there was no division of sentiment amongst the magistrates as to the innocence of the party.

The house then divided—the numbers were—For the motion, 279—Against it, 123—Majority, 156.

The bill was then brought in, and read a first time.

FRIDAY, FEB. 19.—Col. Trench presented a petition from the archdeacon and other dignitaries of the cathedral of Ely, against the Catholic Association. The petition, he observed, stated, that the Roman Catholics were as hostile to the principles of the Reformation, displayed as much prostration of mind to the see of Rome, and were as much distinguished by bigotry and intolerance at the present day, as they ever were.

Sir T. Lethbridge presented a petition from the city of Wells and its vicinity. The petitioners declared that they were friends to religious toleration to its utmost extent, but they objected to arming the Roman Catholics with political power (hear).

Mr. Brougham said, that when such a petition—one of the few, he was glad to say, which had been produced by the foolish cry "No Popery!"—was presented, some few anecdotes, relative to the getting up of so valuable a document, could not be unacceptable. He had received his information in a letter from a gentleman of rank in the neighbourhood of Wells. The petition, it seemed, was sent to the public inn from the office of the attorney, who was the agent of the hon. bart.—not that he meant to insinuate that the hon. bart. was acquainted with the circumstances under which the petition was got up. He caused the petition to be left at the inn, and he laboured strenuously to raise the obsolete cry of "No Popery!" for the purpose of injuring the cause of the present members for Wells, Messrs. Tudway and Taylor. The gentleman who wrote this letter said—"the agent rode down by my house, while he was canvassing for signatures to this petition. He stopped at the school, which is near my residence, and requested the schoolmaster to procure all the names he possibly could, without giving any copy of the petition." The schoolmaster, it appeared, agreed to this proposition; and, forthwith, put down all the names of his scholars (laughter) who could not write (laughter), and he got those who could to put down theirs. The boys went home delighted, bragging that they had signed for "bricks and mortar" (laughter)—a cant phrase for electioneering purposes at Wells. There were two parties there, opposition and ministerial, the latter of which was known by the designation of "bricks and mortar" (a laugh). The schoolmaster having effected his object with individuals of tender age, the agent next addressed himself to those who had arrived at an advanced period of life. He actually applied to the old women (a laugh), and frightened them with the idea that the Irish Catholics were coming over in great numbers to cut all their throats (laughter). These ladies, terrified as they were, did not sign themselves; but their husbands, wrought on by the terrors of their spouses, though they entertained no fear upon the subject, were induced to affix their signatures, to deliver them from the dread of having their throats cut by Irish Papists. The writer of the letter stated, that many persons had signed on being told that the Church was in danger; but he believed none of the canons, nor any well-educated persons, unless some of the election party some of the bricks and mortar, would lend their sanction to such petitions.

Sir T. Lethbridge knew that the petition was signed by magistrates and clergymen, and by many thousands of the most respectable yeoman. He believed the paltry means of procuring signatures which had been described, never had been resorted to.

The petition was then laid on the table.

Mr. Brougham rose to submit a proposition to the house, of which he had given notice last night, on presenting a petition from the Catholic Association, subscribed by a large number of Peers, and other persons of distinguished rank, six prelates of the Catholic Church, three archbishops and three bishops, composing together a most important body both in point of rank and fortune, and influence with their Catholic countrymen, who prayed that before the bill now pending was passed, they might be heard by counsel at the bar. In moving that this prayer be granted, he must observe that at almost any other period than the present, upon any ordinary measure, so far from regarding the motion which he had now to make as a grave, urgent, and momentous affair, he should look upon it as a mere matter of course; since upon all ordinary occasions, it was the practice of the house—a practice no less befitting its wisdom than agreeable to the dictates of justice, never to condemn any persons without hearing, or at least never to refuse a hearing to those who demanded it (hear, hear). But from the disposition which he had perceived on the part of those by whom the bill had been brought in, to hurry it through all its stages with an unusual impetuosity, he had reason to believe that his motion, instead of being agreed to as a matter of course, would be contested with as much earnestness as the most controvertible points of the question to which it related. He found, to his astonishment, that those persons were not satisfied with having made up their minds on the statements which had been made on the other side of the house, so many of which had been refuted—many corrected, and many explained away; but that, on the contrary, when those parties who were most deeply concerned in the truth or falsehood of those facts, and against whom charges had been raised out of them, demanded a further inquiry—when, to use the allusion of the hon. member for Westminster, they said to the Parliament, “Strike, but hear!”—then those same persons, who so readily swallowed the facts asserted before them without the slightest proof, were prepared to go still a step further, and to say—“Decide we will; but hear we will not” (hear, hear). He would not disguise his opinion, that no question had ever been so likely to produce a disastrous result, if the fears which he entertained should be realized, and the house should reject the prayer of this petition. Good God! could they close their doors, which were open to all private complaints, comparatively of little moment—could they refuse the request of six millions of people, and in a case like this proceed to convict, to sentence, and to execute, without affording them a trial (cheers)? Was it possible that the house would reject this firm, but humble and reasonable request—that it would refuse to adopt that course, which was at once just and wise; and follow that which must involve the nation in inextricable difficulty? He derived some encouragement from the alarming magnitude of that difficulty; because the more momentous the alternative, the more he was induced to believe it impossible that the house would venture to encounter it. He could not bring himself to imagine that the house would incur so frightful a responsibility (cheers). The present question stood upon grounds so distinct and clear from those on which the bill was founded, that he trusted that those members who had even supported the bill, might, nevertheless, with equal reason and consistency, support the motion with which he should trouble the house (cheers). If he wished the bill to pass, he should be most anxious to pave the way for it, by hearing the parties at the bar. The more dreadful the consequences might be of adopting such a measure rashly, the more desirous should he be to have the grounds upon which it was founded proved beyond the possibility of question (hear, hear). If, after this, the measure should be carried, its advocates would at least have prevented men from saying that the Catholics had been condemned unheard. They would have guarded themselves against the reproach of having legislated on any other ground than that of indisputable facts. Facts, to be sure, had been stated; but he was authorized to say, that there was a cloud of witnesses to disprove them (cheers). No man could—at least no man ought—to decide upon a measure like this upon general reasoning. It was not a question, the grounds of which were undisputed—like the question of foreign trade, or the consolidation of excise and customs, where any man who was acquainted with the existing statutes and the practice of the courts could form an opinion on the subject—not like that relating to the Court of Chancery; although even there the house had not been asked to conclude without receiving proof. His hon. friend (Mr. J. Williams), although he might have rested his case on the notoriety of the subject—for no man would venture to deny that a greater practical evil than the Court of Chancery had ever existed in the country—did not ask for leave to bring in a bill; but he asked for a committee of inquiry, that the matter might be sifted, and that the party accused might have an opportunity of being heard. The same course had been adopted in other cases, so numerous, and recent, that it was unnecessary to mention them. But if he required an instance in which it was obviously unjust to legislate upon a case which depended wholly upon facts requiring satisfactory proof, it was the present measure, which went the length of suspending the constitution of the country (cheers). The facts which the rt. hon. gent. (Mr. Goulburn) had stated when he introduced the bill, were neither numerous, nor distinguished by the richness or variety of their colours; though their number and variety was quite equal to their correctness (a laugh). Little, however, as was the bulk of proof on which the house was asked to legislate, the Catholics were ready to meet him on that ground. They offered a cloud of evidence, parol and documentary, to disprove every title of that which had been alleged by the rt. hon. gent. It would be too much to refuse such an offer; it would be too much for the house to say “We don’t care a rush for your evidence—we must go on; if we let eight-and-forty hours elapse without passing the bill, the danger which it is intended to check will have grown too large—we don’t want to see your petitions—they haunt us continually—we have ill-treated you enough already; but we will not hear you, because when we shall have listened night after night to your complaints, and shall have been tortured with the tale of your distresses, as we have resolved to pass this bill, we shall in the end only be obliged to add insult to injury; and although we have determined to injure, we think it as well not to insult you" (cheering). He entertained no doubt that if the house would open its doors to the evidence which he offered, they would shut them for ever upon this bill (cheers). He would give one or two examples, more forcible than all the reasoning he could employ, of the nature of the evidence. The house had not forgotten, in the choice and small collection of facts to which they had been treated, the stress which was laid on the case of Hailey, the soldier. Who would not have supposed, from the statement which had been made of the overwhelming force which the Association had arrayed against this man—of the manner in which that resolution had been promulgated, with a view, as it was concluded, of ensuring the man's conviction by exciting religious prejudice against him, who would not have supposed after this, that Hailey was an Orangeman and a Protestant? How would the house, then, be surprised to hear, that he was a Catholic and an Irishman (hear, hear)—that the Irish Catholic was prosecuted by the Catholic Association for administering unlawful oaths (hear, hear). This example would serve to show the necessity of inquiry before hon. members admitted the existence of dangers which were no more substantial than the statements of the rt. hon. gent. Such statements, although they might be calculated to have an impression at Wells, and such places, where there were cathedrals, and schoolmasters, and little boys, were not sufficient for the house to legislate upon. The persons who were the objects of accusation under this bill were prepared to adduce the most undeniable proof. They were willing that the evidence they had to offer should run the gauntlet of the severest cross-examination before it should be received. To quiet the alarms which it was affected to entertain for the Church Establishment, they offered evidence of its being the well-known, decided, deep-rooted feeling, constantly professed, and consistently maintained, as far as acts combined with words could prove consistency, by the most eminent members of the Association, that, whatever was their zeal for the interests of their country—whatever their devotion to the interests of their own religion—how much soever they had smarted under the influence of the Established Church, they nevertheless deprecated and abjured the principle of seeing one tithe-part of one tithe-sheaf, transferred from the Protestant to the Catholic clergy. The topics he had mentioned were only samples of the evidence which the petitioners had ready to produce. This petition was not got up for delay—not even for the purpose of putting off the second reading of the bill. The witnesses were all here—they had arrived in London (cheers), and they might be examined to-morrow if the house should think fit. They consisted of the most important members of the Association. They were men of acknowledged talent—men not less remarkable for their profound knowledge of the professions to which they belonged, than for their general acquirements. They did not come to make speeches to the house; but they asked for an opportunity to clear up their own conduct, which had been aspersed—to explain their motives, which had been aspersed—to vindicate the Association, which had been aspersed—to rescue their country and their religion, both of which had been aspersed (cheers). He was morally certain that the house, as well as the parties who were interested in this measure, would come out of the inquiry with much more friendly feelings towards each other (hear, hear, hear). The sentiments of the house would be softened towards them; and they, and the whole body of the Irish Catholics whom they represented, would retire from the bar to the bosom of their country deeply penetrated with emotions of affection and gratitude, for the treatment they would have experienced. Unless they were examined the house would say to the people of Ireland, "We dare not hear your remonstrances, we dare not listen to your proofs; but all that we dare to do is to gag you with penal disqualifications" (cheers). He entreated the house to remember that conciliation was the object nearest the heart of every man who had the sense to know, and the feeling to wish for what was most advantageous to the country. What opportunity had ever occurred since the union, in which this desire could be so safely, so easily, so expeditiously accomplished, as that which then presented itself to the house? The petitioners who prayed to be heard at the bar of the house, were persons of the highest talents, and of the greatest influence in their own country. They represented the whole people of Ireland—nay, it was as if the whole people of Ireland were ready to solemnize a compact of conciliation, which should have the effect of establishing the repose of Ireland—he should rather say, the repose of the whole empire. Would they shut their doors against them, and bid them go away, their petition rejected, their evidence unheard? If they did so, they would do that which in all human probability might produce consequences which the youngest among them would not live to see repaired, and which the boldest would not be able to contemplate without dismay (loud cheering). But it was the wish of those who advocated this measure, to go to work by another, and, as they thought, a shorter-way. They said, "We will have nothing to do with the Catholic Association; we will at all events put that down by an act of Parliament, and conciliation is not what we want." This would be the most grievous mistake that ever the house had made. He did not think that the proceedings in 1766, nor those by which America was lost to this country in 1775, were any greater mistakes. They were at least in some degree more excusable, because the representations then made to Parliament, and to which Parliament refused to listen, were urged by one or two individuals of obscure rank, and who were perhaps believed to be mere fanatics. The House of Commons of that day did not know, when they refused to hear Dr. Franklin—now a great and illustrious name—at the bar of the house—when they paid the highest price that had ever then been paid for a sarcastic speech, to have him abused in the Privy Council—that he held in his hands the destiny of that part of their empire. But the house he was now addressing, did know that the men who now prayed to have their evidence received, enjoyed the unlimited esteem and confidence of the Catholics of Ireland. They knew that these men had the confidence of the whole Association; and the Association of all Ireland. The practicability, therefore, of the conciliation which he recommended was obvious. If the house would adopt the measure recommended, they would either grant the Catholics all they prayed for, and then the conciliation would be perpetual; or they would reject it, but it would be after a kind and conciliatory process, which would bind the Catholics to a rational and dutiful submission. Either alternative might be safely and advantageously adopted; and the least preferable would be a thousand times better than the frightful consequences which must result from rejecting the evidence they tendered. It would be urged that the house must be bound by precedents. He thought he should be able to show that there had been precedents of such a nature; but if not, that would not abate the earnestness with which he should recommend his motion; because a new case made a new precedent, and that which ought to be done was not the less expedient because it was to be done for the first time. America had been lost by precedents. In 1766, the business of the Stamp Act furnished an abundant precedent for the measure which he now urged. A general law had passed the house, applying to no particular class, but falling upon the whole body of the colonists. It was found that this impost was extremely grievous, and petitions were received from the colonies, signed by the people resident, and by individuals in this country, who were payers of the tax on account of their American possessions. Their petitions were referred to a committee of the whole house. This took place in Jan. 1766, when the testimony of Dr. Franklin was offered at the bar of the house, and to which, as it had since passed into a literary document, it was unnecessary farther to allude. The result of the investigation was the repeal of the tax; so that in this case the house not only examined the witnesses offered by the petitioners against an objectionable law, but they repealed the law itself (cheers). The disturbances which took place in America some years subsequent, gave rise to a very different line of conduct. A petition was presented to the House of Commons in 1774, against the two bills relating to the government of Massachusetts's Bay. He would read an extract from that petition, from the journals of that house. The petitioners, alluding to the excesses which had been committed by the inhabitants of Boston, said—"If disturbances have happened in the colonies, they entreat the house to consider the causes which have produced them, among a people hitherto remarkable for their loyalty to the Crown, and affection for this kingdom; no history can show, nor will human nature admit of, an instance of general discontent, but from a general sense of oppression." Upon this occasion, however, as he had said, the house did not adopt the same moderate and rational proceeding as in 1766. The same arguments were used then as had been and would be urged on the present occasion—that this was a general measure—that it was a matter of state policy. In the House of Lords, a protest was signed by men, than whom there had been none of higher reputation in any period of this country's history, in either house of Parliament; there were, among others less illustrious, the names of Camden, Portland, Fitzwilliam, and Rockingham: and the terms in which they recorded their dissent were worthy of being remembered. The prayer of the petitioners was then, as now, that before

"any resolution should be taken against them, they might be heard." Their lordships protested against the refusal to grant this prayer, because it was "a proceeding of the most unwarrantable nature, and directly subversive of the most sacred rights of the subject;" and they added, "We protest, therefore, against the refusal to suffer such petitions to be presented, and we thus clear ourselves of the disgrace and mischief which must attend this unconstitutional, indecent, and improvident proceeding." Such was the opinion of the great men of that day, with respect to a measure somewhat similar in its nature, as far as it had yet proceeded, but here he hoped to God the similarity might end (cheers). Dr. Franklin, in one of his letters written about this time, said to his countrymen, "Your growing wealth will soon make your friendship valuable, and enmity feared, and you will find that you will be treated by other nations not only with justice but with kindness." There is an Italian proverb, "Make yourselves sheep and the wolves will eat you." The parallel might be applied to Ireland, and it would be wise for England at least not to risk a second time the loss of such advantages as those which she had once wantonly thrown away. The Governor of Massachusetts, who was in London about the same time, in writing to one of his friends in America, described the House of Lords, where he had been below the bar during a debate in which Lord Chatham proposed a motion, the object of which would have been to conciliate America, but without success. The Governor of Massachusetts said to his correspondent, "the greater part of the Peers were so ignorant, that I could not but form a very mean opinion of their abilities; and that this country should claim the sovereignty over three millions of people (not six millions) appears to me the greatest of all absurdities, since those who legislate have scarcely discretion enough to govern a herd of swine" (laughter). This was homely language, but it was hardly undeserved. The representations of those who would have advised a more rational and conciliatory course were disregarded. They were called fanatics, and accused of countenancing rebels. The danger which threatened the country was despised; the consequence was, that the petition was rejected, the evidence was not admitted, and the colonies of America were lost to this country for ever! The consequence was, that a struggle ensued between the mother country and her colonies, which, after thousands of lives had been lost, and a hundred millions added to our debt, ended in favour of the colonies, and thus—to use the words of the hon. member for Westminster, on a former night—its brightest jewel was plucked from the British crown. He rejoiced to see so magnificent a spectacle exhibited to the world on the other side of the Atlantic—three millions of men struggling against oppression and surmounting it. He rejoiced to think that the United States had increased and prospered with an increase and prosperity, till they had shown us one of the most magnificent scenes which any age of the world had ever displayed—that of a great community of free men governing themselves cheaply, and uniting, for the first time in the history of republics, great justice with magnanimity, and a delicate and even affecting feeling of gratitude towards their earliest deliverers: he alluded to the late touching and admirable spectacle exhibited on the arrival of La Fayette in America, which was paralleled by nothing in ancient or modern times, and sufficient to wipe away for ever the stain which was supposed to attach to the name of republic on account of the ingratitude of those of ancient days to their defenders. The youngest member must recollect that counsel had been heard, and witnesses examined in cases which would bear an exact comparison with the present. He himself, before he had the honour of being, as he might say, introduced to the acquaintance of the house, had been occupied for three or four weeks in examining witnesses at the bar on the subject of the orders in council. The knowledge which he acquired in that way was not without its use three or four years after, when he succeeded in abolishing that abominable system of policy. So, on the present occasion, he knew that the proceedings which he proposed, would, if it should be allowed, have the effect of throwing much light on the subject of Ireland. It would be a glorious exhibition of sympathy—the house representing the people of England, and the witnesses at the bar the discontent of Ireland. On a former occasion the house was about to pass a bill which affected the interests of the hawkers and pedlars; whereupon they, with a force and elegance of expression, for which, if he had not seen it, he could not have given credit to that ingenious and itinerant body, addressed the house in the following language:—"We have heard with the utmost astonishment and dismay that a bill has been introduced into your hon. house for our utter extermination, unheard, untried, uncondemned. We claim it as our birth-right to be confronted with our accusers, and heard by counsel and witnesses at your bar!" In June, 1786, the prayer of the hawkers and pedlars was complied with, and counsel and evidence were heard at the bar. Let the house award to the Catholics of Ireland the same justice that they had meted to the hawkers and pedlars, and he would be content. Whether the bill were necessary or not, the passing or rejecting of it ought to be founded on evidence at the bar. Above all, he would have the house to recollect, that if they brought to their bar witnesses who would represent the interests of Ireland, they would, whether the bill should pass or not, lay the foundation of a lasting, permanent, and in every respect unexceptionable concession to the people of Ireland.

Mr. C. W. Wynn objected to the motion, because it was inconsistent with the general usage of parliament. The learned gent. had supposed that the opposition which was likely to be made to his motion proceeded from a disposition to press the bill with unusual expedition. Such a charge was made with an ill grace, after four nights had been consumed in debating—a circumstance which he believed had never occurred before in parliamentary history. It was said that the bill condemned the Catholic body—Although, in truth, its object was to put down all associations which, under the garb of religion, were in fact political bodies. It was said, that unless the prayer of the petition should be acceded to, the Catholics would have nobody to represent them in that house. That was not the case. There were many members of that house who would represent the Catholics and speak their sentiments. He would endeavour to quote some precedents for guiding the conduct of the house on the present occasion. In 1786, a bill was introduced for regulating the duration of the poll at elections. The then member for Westminster presented a petition from his constituents, praying that they might be heard by counsel against the measure. Mr. Pitt opposed the prayer of the petition, on the ground that there was nothing in the bill which affected Westminster any more than any other town or borough in the kingdom. The house divided on the question, and the great majority of the house decided against it. He was the more surprised at the learned gent.'s line of argument, as he recollected that four years ago, when he (Mr. Wynn) presented a petition from a most respectable individual, begging that he might be heard at the bar, as the next friend to a body of negroes, on the ground that the negroes were in the situation of minors, and could not act for themselves, against a bill, which had been introduced, to remove them from an island, where they had been born, and long resided, the learned member objected, that if the petition should be granted, the house would next have a person coming forward as next friend to the people of England. With regard to the soldier's case, it had not, he believed, been stated on his side of the house, whether the man was a Protestant or a Catholic (hear, hear). All that had been contended for was, that it was subversive of justice, that the case of any individual should be prejudged before his trial (hear, hear). He required no other evidence to induce him to vote for the bill than what he found in the declared and acknowledged acts of the Association.

Sir J. Yorke said, that if the learned member could persuade him, that by bringing the members of the Association to the bar, the two countries would shake hands so as never to part (a laugh), he would surrender all his feelings on the subject. But he had heard precisely the same threats of separation and invasion, for the last twenty-five years. He believed, however, that when the bill before the house should receive the sanction of Parliament, the learned gent.'s friends would sit down as quietly as he himself had just now done (a laugh). He remembered that during the rebellion in 1798, when he was cruising off the coast of Ireland, to prevent supplies being landed, he observed the Emerald Isle from Cape Clear, and he happened to say to his master, it was a pity that the potatoe, the bread of Ireland, should always keep her in a bad state. To which the master replied, "that England would never get any good of her till she had been twenty-four hours under water." That, he said, would keep her cool, and then she would see how much old England had done for her. What was the fact? In financial matters the greatest consideration was paid to Ireland, and only one-seventeenth part of the whole revenue was furnished by her. When the people of Ireland were recently in a state of starvation, the people of England generously put their hands in their pockets, and subscribed 500,000*l.* for their relief. Was Parliament to have the old story about "six millions of their fellow-subjects" dinned into their ears for ever? It was said, that granting the Catholic question would content the people of Ireland. The people of Ireland did not care two bad potatoes about the matter (laughter). If Government declared that the measure which they had introduced was necessary, he would support it, let the consequences be what they might.

Mr. Hobhouse thought it was impossible that the house could commit such an act of injustice as to refuse to hear the Association through their counsel. The rt. hon. gent. (Mr. Wynn) had furnished himself with precedents to oppose the motion, as the right hon. Sec. for Ireland had with cases to support the bill. He knew not better how to characterise the precedents than by declaring that they were as good as the cases, and neither was good for any thing—Et tu vitula dignus et hic. Ministers seemed to have determined beforehand to deal with the Association in a particular way, and not to allow any circumstances to change their determination. A proof of this was to be found in the manner in which Lord Liverpool had refused to hold any communication with Mr. Eneas M'Donnell, who had requested an interview on the subject of the Catholic Association, because, forsooth, he was Secretary to the Association. His lordship's conduct reminded him of M. Vertot, who wrote the history of the sieges of Rhodes. A friend, to whom he had shown the work, called upon him to say that he could furnish him with several facts, and moreover point out sundry inaccuracies in the manuscript. The Abbé replied, "Je n'en doute point, et j'en suis fâché, mais que voulez-vous ? je l'ai fait." This was plainly a case in which counsel ought to be heard; and he trusted that the house would yet reject a measure so fraught with danger and difficulty.

The Solicitor-General was content to look at the question as to hearing counsel upon the measure, in this way—had the house already before it, or had it not, materials sufficient to warrant its coming to a decision? He thought that it had amply; and that without resorting to a single fact which was not admitted by gentlemen on the other side. First, it was not denied that the Association represented the people of Ireland; next, it was admitted, that this Association, upon its own showing, was formed for the redress of all grievances, whether local or general, which affected the Irish people. Here then was a body of delegates—though not formally so—meeting for the redress of grievances. In fact, the printed resolutions of the Association, which had been ventilated through Ireland (a laugh), were decisive proof of this fact. The Association took upon itself, farther, a direct financial character; and whether its levies were made by taxes or in the shape of a voluntary contribution, he considered to be a flimsy distinction. It was either illegal, or led to illegality. According to Rex v. Dolby, no person contributing to the funds of the Association could sit as a juror, or be examined as a witness on any trial in which that Association was concerned. Then, as almost every Catholic in Ireland was a subscriber to the rent, scarcely one in a hundred could be in a condition either to sit as a juror, or to give evidence as a witness, in any such cause. If counter-associations arose on the part of the Protestants, disabilities on their part would be equally created, until the thing would end in a stoppage of all justice throughout the country. Whether the subscription paid to this Association were voluntary or compelled, it was illegal. But it was said to be voluntary: let the house see how it was collected. A register was kept of those who gave, and of those who refused to give; and this register was exhibited at every general meeting. Those who did not give, it would be remembered, the priest who went round had power to excommunicate. But if there were no fear of offending the priests by a refusal to contribute, was there no dislike to be made a marked character—to be put down in the black book? He should be inclined to say of this voluntary contribution, what Dr. Johnson had said of the congé d'être, in reply to some one who observed, that it was not an order to the Dean and Chapter to elect, but only a recommendation. "Recommendation!" said that eminent person—"Yes, in the same sense, as when you threw a man out of a two pair of stairs window, and recommended him to fall to the ground" (a laugh). But suppose the contributions voluntary: such in general, were not lawful, without a licence from the Crown. In the time of Atterbury, who was known to have friendships at the court of St. Germain, certain sums of money had been collected by the scheme of a charity sermon, and the bishop was believed to have disposed of them in that quarter. Now, for preaching that charity sermon a clergyman had been prosecuted; and the judge told the jury that this practice was dangerous, and that it was an invasion of the prerogative of the Crown and of the Legislature. Thus, in fact, it was illegal to raise money by contribution in a church, even for the purpose of charity, except by licence from the crown. And what was this law but merely reasonable? The Crown had not the power of the purse against the people; and therefore it was unconstitutional that the people should have the power of the purse against the Crown. He had gone back to the time of Atterbury for this case; but the principle had been acknowledged much later. Mr. Sheridan, in 1794, when the question arose, whether the Crown could receive a voluntary contribution—had been the first to declare such a course unconstitutional. That money was to have been paid into the hands of ministers; it was for a purpose which Parliament had already recognized—the furnishing equipment for the war; and yet Mr. Sheridan had said, "Compulsory gifts are one offence, and gifts however free, are another; but one course, no less than the other, amounts to a breach of the privilege of this house; and therefore I think that the Serjeant at arms ought to be sent to take the chairman of any meeting attempting such a course into custody." But to return to the petition before the house. The prayer was to be heard, not merely by counsel but by witnesses. They would call witnesses to show that, since the commencement of the Association, it had never done any act, or made any declaration, calculated to excite alarm or exasperate animosity. What, then, these witnesses were to give evidence, not as to facts, but as to intentions! They were to furnish the house with their opinions, not with accounts of that which actually had been done! He wanted nothing of this kind—no arguments and deductions. There might be thirty witnesses, or twice thirty, for aught he knew. No doubt thirty witnesses might be found to say, that to hate a Protestant meant to love a Protestant, and that to adjure one party by the hatred they bore another was not to excite animosities (cheers). Hon. gentlemen talked of precedent in the case; but what counsel had been waited for three years ago, when a bill to limit the establishment of societies in Ireland had been passed? It was wild to talk of privileges by the letter; by the bill of rights, it was said that the subjects of England might arm; but who would have thought of calling witnesses, some years back, when the seditious meetings' bills were under discussion, to show that bodies of men might assemble to practise military exercise? Now, he had assumed nothing as a fact, which was denied by the supporters of the Association. He admitted that witnesses and counsel had frequently been heard in cases depending upon general principles; but that had always been in cases where the house had not facts sufficient to legislate upon before it. In conclusion, he opposed the hearing of counsel in the present case, as an unnecessary consumption of time (cheers).

Mr. Spring Rice said, that the evidence tendered to the house was widely different from evidence of impression and opinion. Every paper, every document, which the Association had ever received or issued since its formation, was now within the reach of the house; and was it possible that hon. members would proceed upon the worst evidence when the best was in their power (loud cheers)? For precedent in a case like this he did not care; the measure contemplated was wholly unprecedented; but precedent he had for hearing counsel, and that of no slight authority, as it related to a Catholic case in the reign of King Anne (much laughing). In the year 1698 an act had been introduced in the Irish parliament for "providing for the greater security of his Majesty's person and Government." This might be called a pretty general measure, but a provision was inserted which, the Catholics thought, affected them, and counsel had been heard against it, upon petition, before it was passed. In the year 1703, another bill had been brought in "to prevent the further growth of Popery;" and against that bill, as well as the former, counsel had been heard. Again, in the year 1715, a bill had been introduced, prescribing the oath of supremacy to be taken in certain new cases. Against that bill counsel were heard, and the clause complained of was accordingly expunged (loud cheers). He cautioned the house against the refusal of the present motion. If it were refused, the Irish would have just cause to complain that they were treated worse than their ancestors had been in the reigns of King William and Queen Anne (hear, hear). It would appear from the speech of the rt. hon. Sec. (Canning), that the great obstacles with which the Catholic question had now to struggle, did not lie in the opposition of a noble and learned person in another place, but in the resolutions which had been proposed respecting church property in Ireland by the member for Aberdeen. Whatever might have been the merits of those resolutions, the Catholics had nothing to do with them. The Catholics were accused of having supported the proposition about the reformation of the tithe system in Ireland. When that question arose, he had found it necessary, in the discharge of his duty, to send round the resolutions to Catholic as well as Protestant Peers. Amongst others he had sent them to Lord Kenmare, but he refused to sign, alleging, that as a Catholic he was unwilling to interfere with the tithe system of the Established Church. This feeling was not confined to Lord Kenmare; it was, he had no doubt, general with the sound part of the Catholic population. It was asked some time back, in a committee above stairs, when a Catholic priest was under examination, whether, if the Catholic question were carried, the Catholic priesthood would look for a monopoly, or for any part of the tithe property? The answer was, that, though undoubtedly they were not indifferent to some provision, they were far from thinking of any provision from the tithes; and after the example of the effects of that system in the other church, they could not believe that that source of emolument would add to their comfort, or to their respectability among the people. He concluded, by reminding the house, that the whole people of Ireland were now at their bar praying to be heard; and he added, that if their prayer were refused, even the oldest member amongst them might live to repent it (cheers).

Mr. Peel said, that without going into an examination of what was done in the case of the provinces of America, or enquiring into the numbers and power of the Catholics—topics which had been referred to in no very discreet terms—he would content himself with asking whether this was a question consistent with the usage of Parliament, or required as an act of justice to the Catholics? If both were answered in the affirmative, he would consent to the proposition, but if not, he would reject it, with all its consequences. With respect to precedents, if he found that the uniform stream of parliamentary usage were against the present motion, he could not repugn the general principle on which Parliament had been wont to act. Now he conceived the principle to be, that Parliament would hear counsel in all cases where the private or personal rights of individuals were to be interfered with in any general measure. In such case they acted as a court of judicature, where all parties interested in the case were allowed to be heard; and he apprehended that all the precedents quoted on the other side fell within this description. The case of the hawkers and pedlars, with which the hon. member opposite had wound up his climax, was within this rule. They claimed to be heard against a bill, not as subjecting them to penalties in common with others, but as imposing a peculiar penalty upon them alone; they claimed it in conformity with the rule he had cited, and they were accordingly heard at the bar. It was plain, therefore, that this case was not at all in point. But if the house agreed to hear counsel and witnesses on the present question, what bill could be introduced, on which some parties would not claim the same privilege? The Habeas Corpus Suspension bill had been passed without any such claim; but if the present motion were carried, even on such a measure parties would claim to be heard. The alien act had been mentioned; but that bill had been passed, without any such claim being recognized on the part of individuals; and so, in fact, had all the general measures of the last ten years. If the claim were admitted, no public measure upon which any individuals might differ from the opinion of Parliament, could hereafter pass without hearing counsel at the bar. It was well known that a counsel never thought of any extended interests or principles; he looked only to the advantage of his client. He could cite a memorable illustration of this in the instance of the learned gent., who, on the trial of the Queen, had emphatically declared, that, be the consequences what they might to the country, he could look to no other interests than those of his client. He did not mean to deny the justice of that doctrine, but he wished the house to see what would be its effect in a case like this. The whole privilege of general discussion would be cut up, and gentlemen not accustomed to professional habits of speaking, would be completely overborne by counsel. He remembered that last session, when the Marine Insurance bill was before the house, there were not fewer than six wigs at one time at their bar; and if so limited an interest could send six, what numbers might not be sent by all the Catholics of Ireland. He recollected on that occasion, that when four of the learned counsel had exhausted themselves in addressing the house, an imploring look was cast towards the remaining two, as if to entreat their silence; but the interests of their clients was paramount, and the look was cast in vain. When the bill before alluded to, for authorizing the removal of some West India slaves from one island to another was before the house, a benevolent person wished to have counsel heard, on the ground that the proposed removal was wholly against the wills of the negroes. On that occasion, the learned gent. (Mr. Brougham) had stated, that if Mr. Stephen were heard as next of kin to the blacks, some other counsel, on some future question, would pray to be heard, as next of kin to the whole people of England—though if the principle could be admitted in any case, that was one in which an exception might be made: yet so persuaded was he, after hearing the learned gent.'s eloquent appeal, of the bad consequences of such a precedent, that he voted against it (hear, hear). He could not be awayed on this occasion by any fear that the consequences of refusing this prayer would lead to any event as had happened with respect to the Provinces of North America. He had too good an opinion of the Catholics to anticipate any such result; and he was surprised that even a hint of the kind should have come from their defenders. Could he suspect them of such intentions, his objections to the Catholic claims would be increased, ten-fold. Then leaving the question of precedent, he would come to the only other ground on which this motion could rest—that of supplying better evidence than had been afforded as a basis for the measure against which the Catholics claimed to be heard. It was stated that we had no instance of such a bill having been introduced without previous communication from the Crown, or documents to show its necessity being laid before a committee of the house. This was not the fact. The Habeas Corpus Act had been suspended more than once, without any such preliminaries. The house, in those and other instances, had acted upon the notoriety of the facts. When the Convention Act passed the Irish Parliament, in 1793, there was no communication from Government, no papers laid before the house, no committee of inquiry. It was true, the Lords had a committee; but it was for another purpose; and in their report, they noticed the existence and the dangerous tendency of assemblies, acting by branch committees, and collecting voluntary subscriptions; and on this report, and the notoriety of the facts to which it alluded, the Parliament proceeded. In the same way it passed an act in 1795, for the more effect-tual suppression of unlawful assemblies. Without waiting for, or requiring any such evidence, Parliament did then, what he hoped it would do now; it legislated on the notoriety of the facts. There were on the present occasion no green-bags—no secret or select committees, which on a former occasion had been so violently condemned; but ministers had come forward, acting on their own responsibility, and were now blamed for adopting that conduct which they had before been blamed for not adopting. The measure was introduced for the purpose of putting down secret societies of every kind (cheers from the Opposition). He understood the nature of those cheers. They insinuated that he would support societies on one side; and now, for an appearance of consistency, would agree to a measure which affected to put them down in both. He had no such feeling. He had from the first expressed his dislike of all party associations; and two years ago, when a measure was introduced for putting down the Orange societies, he gave it his support—though he must say that he did not then hear any of the constitutional scruples which were now avowed on the other side of the house (hear, hear). The associations then attacked were not much in favour with gentlemen opposite, which perhaps would account for their silence (hear, hear). The act which was then passed, had been grounded on notoriety alone; and he apprehended, that if Alderman King, who had appeared at their bar on one occasion, had come forward, and avowed himself as the deputy grand master of the Orange lodges, and had prayed to be heard against the measure, that his prayer would have met with but a cold reception from gentlemen opposite (cheers). If this were a condemnatory measure, and were to have a retro-active effect, then, indeed, the prayer of the petitioners might be reasonably heard, and allowed; but it was not intended to have any such effect, although the learned gent. had called it a condemnatory bill, in order to justify his motion. To come to the alleged necessity of the motion, for the purpose of supplying evidence not already before the house, he would contend that there was evidence enough to satisfy them of the injurious tendency of this Association. Without taking the intemperate speeches of one or more members of this body, he could demonstrate their pernicious tendency from one of their latest acts, a petition of the 17th of Feb. last. It was there stated that "the Catholics of Ireland felt the necessity of bestirring themselves in their own affairs, and it was deemed right to enter into an association to promote the general interest of their body, and to bring frequently under the notice of Parliament their grievances, and the delays in redressing them." Was not that like an avowal of their representative power (no, no, from the Opposition side; hear, hear! from the Ministerial)? The petition concluded with a prayer "that no measure should be adopted against the Catholic Association, or against any portion of the Catholic people of Ireland, without first affording the petitioners a full opportunity of vindicating their principles and conduct at the bar of the house, and to be heard, if necessary, as well by witnesses, as by their counsel." That passage, he maintained, amounted to an admission of their representative capacity at once (no, no, and hear, hear). He did not admit the distinction as to direct and virtual representation. In publicly addressing Parliament for the redress of grievances, they asserted at least an admission of their existence as a body, and the house should never forget that they were a body who had assembled twenty times since the month of October. They were also a body who appointed committees of finance, grievances, and education. Was it to be allowed that men should thus usurp the privilege and practice of a Parliament, and these men forming an assembly, of which any man might become a member who paid his guinea. The petitioners denied the charge of levying contributions. He did not mean to say that they could legally enforce the payment of those contributions, but there was a moral as well as a legal influence, and that they did not fail to take advantage of. The names of subscribers were publicly read at the parochial meetings. Was it no exercise of their power that the names of those who did not contribute should be placed in their black book, as a learned friend had called it? But be the subscriptions voluntary, or involuntary, was it to be borne that funds should be thus collected for the purpose of securing the press—far prosecuting all who might injure Catholics, and for opposing Orangemen? Could an association with such objects be carried on without irritating the public mind in Ireland? He would not put his own construction on their objects: let their own public document speak for them. The Committee of the Association appointed to consider the necessity of raising subscriptions, state in their report, "that it was necessary to have pecuniary resources, to animate and give effect to the energies of the Irish people." Now, these resolutions were followed by an act, which was in itself calculated to excite the strongest suspicion, and to awaken feelings of alarm, which it might be difficult to allay. On the very same day that they declared the necessity of raising a supply of 40,000*l.* "to animate the energies of the Irish people"—on the same day that those people were called upon "by the hate they bore to Orangemen," to forward the views of the Association, they unanimously elected into their body, Mr. Hamilton Rowan. In the letter of the secretary communicating that address, he spoke of his election having been voted, with an enthusiasm and unanimity seldom witnessed: that on the mention of his beloved and honoured name, it was hailed with the applause which was at once the testimony to, and the reward of a life which had been devoted to the service of his country. With respect to Mr. Rowan, a secret committee of the Irish House of Lords which sat in the year 1799, stated in their report, that in April 1794, a Mr. Jackson, an English clergyman, came over to Ireland from the Directory of France, to arrange the plan of a French invasion of that country. Mr. Jackson stated that he met, and had several interviews and conversations on the subject of his mission with Mr. Hamilton Rowan, a principal leader of the United Irishmen, who had since fled the country, and had been attainted of high treason. He had also met a Mr. Wolfe Tone, who had escaped, and was re-taken on board a French ship; and a Mr. Lewins, a representative of the United Irishmen to the French Directory. Now he would ask, if the sentiments conveyed in the address to Mr. Rowan were supposed to prevail amongst the six millions of Irish Catholics, what was there which could convince the Protestants of Ireland or of England that there was no danger to be apprehended from a body who, on the same day that they had recommended the necessity of a general subscription—on the same day that they had spoken of the hatred they bore to Orangemen, had voted such an address to a convicted traitor (loud cheers)? Was it at all an exaggeration to call such an act suspicious, or would the learned member (Sir J. M'Intosh), the public professor of a public institution, attempt to justify such a proceeding in aid of civil liberty? The house were told of the great numbers and respectability of the Association. It was said to consist of "Catholic prelates, peers, and baronets—of many Protestants of noble families and great possessions—of many distinguished members of high and learned professions—of commercial men of great wealth and character—of country gentlemen, farmers, traders and substantial citizens." He would not deny this; but he would contend, that if it proved any thing, it proved too much; the greater the influence, the more mischievous the proceedings of such a body were like to be. It was not in any private surmises of his own, but in the recorded acts of the Association, that he looked for grounds for passing this bill; and feeling that he was acting upon strictly parliamentary grounds, he should, with that confidence which the sense of right always inspired, give his vote most conscientiously against hearing the petitioners at the bar (loud cheering).

Mr. C. H. Hutchinson protested against the practice of bringing the conduct of individuals, who were not present to defend themselves, under the consideration of Parliament, and was grieved at the rt. hon. Secretary's allusion to the conduct of Mr. Rowan. Now he happened to be in Dublin at the time when Mr. Rowan was obliged to leave the country; and he could say, in the language of the Association, that no man who left Ireland was ever more regretted and lamented (hear, hear). Ireland possessed no better man; no man more respected for the integrity of his public principles, and the virtues of his private life. He had not the honour of his acquaintance; but he knew that the Association spoke the thoughts of all Ireland when it used those terms on the occasion of Mr. Rowan's election, which had been so strongly reprobated (hear, hear). It was impossible for him, who had lived in Ireland during her days of misfortune, to answer the assertions of the rt. hon. Sec. without feelings of pain and regret. He was not about to justify those who had been condemned by the law; but he was bound to inform the rt. hon. Sec. that in 1791 and 1793 some of the fairest names in Ireland were enrolled among the United Irishmen (hear, hear). The object which they had in view was to get rid of that odious system which had so long oppressed and degraded Ireland, and which had recently disappeared in part under the present administration—that system which had occasioned, first of all, the rebellion of 1798, and subsequently, the disgraceful Union of 1801. The men who had failed to overthrow that hideous system, which ministers had at last themselves abandoned, were now branded as rebels and traitors, though they would have been hailed, if successful, as patriots and benefactors to their country. Hampden, and Russell, and Sydney, were traitors, till the cause of liberty flourished in England; and if despotism had prevailed, instead of freedom, they would have been so to the present day. The rt. hon. Sec. had taunted his side of the house with inconsistency in declaring against the bill, after they had received with acclamations the bill against the Orange Societies. But those societies had been declared illegal, not only by the Attorney-General, but by the Chief Justice of Ireland; whereas the Association was proved not to be illegal by new laws being declared necessary to put it down (hear, hear). The Orange Societies proscribed and oppressed whole classes, whilst the Association confined itself to holding forth the arm of the law in defence of those whom the Orange Societies were daily prosecuting (hear, hear). The comparison between the two societies was a comparison between light and shade. How could the house, with any show of reason, refuse to grant the prayer of these petitioners? "Your ministers," they say, "have grossly libelled our motives and conduct in the speech which they placed in the mouth of his Majesty; upon that false and scandalous libel they have now introduced a bill of pains and penalties against us; in the name of justice, before you gag us entirely, we claim to be heard against this bill, which we say is not founded in unintentional mistake, but in a deliberate falsehood" (hear, hear). How the liberal part of the cabinet could refuse a request of this nature, he could not see; he could only say that by doing so, they were virtually making war against the Catholics of Ireland (hear, hear), and were allowing their illiberal colleagues to drag them through the dirt in a manner which excited the compassion even of their bitterest enemies (hear, hear). The Orange faction had gained another triumph; and, headed by the rt. hon. Sec. (Peel), who was so infatuated by his prejudices as to become at once their representative and leader, had carried into full effect the various objects which the rt. hon. gent. had vainly attempted whilst he held office under the government of Ireland (cheers). The rt. hon. gent. had told them, in very confident language, that the Protestant feeling in Ireland was hostile to Catholic Emancipation; he denied it with equal confidence. The Orange Associations were opposed to it; but in spite of all the noise made by their representatives in that house, and all the eulogies which were bestowed upon them by some infatuated persons, they formed but the fag-end of the Protestant population of Ireland. He cautioned ministers as to what they were doing. Seven millions of Catholics were then at their bar; and if the house listened to their prayers, it might establish on a permanent foundation the security of the empire (hear, hear). He therefore conjured it to allow them to state their case. If they failed in establishing it, they would at least have the satisfaction of knowing that they had not been condemned unheard. At any rate, let them not be driven away with contempt or insult (hear, hear). Let the house remember the consequences which had befallen the country after the American commissioners had been turned with insolence from their bar. Let it not again have the humiliation of sending commissioners to supplicate those whom it had insulted. It had sent Lord Carlisle, Mr. Eden, and

Mr. Clinton, to conciliate America, when it was too late; let it not again have to undergo a similar degradation proceeding from similar misconduct. It was time for the representatives of Ireland to speak out. He would therefore bid the rt. hon. gent. beware how he drove insulted millions to madness (great cheering). The misfortunes of Ireland had hitherto arisen from her internal dissensions; there was, however, at the present moment, too much good sense in all classes of her people, no matter whether they were Catholics, Protestants, or Presbyterians, to permit those dissensions to continue any longer to her disadvantage. Let, therefore, the rt. hon. gent. beware lest his infatuated measures should lead the whole empire to ruin; for if the hour of battle should arrive, which he prayed God in his mercy to prevent, he might find arrayed against him not only the Catholic millions of Ireland, but the bulk of its Protestant population. He had addressed the house in the language of supplication (hear, hear); but as that language might not be listened to, he had also addressed it in the firm and candid language which a free man ought to speak (great cheering). He trusted that the time was not far distant, when it would do justice to his Catholic countrymen, and as the first step to that measure, he implored it to call the petitioners to the bar, and hear the justification which they offered (great cheering).

Mr. Peel begged leave to say that he had never applied any expression to the Catholics of Ireland, strenuously as he had always opposed their claims, which could justify the hon. member in insinuating that he had insulted them (hear, hear.)

Mr. C. Butler Clarke declared himself the friend of Catholic Emancipation, but hostile to the Association. Without mincing the matter, he believed the Association to be the only society aimed at by this bill, and he should, therefore, give it his support.

Sir John Sebright would give his support to this bill, because he felt that some measure was necessary to put down the Association. He felt, however, ashamed that the house should, at that time of day, be discussing the means of putting down an Association which could have no existence, had the Government followed a manly and decisive policy. But for their own prejudices, and the cruelty with which they had so long treated the Catholics, this Association could never have acquired its present power. Though he was inclined to support the bill, he was of opinion that the Catholics ought to be heard at the bar of the house (loud cries of hear!). Much as he disapproved of the Catholic Association, he could not say that the Catholics of Ireland had done any thing of which men insulted, degraded, and oppressed as they were, ought to be ashamed. They had been told that this country was ill-disposed to the cause of Emancipation. He did not believe that to be the case; but even if it were, there were questions on which it was incumbent on the house to consult not so much the prejudices as the interests of the country, and to consider not so much what it wished as what its safety imperiously required. He should vote for the learned gentleman's motion.

Mr. Scarlett, on a former night, when the right hon. Sec. (Peel) had called upon him to justify his consistency in having spoken against the Constitutional Association, and also against this bill, he had thought it unnecessary to point out the distinction between the two cases, as it was almost self-evident to any man who had paid the slightest attention to the first principles of the constitution. He had said that the Constitutional Association might be legal, but that he was of opinion that it was not consistent with the constitutional law of the country. It was not framed for prosecuting private injuries against individuals, but for prosecuting political offences; it usurped the functions of the Attorney-General, and was therefore in its very constitution a libel upon the Government. It could not be unknown to Parliament that one of the most important functions of Government was to know what offences it ought to select for punishment, and what it ought to abandon; and for any association to assume to themselves such a power was as unconstitutional in theory as it was insolent and arrogant in practice. He would allow that injuries which related to individuals might be safely prosecuted either by individuals or by the state; but with regard to such offences as libel and sedition, which did not affect the rights of individuals so much as the tranquillity of the state, it appeared to him that such offences ought not to be prosecuted by individuals, but by the state. He trusted that they would permit him to remark, that there were many members of the Constitutional Association of high rank and unblemished character, for whom he entertained the most sincere respect; but he had no doubt that those parties were the unsuspecting dupes of four or five designing persons, who took advantage of their public spirit to institute a series of prosecutions which were, in fact, good jobs for themselves. He only knew of two cases in which the Catholic Association had instituted prosecutions, and they were the case of murder, and the case of the soldier, which had been so often alluded to. Now what man would pretend to say that there was any similarity between these offences and those selected for punishment by the Constitutional Association (hear, hear)? It had, however, been stated, that from the nature of its constitution, all the prosecutions of the Catholic Association were political. He was not inclined to assent to that proposition; but he would say this, that if there were any class of men who thought themselves systematically oppressed by another class, it was not only natural but right that they should join to obtain justice for themselves and their associates. It might be that justice was properly administered in Ireland; but from all that he had heard upon the subject, he had come to a different conclusion. He could not blame men for uniting, under such circumstances, to obtain an impartial administration of the law. Those who had so united now claimed to be heard at their bar, in order that they might clear their characters from the charges which they said had unjustly been made against them. Should they be heard or should they not? The speech of his learned friend, who had brought forward their claim to be heard, was so urgent and impressive, that unless an answer were given to it, he should be for the affirmative of the question. If he were to take his notions of the Catholic Association from the speech of the right hon. Sec. he certainly might come to the rt. hon. Sec.'s conclusion; but why was he to take that statement to be correct, when the rt. hon. gent. not only did not offer any evidence to establish it, but opposed the admission of evidence to disprove it (hear, hear)? How did he know that the papers and pamphlets which the right hon. Sec. had quoted were the papers and pamphlets of this Association? He heard the members of it offering to disprove by witnesses the charges made against them—how did he know that they might not be prepared to show that part of the rt. hon. Sec.'s assertions regarding them were unfounded, and that the remainder admitted of such explanation as deprived them of the greater part of their offensive character (hear, hear)? It was said, however, that notoriety was a fit ground for legislating regarding this Association. This was to him a novel and extraordinary doctrine. He had heard it said that notoriety was a fit ground for inquiry; but he had never heard that it was a fit ground for the enactment of a new penal law. In all former cases, laws of this coercive nature had been preceded by statements on which the house could place some reliance; but in the present case no such statement had been made. It might, indeed, be made hereafter; but in the absence of all such information, he thought that the petitioners, who were men of high honour and untarnished character, had a right to demand a hearing, especially as they said that their views and objects had been grossly and scandalously libelled (hear, hear). He had not yet heard that the petitioners had sought to obtain any illegal aim; indeed, how could the object which they sought to obtain be illegal, after it had obtained more than once the approbation of majorities of that house? If their object were to obtain for themselves and their descendants the same rights and privileges that were enjoyed by their fellow-countrymen, it was not only right, but laudable (hear, hear). To refuse the means of showing that this was their object, and nothing else, was not merely a want of conciliation, but a denial of common justice. He should therefore vote for the motion of his learned friend (hear, hear).

The Attorney-General said, that he rose in consequence of a remark of his learned friend (Mr. Scarlett) concerning the charge against the Association of an improper interference with the administration of public justice. His learned friend had misapprehended the argument of the rt. hon. Sec. (Peel), for his rt. hon. friend had thrown overboard all disputed facts about this Association, and had rested his argument entirely upon documents which it had openly and repeatedly acknowledged. With regard to the Constitutional Association, he would merely remind the house, that his learned friend had contended that all prosecutions by associations of individuals were illegal. Probably his learned friend had since that time altered his opinion. For his own part he had always thought that the Constitutional Association, though perfectly legal, was still very impolitic. Let the house, however, compare the prosecutions of the Constitutional with those of the Catholic Association. The former, which consisted of many respectable persons, intrusted their funds to the care of one or two obscure individuals, so that parties who were accused by them congratulated themselves at being so prosecuted, because such was the odium into which their prosecutions had fallen, that the accused went into court with a prejudice in their favour (hear, hear). Now of whom did the Catholic Association consist? Of three parts out of four of the population of Ireland. Could any one doubt for a moment that such an Association represented the Catholic population of Ireland? They wielded the whole force of that great population. They were the guides and directors of the whole Catholic body (hear, hear, hear). Could any thing be more calculated to pervert the administration of justice than a society of that description, originating, advising, and reviewing criminal prosecutions? Facts of interference were admitted—the particulars of those facts he would not inquire into—the principle which flowed from them was enough; and that principle made it imperative to put down the Catholic Association for the sake of the pure administration of the criminal law (cheers). But then it was said, that the Constitutional Association only prosecuted on party questions. Why, what were the prosecutions of the Catholic Association but party questions, and conducted with all the acrimony of party feelings? It was on these grounds, sufficient with him, independently of many other objections, that he should oppose the motion (hear, hear).

Mr. Brougham said, he never rose to reply with greater anxiety than at that moment. The rt. hon. Sec. (Peel) had, most undoubtedly, stated his objections in a very able and powerful speech—a speech calculated to make a considerable impression. But, impressive as it was, he trusted he would be able to show that it should not drive him one inch from the ground he had taken. He should first re-affirm all that he had laid down in his original speech. With respect to the hawkers and pedlars being heard by counsel, notwithstanding the denial of the rt. hon. gent. he was supported by the journals of the house; for having just perused them, he found that the entry specified the facts. He was equally borne out in the other precedents. On the Massachusetts Bill, a bill which, for state and imperial purposes, went to interdict the whole trade and intercourse of New England with Great Britain and her other colonies, the parties aggrieved were heard by their counsel and agents. Not only the parties aggrieved were heard, but the traders of London and Poole; and not only those parties, for their own interests, but the society of Quakers also, who appealed to the justice of Parliament in favour of their fellow-subjects of America, upon the principles of an enlarged humanity. He thanked his hon. friend (Mr. S. Rice) for another precedent, which he had overlooked, of the Irish Parliament; but which, since the Union, was binding upon the Imperial Legislature. In that Parliament, on a bill for the security of the Protestant succession, Sir T. Butler and Sir Stephen Rice were heard for themselves and others, against the provisions of the bill, which declared that no man could hold any office who did not take certain oaths, and subscribe to certain declarations, to which they, as Catholics, could not conform. In that statute the Catholics were not mentioned, just as the Catholic Association was not mentioned in the present bill—and yet the Legislature did not refuse to hear the parties aggrieved (hear, hear). The rt. hon. gent. had charged him with inconsistency in supporting the right of those petitioners, since, in a case respecting negroes, he opposed the interference of Counsel. What was the fact? In that case Master Stephen came forward from his own humane suggestions—not connected with the parties—not employed by their masters, nor himself directly interested, but desirous to be heard at their bar as the prochein ami, the next friend of the negroes; and in that droll capacity he accordingly applied, but was not allowed to be heard (laughter). But what similitude had such a case with the present? The aggrieved parties were now at their bar (hear, hear, hear). The negroes from Ireland were now waiting their decision. They declared themselves calumniated and slandered, and in the name of common justice, they demanded to be allowed the opportunity of refutation. As to the supposed inconsistency arising from the opinions he had expressed on the Bridge-Street Gang, he differed à toto calo from the arguments of the other side. The inconsistency might have been supported had he taken any measures to put down that association by a penal statute (hear, hear). Did he ever propose any restraining bill to extinguish it (hear, hear)? No: much as he censured their motives and objects, he still thought that by the mere enforcement of constitutional law a termination could be put to the efforts of that jobbing, mercenary, and meddling gang (hear, hear, hear). He came now to the main argument; and here he must say, that the rt. hon. gent. did not keep his word by uniting himself to the immediate question in debate. But it was perhaps to be accounted for by the example given by his Majesty's Solicitor-General, who had that evening favoured them with a speech, which was evidently intended for the four nights' discussion (a laugh). But to this conclusion did the rt. hon. Sec. come. "I care not," said he, "for your cloud of witnesses, I will listen to no refutation, I want no further proofs, neither shall this house receive any documents." And yet there was strong reason to believe that Parliament were very near having certain documents. It had been declared by a Minister of the Crown, that the present bill was not an English but an Irish measure. Of this he was certain, that if the measure came to the English Government, recommended by Lord Wellesley, if it had the sanction of the Attorney-General for Ireland, whose honest sincerity in the Catholic cause he never could doubt, until his conduct should compel him to doubt it—if there existed in the office of the British Government a document from the Irish Government recommending this measure, it was not the only document respecting it which was in their possession. He had no doubt, that if circumstances had induced the Noble Marquis to advise the proceeding now in progress, by the same courier who brought that advice, was also brought an urgent representation of the necessity of accompanying the measure with one of conciliation. If so, they had much to answer for who had stated the severer, uncoupled with the mitigating portion of the recommendation. They had much to answer for to the country, to the house, and most of all to the noble Marquis, and the Attorney-General for Ireland, in making them appear, contrary to their well known and recorded principles, to recommend measures of harshness, unaccompanied by any qualification, by any antidote—unaccompanied, in short, by Catholic Emancipation (hear, hear). The bill before the house pronounced the condemnation of the Association. But before it was thus doomed, it had a right to be heard in its defence. The Association was charged with leading men to trial under all the disadvantage of a previous investigation, and all the odium of a declaration on the part of the Association of their guilt; as if such things had never been heard of before! The rt. hon. gent. had said, that possibly subscribers to the rent might be on the jury; and, he observed, that in this country those who paid for the prosecution could not be witnesses; appealing to him and his learned friends for the accuracy of his opinion. As regarded himself, the appeal was unfortunate; for in answer he must say, that the expenses of a criminal prosecution in this country were generally paid by the prosecutor, and yet he was a competent witness on the trial. However, let that pass. But they were told that the Association had conducted their proceedings in a manner inconsistent with justice, by their previous investigation and declaration of the guilt of the individuals against whom they instituted prosecutions. A similar practice took place in the most ordinary proceedings of the Criminal Courts in this country, even in the Court of King's Bench; for there, when a criminal information was applied for, under a statute passed in the best times for the liberty of the subject, in the early part of the reign of William III., what followed? A speech enforcing the guilt of the accused was made by the Counsel; and though the rule might be refused, that speech was repeated and published in the newspapers, and the injured person thus libelled without the possibility of remedy. But if the rule should not be refused, and the trial take place, what happened? The party having been heard against the rule, and an incriminatory speech having been made in the shape of a reply, the four judges deliberately gave their opinions one after the other, which opinions were also published. So that the accused went to the petty jury with all this previously published accusatory matter, hanging like a millstone round his neck. But with all these disadvantages, had he no chance of escape? A very great one. He had never yet seen a case in which a person had been tried on a criminal information, on a rule obtained in the Court of King's Bench, in which there had not been a favourable disposition towards him in the court. It was the same thing when that house caused any criminal proceeding to be instituted. The party, in that case, went to trial with all the impression that could be created by a previous vote of the house, declaring him guilty of the charge preferred against him, and instructing the Attorney-General to prosecute him accordingly. The speeches made in the house in aggravation of his guilt, were published in all the newspapers. But did that produce any injurious effect on the accused? The instances were rare in which they had been convicted. Ought not the same thing to take place with respect to those persons who were prosecuted by the Catholic Association? They would send a man to trial with the same advantage of a disposition on the part of the court in his favour. Nay, he would have a greater advantage; for he would probably be tried by a Protestant jury. And what had been the actual facts? That the Association had twice tried to convict individuals, and in cases where those individuals appeared to have been justly prosecuted, and in neither case had they been able to induce the court and the jury to concur with them in opinion. Thus, the issue of these trials was in the very teeth of the declaration, that the proceedings of the Association were injurious to the cause of justice. But a graver charge against the Association remained behind, to which he entreated attention, because it related to an absent and most meritorious individual. If he did not presently convince the house that the accusation made by the rt. hon. gent. was utterly groundless, as it regarded the Association, and from this very circumstance derive a new and triumphant argument in favour of inquiry before the measure was passed, he would be ready to abandon at once the cause of the Association. "We have," said the rt. hon. gent. "the sentiments of the Association under their own hands. No man will deny what they have said or written. Why call a cloud of witnesses to prove that which is self-acknowledged?" Now, the charge against the Association—for it was only with the charge as it affected the Association that he had any thing to do—was, that they spoke of Mr. Hamilton Rowan as a man entitled to the utmost respect and love from his country; "and yet," said the rt. hon. gent.—if amidst some of the most extravagant cheers ever heard in the House of Commons, he had heard him rightly—"and yet Mr. Hamilton Rowan is neither more nor less than an attainted traitor!" The charge then against the Association was, that they had treated with respect an attainted traitor. Now, in the first place, the Association stated, as a fact, that Mr. Hamilton Rowan's name was most highly respected and most dearly loved in Ireland. For the truth of this assertion, they were therefore certainly responsible. But the Association not only stated that to be the general feeling in Ireland, but declared that they themselves joined in the general feeling of respect and veneration; and this was the second and the gravest charge against them. Now, in the first place, he asserted, and offered to prove his assertion by witnesses, that the Association were borne out by the fact, when they asserted that no man in Ireland was more respected or beloved than Mr. Hamilton Rowan (a loud No! from some member). He had offered to prove it: he was therefore obliged to the hon. gent. for his No! for the hon. gent. must give him his vote. He said aye! On that ground they joined issue and went to trial, and he was ready to call his witnesses. But he went still further. He would show, if the Association had not only asserted that Mr. Hamilton Rowan was treated with respect and affection by all Ireland, but had treated him with respect and affection themselves, by whom they had been instructed. Their teachers were his Majesty's Government, and the successive Lords Lieutenant in Ireland (hear, hear, hear). Mr. Hamilton Rowan was a man of large and even princely fortune, of the purest and most amiable private character, endeared to all his friends by his domestic virtues, and attached to his country by the most ardent patriotism. He was one of those men, who, in the agitated times of 1793, 1797, and 1798, when the wisest were often misled, and when the honestest, from the excess of patriotic feeling, were roused to frenzy by the injuries which they conceived their country was enduring, underwent every species of vituperation, and in that wretched period, were swept away in one general act of attainer, although many of them could never have been brought to trial with any hope or conviction. "Fuerint cupidi,"—for the character was applicable not only to Mr. Hamilton Rowan, but to the Fitzgeralds and others, who went too far in those times; and God forbid that he should deny that they went too far; although God also forbid that he should charge them with crimes of which they were guiltless:—"Fuerint cupidi, fuerint trulli, fuerint pertinaces, sceleris vero criminis, furoris, parricidii, liceat, Cn. Pompeio mortuo, liceat multis aliis carere." Such were not his sentiments alone, with respect to many of those unfortunate individuals. Pardon by his prince, Mr. Hamilton Rowan returned to the bosom of his family. Again he became the dispenser of blessings to his attached tenantry. By the manner in which he expended his liberal income, and by the whole tenor of his conduct, he became the darling of his neighbourhood; he served on the grand juries, and he acted as a magistrate! And under whose superintending eye did he so act? Under that of my Lord Manners—of Lord Manners, who so readily purged the Commission of the Peace wherever he saw any one whom he knew to be a friend to Catholic Emancipation going, as he conceived, too far in the support of his opinion. Lord Manners—that pink of loyalty, that upholder of the church establishment under that tutelary saint, the late Chief Secretary, left Mr. Hamilton Rowan, the attainted traitor, in the magistracy, to teach treason by his example, aided by his authority (hear, hear, hear)! Nor was that all; Mr. Hamilton Rowan attended the Courts at the Castle, and was received with uniform favour, courtesy, and kindness, by one Viceroy after another—men of every shade of opinion; not only by Lord Wellesley, but by Lord Whitworth (hear, hear). And this was the man by whom the Association were to be attacked, vituperated, and denounced, unheard, and without the means of defence, for declaring to be entitled to, and enjoying the respect and attention of his countrymen. He had declared, that if he could not compel that charge against the Association—if he could not convince the house from that unexpected quarter—if he could not commend the chalice to the rt. hon. gent.'s own lips, which he had prepared for his opponents—if he could not elicit new arguments from his assertion on this part of the subject, to show the necessity for inquiry, to prove the incalculable dangers which they were incurring in their course of hasty legislation, he would at once abandon the cause. But, did he now feel himself called upon to redeem that pledge by abandoning that cause? On the contrary, he felt that the cause stood on ground a thousand times higher than that on which it stood when those tumultuous cheers followed the rt. hon. gent.'s statements. And now, he asked every honest, every reflecting, every conscientious man, if he could have believed, before this explanation, that in the crime of which the Association were accused by the rt. hon. gent. they were, in fact, only the accomplices of Lord Manners, and of the successive Lords-Lieutenant and Attorneys-General of Ireland (hear, hear, hear). He begged the house to look at the consequences of what they were about to do. They had now an opportunity in their power, which, if they let slip, they might never be able to grasp again. If the measure in progress should pass, if it should receive the Royal assent—that of the Lords, he supposed, was considered as a matter of course—if it should be found to accord with the unanimous voice of the country, even under all those circumstances, in order to render it a safe measure, they must have the assent and the co-operation of the Association itself. If, therefore, they passed the measure, at any rate, let them make it a safe, a wholesome measure—a measure which might give permanent peace to Ireland. To make it acceptable, not merely to the hundreds of thousands for whose particular interest they conceived that they were passing the measure, but to the millions who inhabited the country in which it was to operate, they must accompany it with conciliation. They had at that moment, within the walls of the house*, the chosen delegates of the Association. In those gentlemen the Association had unanimously reposed their confidence. The Association itself possessed the confidence of the whole Catholic body in Ireland. They had, therefore, virtually before them, all the Catholics of Ireland, anxiously awaiting their decision—their commands. Let their witnesses be brought to the bar. If they failed in proving their case, in God's name let the measure pass; they would then pass a constitutional, a just, an effective measure, which might succeed in giving peace to Ireland. Of this, however, he was sure, that they could not bear the details which they were prepared to lay before them, without entertaining a higher sense of their conduct and merits. On their parts they would be duly sensible of the indulgence of the house. By the mutual intercourse which would thus take place, whether they passed, or whether they rejected the bill, would become a matter of comparatively less moment; they would give contentment, and, for the first time, lay the foundation of peace in Ireland. They were ready to produce every document—every letter—every scrap that had crossed the threshold of the Association. Their books were ready. The names of their subscribers they had entered in a book, as it was indispensable they should do; for they would have been charged with dishonesty by their opponents had they not done so: but a book of prohibition, a book of exclusion, a black book as it has been called, there was none. They were prepared to prove the efforts which had been made by the Association to tranquillize Ireland. They were ready to prove, that when disturbances existed in the Upper and Lower Ormond, when the Ribbonmen made an alarming progress in those districts, Mr. O'Connell and others repaired thither to check them: and that in the name of the Association, and with the Address of the Association in their hand, they did check the spirit of ribbonism, and restore tranquillity. He selected these from many other details which the delegates were ready to give. Let the house examine them, and they would find that there was no point on which they were not solicitous to afford every possible explanation. If, in the teeth of all these advantages; if in utter neglect and contempt of the signs of the times, they persisted in the course, not of passing the bill, but of refusing to enter into any inquiry with respect to the facts on which its authors professed to found it—if, notwithstanding the most astounding instance of a misrepresentation of the truth, which he had just exposed in the case of Mr. Hamilton Rowan, they still persisted, he disclaimed all share of the responsibility. On their heads be it (loud cheers)!

The house divided.—For the motion, 89—Against it, 223—Majority, 133.

Monday, Feb. 21.—Mr. Goulburn presented a petition from 2000 freemen in the city and neighbourhood of Dublin, against the Catholic Association, and praying that no further concessions should be made to the Catholic body.

Mr. Brougham presented a petition from three individuals, R. and J. Alcock, and John Henderson, freemen of Dublin, against the bill. The petition was a proof of the utility of the Association. The petitioners were entitled to the succession of the privileges held by their fathers as freemen of the city. Their title to that freedom was as clear as it could be to any free-man held by their fathers. The Corporation of Dublin would not admit them, because they were Catholics; and they could not obtain this, the merest matter of ordinary right, without a mandamus from the Court of King's Bench. The petitioners were poor, and could not have struggled with the corporation if they had not been assisted by the advice and funds of the Association.

Sir J. Newport said, that this was an aggression of daily occurrence in Ireland. He knew of cases, where admission-fee to corporations were lowered a third or a half to Protestants, whilst they were exacted to the last farthing from Catholics (hear, hear).

Lord Nugent presented a petition from the great body of the British Roman Catholics, among whom were the Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Shrewsbury, Lord Stourton, Lord Arundel, two Catholic Baronets, and the greater part of the Catholic Bishops.

The second reading of the Unlawful Societies Bill having been moved,

Lord Nugent said, he found a sufficient ground for opposing the measure in every stage of its proceeding, in this remarkable circumstance—that hardly two of his Majesty's ministers had yet been found to agree as to the state of the country to which it referred, the motives for proposing it, or the results which might be anticipated from it. If the Sec., and Attorney-General for Ireland, were right as to the extensive influence exercised by the Association over the Catholics, then the Sec. for Foreign Affairs must be wrong in the opinion which he expressed on the subject. If, on the contrary, that rt. hon. gent. were right in supposing that the Association did not represent the feelings and wishes of the country, then the two rt. hon. gent.'s first mentioned must be wrong; and yet, if they deferred to the opinion of their colleague, they must abandon their prime argument in support of the bill. One objected to the Association because it did not represent the feelings and wishes of the Catholics, and the others, because it did. Either might be right, but it was impossible that both could be so. The Sec. for the Home Department objected to the Association because it kept Ireland in a state of disturbance, and the member for Louth (Mr. Foster,) disliked it, because it had placed Ireland in that state which he considered most dangerous of all—a state of perfect repose. When the supporters of the measure differed thus as to the grounds on which they considered it necessary, what result could they anticipate from it in common? He would also oppose the bill, because not only had, no case been made out in support of it, but an offer to prove a case against it, by evidence at the bar, had been rejected. He objected to it, because, even if a case had been made out for it, it was extremely bad, inasmuch as it was incapable of producing any other effect than irritation in the minds of those against whom it was directed. He objected to it, because if it were not meant to shew that the liberal part of the Cabinet had deserted the Catholic question, it seemed at least a peace-offering to their anti-Catholic associates. The house was called upon to pass the bill, in the hope that those against whom it was directed would feel so much deference to the will of Parliament, that they would not attempt to evade it. Thus Parliament passed an act against a body of men, and then recommended them not to transgress it. This put him in mind of a story which was told of the late King of France. An emigrant noble, who had accompanied the King to this country, committed some supposed offence against his Majesty, for which he was cited to appear at a lit de justice, at the house of the sovereign. He did not appear, and was, therefore, condemned par contumace, and sentenced to consider himself a close prisoner in the Conciergerie at Paris (a laugh). He walked about London for several years, always considering himself, and considered by all loyal Frenchmen, as a close prisoner at Paris, until he was released from his confinement by death. He would never consent to the bill till Parliament was informed of the conditions which Lord Wellesley had coupled with his recommendation of the measure. He could not believe that that distinguished individual could, at this time of day, be weak enough to change his opinions, or base enough to sacrifice them. Then what was to be thought of one half of the recommendation being promulgated whilst the other was concealed, for the purpose of giving one side of the Cabinet a triumph over the other? He concluded by stating that there had been very little community of feeling between the English Catholics and the Association, until this attack upon that body; but now every Catholic in England, from the Earl-Marshal, the Howards, the Talbots, and the Arundels, down to the meanest peasant, was pledged to that body. The right of free discussion was the only plank which was left to the despairing Catholics, and to that they would cling to the last moment (hear, hear).

Sir E. Knatchbull supported the bill. He had always, from conscientious motives, opposed the Catholic question, and would always continue to oppose it. He felt it due to his constituents to say thus much (hear, hear).

Mr. M. Fitzgerald said he would endeavour to suggest some practical considerations which bore upon the question, and were, he thought, worthy of the attention of ministers. In their proceedings against the Association, it appeared to him that ministers had taken the effect for the cause. The Association was not the cause of the present danger, but the state of things which threw the population into the hands of such a body; and that was the effect of the postponement of that justice which the people of Ireland had been looking to Parliament for during twenty-five years (cheers); and if he were called on to name the cause of that state of things, he would say that it was solely the doing of Mr. Pitt's administration (loud cheers). That minister told the people of Ireland, that by consenting to a Union with England, the doors of Parliament would be thrown open to an impartial discussion of their claims. The hopes of the Catholics were raised to the highest pitch, and they looked forward in confidence to the justice of the united Parliament. They were disappointed; and from that period he dated the commencement of the unhappy state of things which at present prevailed in Ireland. There was nothing in the measure before the house to allay the danger. That was not in the Association, but in the union of the Catholic people to recover their rights (cheers). The bill would not remove that danger, thought it might drive it to other modes of expression (hear, hear). Ireland, we are told, is tranquil and prosperous: but prosperity there was not a source of security. On that very circumstance an enemy would ground his expectation of a successful invasion. He would ask the house to consider the history of Ireland since the Union. At the period of the Union, the Catholic nobility and hierarchy reposed boundless confidence in the Government, and the mass of the people followed the example which they set them of zeal in support of the laws. That was a period when the ministry might have carried the Catholic question without a murmur—the only measure that could have healed the wound which had been made by the treacherous measure of the union. If since that period the Catholic body had undergone a change, if, instead of the general subordination of ranks, which then prevailed, they had been drawn into a vortex, and thrown into the hands of men who would not at any other time have directed them, it was to be attributed to their disappointed hopes (hear, hear). Insulted, degraded, and rendered desperate, it was not surprising that they should entrust their cause to men who, not despairing of their country, had asserted the dominion of talent, perseverance, and patriotism (cheers). The present measure, as regarded even the views of its promoters, was a most extraordinary one. "We don't imagine that we can make you obey us," said the advocates of the measure, "but we rely on your characters, on your state in society, on your known love of your country, as pledges that you will do so." Why, if the Catholics were distinguished by such qualities, what need of any thing—how unjust and impolitic to propose any thing, except conciliation (hear, hear)! He was convinced that if even an honest assurance of dealing fairly with their claims were held out, the elements of the Association would be dissolved into their separate forms, and no power on earth could re-unite them. The Catholics, of whom there were many in every situation of respectability, were deeply interested in the tranquillity of Ireland; they would soon begin to look to practical results, and if any such promise were held out, they would rest quiet in their private occupations, like the Protestants. Some gentlemen talked of apprehending ulterior views; and the hon. Sec. (Canning), had been thanked for his assurance that, in every measure contemplated on behalf of the Catholics, the safety of the Church of England would be amply provided for. He candidly appealed to the house, whether any thing could be more unfair than to raise up such a consideration, at this time, with the Catholic question (loud cheers)? Why, the security of the Established Church lay in granting the Catholic claims—its fullest, and almost its only security. He believed, that if the tithes of Ireland were offered to the Catholic clergy to-morrow, they would have too much good policy to accept them. There were other circumstances than had yet been adverted to, which should induce the house to consider well at what time, as well as in what manner they were acting. His anxiety was increased by what was going on upon the continent. He looked with great jealousy at the increasing religious zeal in foreign Catholic countries. He thought he saw, in the zeal of the present Pope, an intention, which all despotic governments would be forward enough to assist, to revive, as far as possible, in the present day, that commanding influence which the Catholic church formerly exercised over society. That there existed a disposition, and a strong one, in the Court of France to do this, was undoubted; it would not be difficult to give that disposition an influence in Ireland. If the Catholic faith were to be denounced in England; if the Catholics of Ireland were to be shut out for ever; if they could only be admitted to their rights by ceasing to be Catholics, was there nothing to be apprehended from the inflammatory paragraphs with which the papers of the continent were filled, characterising England peculiarly as the country of intolerance, and telling her to look at Ireland, when she talked of having given liberty to the world? The ultra newspapers of France spoke out—"England dares not go to war, for Ireland is a magazine of gunpowder, which would explode with a single spark." Was it supposed that these newspapers did not reach, or were not understood by the Irish Catholics? After all that this country had done to re-establish the throne of the Bourbons, he doubted whether that family would not be more ready to tamper with the population of Ireland than the government which we had overthrown (loud cheers). He believed that Napoleon would never have stirred up a religious war; but he was far from entertaining the same opinion with respect to the reigning family. In fact, there stood the inflammatory declarations he alluded to—the French papers were full of them. It was by no means unlikely that an attempt might be made to organize another Irish brigade in France; for the house of Bourbon would not have forgotten the courage and fidelity of the old one. The remedy against all this was clear—the people of Ireland said to this country—"We value the franchise of your constitution beyond every other advantage. All we ask is to be included in it—to enjoy that which, under it, you all enjoy yourselves." If they thought otherwise than this, they needed not be long in getting rid of all necessity for urging their claims; therefore let them be immediately conceded (cheers). If the measure before the house were carried, what practical advantage would be gained? The existing society might be put down; but what was gained if a variety of smaller ones immediately arose, having the same end and object in view, and extending themselves through every county or parish in the country? There was much complaint as to the intemperate language used; but the bill would not prevent a set of Irish gentlemen from meeting at dinner; or did the house think that their speeches would be more temperate after dinner than before it (a laugh)? In conclusion, he contended, that it was absurd to suppose the Catholics would ever cease to prosecute their claims—knowing, as they did, that those claims were viewed as rights by many of the very highest authorities in the British empire; and he believed that the bill would be worse than useless, unless accompanied by some measure of relief.

Colr. Treach began by enumerating the several points in which Ireland had lately been assisted by the efforts of the English Government; and contended that, although the effect of those exertions had been great, as regarded the prosperity of Ireland, it would have been still greater but for the counteracting influence of such bodies as the Catholic Association. The main evil which affected the population of Ireland lay out of the reach of the Legislature; all, however, had been done, that could be done, in spite of those whose interest lay in the continuance of disension and discontent. The whole office of the sheriffs of counties had been re-organized; the state of the law courts had been improved; abuses had been reformed in the customs and excise; and the assessed taxes entirely taken off, in order to encourage the residence of those smaller country gentlemen, who might have been driven abroad by debt, or otherwise, and whose presence in Ireland was so important. He proceeded to point out the causes of that distress which still existed in Ireland, and declared most of them could only be removed by the exertions of the landed gentlemen in educating and improving the condition of the lower classes.

Mr. Sykes expressed his conviction that a great change had taken place in public opinion, with regard to Catholic concession. In the very populous town of Hull, which he represented, illiberality on the score of religion had in a great degree declined. He remembered a time when the supporters of the Catholic question were not only unpopular in that town, but were in some personal danger; but now, he professed himself a decided advocate for the Catholic claims; and he was certain that at the next election he should not find one enemy on that ground (cheers). The eyes of the people were opened; they were becoming every day more enlightened, and saw the absurdity and injustice of depriving any man of his civil privileges on account of his religious opinions (hear, hear). Whatever might be the immediate effect of the present bill, he was satisfied it would in the result do more harm than good. With respect to the Association, he would observe that it must be considered as growing out of the state of the public mind in Ireland, on the subject of the Catholic question. As to the mode in which they should be treated, he would suggest—

“Be to their faults a little blind.”—

But coercion, such as this bill proposed, would be wholly ineffectual (hear, hear).

Mr. Grasfell observed that he had said, after hearing the statement of the rt. hon. gent. (Mr. Goulburn), that if this Association interfered with the administration of justice, it ought not to be suffered to exist, and that he would give his vote for putting it down; but he did not pledge himself to give his support to the particular means by which that object was to be effected; and now, after having read the bill, he should oppose its second reading (hear, hear): and he should repeat, what he had before stated, that it was impossible to expect that six millions of Catholics could submit to one million of Protestants—that to compel them to do so was injustice—that to perpetuate that injustice was oppression—that if, thus injured and oppressed, the Catholics resisted, he prayed to Almighty God that their resistance might be successful (cheers).

Mr. Phillips denied that the existence of the Association had prevented Englishmen from embarking their capital in Ireland, as was stated by the rt. hon. gent. (Mr. Goulburn). He knew that the manufacturers in Lancashire were not at all afraid to send over their cotton-twist into that country, and he was glad to say that that trade was extending every day. He believed that as long as tranquillity continued in Ireland, whether produced by the measures of Government, or the influence of the Catholic Association, that Englishmen would not object to send their capital thither; but though the country was now tranquil, he was convinced that its tranquillity would not be permanent unless it rested upon an amicable settlement of the Catholic question. He was almost ashamed of the name of Englishman, when he reflected on the degradation to which England was exposed in Europe, even in the eyes of the Holy Alliance, by her illiberality on this ground of religious difference (hear, hear).

The cries of “Question” now became very loud and general, and the house divided.

For the second reading, 253—against it, 107—Majority, 146.

THURSDAY, FEB. 22.—On the question that the Unlawful Societies bill be committed,

Mr. Hume said, that before the Speaker left the chair, he would submit a resolution by way of instruction to the committee. One of the evils by which Ireland was afflicted was the practice of introducing bills on every occasion, to patch parts of a bad system, instead of adopting a general measure which would go at once to the root of the evils. The present was one of those patching bills. No one had attempted to say that it would remedy the present system in Ireland. It was stated, amongst other things, that this Association had caused great alarm in Ireland. But to whom? If at all, to the small faction who had so long the ascendancy in that country, and the undisturbed monopoly of place and power. As a specimen of that monopoly, he would observe that the number of Protestants holding places in the Customs were 226—while the Catholics were 14 (hear, hear)! In the Excise, the Protestants were 365, while the Catholics were only six (hear, hear, hear)! He confessed that, if he were a Catholic, it would be a mere matter of calculation with him whether he should assert his rights as a man and a patriot, or run the risk of being hanged as a rebel and a traitor (hear and laughter). By denying to the Catholics of Ireland their just claims, not from any fear of their religious sentiments, but from a fear lest they should obtain a portion of those offices of trust and emolument which were at present monopolized by the dominant faction in that country, we incurred the risk of losing that island altogether. Why should Parliament continue such a system, when by getting rid of it, it would not only attach a gallant nation to its side, but would also rid England of an annual expense of 4,00,000l. now incurred to keep it in subjection? He then proceeded to point out the difference between the Orange and the Catholic Associations, and to contend that if the Government had wished to act fairly between them, it would have dismissed from its service all its employés who were members of Orange lodges. As to the Catholic Association, considering the insulting manner in which the former petitions of the Catholics had been dismissed, he thought that they had adopted a quiet and constitutional mode of obtaining a redress of grievances. So far from objecting to it, he considered it a laudable association, in perfect consistence with the principles and spirit of the constitution. Believing, therefore, that this association had been most unjustly vilified, and seeing that the bill, which was intended to put it down, was shamefully partial in its operation, he intended to submit a clause to the house, "That any person now holding, or who might hereafter hold, office under the crown in Ireland, should take an oath that he does not now belong, and that he will not hereafter belong, to any association declared to be illegal by this act." He could not see upon what grounds such a motion could be resisted, and he was sure that there was one very powerful reason by which it was recommended. That reason was, that nothing could better allay the irritation such a measure would occasion than the knowledge that it would put down other associations which had hitherto triumphed over the law and eluded all its regulations.

Mr. Goulburn resisted the motion, not only because it was not calculated to effect its object, but also because it was objectionable in principle, as calling upon every officer to take an oath, not merely that he was not guilty of a particular offence, but also that he would not at any future time be guilty of it. If this were a fit principle to proceed upon, why did the hon. member call for such a declaration with regard to a minor offence, punishable only by fine and imprisonment, and neglect it with regard to greater offences, for which severer penalties were inflicted? Was it just, he would ask, to call upon an individual to take an oath, when, by refusing to take it, he gave indirect evidence that he was a member of an illegal society? He knew of no case in which such a test had ever been required from public officers, and he did not see any reason why it should be demanded from them in the present case (hear, hear). If any Orangemen were at present in the employment of the Irish Government, it was because the constitution of the Orange lodges had been so completely altered as not to transgress the existing laws. Should any servant of the Government be discovered to be a member of an illegal Orange lodge, he would not only be dismissed from his situation, but would be immediately handed over to the law to suffer the punishment which it affixed to that offence. For these reasons he should oppose the motion.

Mr. G. Lamb observed, that no man was bound to take office against his will; and argued that as every man had to take some test oaths before he entered upon office, he saw no reason why the test recommended by his hon. friend should not be added to those already in existence. If they wished to give a triumph to neither of the two parties into which Ireland was divided, and to hold the balance impartially between them, they would not send this obnoxious bill to Ireland, without adding to it the clause recommended by his hon. friend.

Mr. C. H. Hutchinson said, that in the hope of either shaming or terrifying ministers out of this bill (hear, hear), he should again express his execration of this abominable measure, which was founded in injustice, and was in direct opposition both to the principles and practice of the constitution (hear, hear). It was calculated to rouse every honest thinking man in Ireland to acts, if not of outrage, at least of active exertion to put down the men, who in a time of general peace and prosperity, as they had themselves declared it to be, had brought in a bill which was more calculated than any which he had ever yet seen, to spread rebellion and war through that unfortunate country (hear, hear). He was not surprised to observe that the Sec. for Foreign Affairs was absent to-night. He was absent, doubtless, because he well knew that a learned friend of his would put him to shame on the question, as he had often done before (a laugh), by once more refuting all the arguments of him and his adherents. They depended for those arguments on the hon. member for Kent (a laugh), but those arguments he must contend, without meaning any disrespect to the hon. bart. (Sir E. Knatchbull) were altogether unsatisfactory. Majorities of that house might carry this odious bill; but they had all, unfortunately, heard of majorities in other countries, in Ireland, and in other kingdoms of Europe, where they had been packed and corrupted for the most mischievous of purposes. They had been, in this country, the means of imposing taxes upon the people to the amount of millions, and had thus enlarged the public debt to an extent irredeemable during the largest period allotted to human existence. At one period, and that a recent one, of her history, they had brought England herself to the brink of ruin. Similar majorities had goaded Ireland to rebellion; and to a similar catastrophe ministers seemed to be trying to drive her again. He had had woful experience of the effects of those majorities, by which Government was sometimes content to carry through the most fatal and obnoxious bills (hear, hear). It was, therefore, as an Irish gentleman informed by a long residence in the country of what it had endured, and might yet endure, from similar measures, that he stood there to warn the house that the same system had before driven Ireland to madness and to revolt. If, however, they were the last words he should ever utter, he desired to declare that the rebellion in Ireland of 1798 was justified by the circumstances under which it arose (hear, hear); he desired to protest that every body who on that occasion had suffered as a rebel was a martyr, and that every man at that time in power, who had lent his countenance or aid to their destruction, was a traitor to his country (hear, hear). He had himself resisted the armed rebels; but he did not the less oppose and deprecate the persecuting spirit of the Government of that day. He might refer to the gallant member for Southwark (Sir R. Wilson) to corroborate his assertion, that the "rebels" were not the worst subjects of that day; they were the worst subjects whose oppressive measures had driven them to become rebels. Here he entered into a brief narrative of the circumstances which followed the descent of the French in Ireland, and alluded to the surrender of the second in command of that armament to himself. The French General who was thus captured was a very clever man (a laugh); and in the course of conversation, asked him how it happened that the French had not been received with open arms by the Irish? "Because," he had replied, "though theirs was a dreadful Government, yet the people did not expect any relief from the bayonets of the French." He proceeded to contend, that at the moment when Ireland was beginning to regain her prosperity—when her improvement was announced from the Throne, that a bill was brought in to put down this Association, which not only had not done any harm, but which had effected a great deal of good; and this, too, to please not even the majority of the Protestant population, nor even of the Orangemen; but the mere rump of the Orange faction. This system might, possibly, be pursued a little further; but the day of retribution must come at last. In all the Catholic part of Ireland this measure had excited the most extraordinary and intense sensation; so great was the confidence and affection of the Catholics towards the Association. These sentiments were fully justified by the talents of his learned friend Mr. O'Connell, and other members of the deputation. He had now to beg pardon of the house, for having said so much on this subject; but of his country, for not having said much more (a laugh) in resisting a measure, to oppose which he would sacrifice his life (hear, hear).

Mr. Plunkett said, that as to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Aberdeen, he had a word or two to offer. He as much approved as that hon. member could do, of the broad principle that no person, being a member of any illegal society, should be admitted into office; but the hon. member must permit him to say, that the effect of his proposed instruction was quite irreconcilable to law or common sense. What was it that he proposed? First, that a person should swear that he was not guilty; and secondly, that he would not thereafter become guilty of belonging to any society that should be an illegal one. Until that night, he had never heard that it entered into the range of human legislation to compel a person to swear to a point of law. And yet this would be the effect of the oath he proposed. The bill that was about to go into a committee very properly provided, that though the acts of only a portion of its members might render a society illegal, and therefore subject those members to its penal consequences, yet they who should be members in ignorance of its illegal character, and not participating in its illegal acts, should be exempted from the penalties of the bill. But by the hon. member's amendment, the party would be compelled to swear whether the society were legal or not, in order to determine his eligibility or ineligibility to office. He would thus be required to swear to a point of law, of which he could scarcely be supposed to be cognizant, that point of law going to a point of fact, of which, also, he could not be cognizant. The learned gent. concluded by stating that he was disposed much rather to rely on the honour and justice of Government, that no one connected with it would venture to appoint any body to an office who should be a member of a society declared to be illegal.

Mr. Donnan had one objection undoubtedly to that proposition; it imposed a test (hear)—a feature that certainly would not recommend it to his favour. But if it were really meant to persevere in the obnoxious measure upon which they were required to go into committee, he thought he could get over this objection, and vote for the amendment. That bill ought to be framed so as to apply to Orangemen as well as others—one sect or class as well as another. The learned gent. opposite argued that its enactment would not affect a person acting in ignorance; and had asked how his hon. friend could propose to make a man swear to a point of law and a point of fact that could not be within his knowledge? Why, in the first place, the very objection that he most strongly felt to this bill was, that it did affect those who should be connected, even through ignorance, with an illegal association. In what clause was it provided that its operation should be confined to those who knowingly and wilfully might be attached to such societies? "And be it further enacted, that every person who after shall become a member of any society, committee, or other body of persons, hereby declared to be an unlawful combination and confederacy, or shall act as a member thereof, and every person who after shall directly or indirectly maintain correspondence or intercourse therewith, or with any committee or other select body, president, treasurer, secretary, delegate, or other officer or member thereof, as such; or who shall, by contribution, collection or receipt of money or otherwise, aid, abet, or support any such society, or any committee or other select body, or any officer or member thereof as such, shall be deemed guilty of and every person convicted of any such offence by due course of law, shall and may be punished by as the Court before whom such offender shall be tried shall think fit." The party, therefore, was to be deemed guilty of a crime—whether of felony or misdemeanor—that was left in blank, and to be visited by a punishment also left in blank. There was no qualification [A member here suggested, that there was a qualification in the following clause]. His learned friend had pointed his attention to this clause:—"Provided always, and be it enacted, that where any society, committee, or other body of persons shall become an unlawful combination and confederacy within the meaning of this act, by reason of any matter or thing done by its members, or any of them, contrary to the provisions of this act; no member thereof shall be deemed guilty of such offence as aforesaid, or be subject to the penalties herein contained, unless he shall act as a member of such society, committee, or other body of persons, after his knowledge of such matter or thing done, whereby such society, committee, or other body of persons, shall have so become an unlawful combination and confederacy as aforesaid" (cheers from the Treasury benches). This was certainly a qualification to some extent. The reason for calling on a person before he took office, which was a voluntary act, to take the oath proposed by his hon. friend, seemed to be this—to discover whether or not he belonged to any society of the kind alluded to—a knowledge which, without some such means of ascertaining the fact, there seemed to be no means of coming at. But the object of the bill should rather be directed to the secret associations than to the open ones (hear, hear): the societies which were leagued together by secret oaths, such as the Orange Societies, were those that should be proceeded against. On this ground alone it might be possible to support the clauses he had just read; b. on the same ground he would vote for the clause proposed, should the bill be allowed to go to a committee.

Mr. Peel thought that the learned gent. would do well in future to read bills before he discussed them; for it was quite clear that the learned gent. had not read the bill on which he had been making a most vituperative attack. Surely it was not too much to ask of a learned judge, at least to hear the defence of a prisoner before he pronounced his condemnation. It seemed to be complained that Government were desirous of passing this bill without sufficiently discussing it. Now, after it had already, during five nights, been largely discussed, and every hon. gent. who had opposed the bill, had been regularly followed by some hon. member who was friendly to it, he thought there seemed no great desire to evade discussion. But the hon. member (Mr. Hutchinson) had said that he would endeavour to terrify or shame the Government out of this bill. Now he assured the hon. gent. that no language which he might make use of would ever deter him from pursuing that line of conduct which he might think his duty to his country as a member of that house, and to his Sovereign, as a servant of the Crown, demanded of him (cheers). The hon. gent. had also talked about corrupt majorities; and yet in two sentences afterwards, he had declared that he relied on the enlightened wisdom of that house to remove the disabilities of the Roman Catholics of Ireland. Now if the hon. gent. did rely upon the enlightened wisdom of that house, he would ask him whether he supposed that the house would be so influenced by corrupt motives to pass a penal law affecting the Roman Catholics (hear, hear)? He too much respected the good sense of the hon. gent. himself and the character of Parliament, to press this question any further. With respect to the proposition of the hon. member for Aberdeen, he must observe, that if the bill in question should pass into a law, the other statutes affecting secret societies in Ireland would still remain, under which persons becoming members of such societies were liable to transportation. Now, the hon. gentleman's proposition went to make a man swear, on entering office, that he did not belong to any secret society. If, belonging to a secret society, he should conceal that fact, he would commit perjury, and be liable to the penalties of that offence; but if he should refuse to swear, and admit his connexion with any illegal association, then he might be transported. Now if they would risk transportation, they would not stop at an oath: of what use, therefore, was the hon. member's test? But suppose an officer of Government should prove to belong to an Orange Lodge? Upon that point, he could find no difficulty in saying, that it would be the duty of Government to remove from his office any body in such a situation (cheers). He thought that the hon. gent. must see that his motion would not affect the object he had in view; and he hoped that the hon. gent.'s good sense would prevent him from pressing the matter to a division.

Lord Althorpe was glad to hear from the rt. hon. Sec. (Peel) the consolatory pledge that no Orangemen would be permitted to hold office. He believed that that single declaration would do more to put down illegal societies in Ireland than these bills or any other means (cheers). It was on this account that he was glad that his hon. friend (Mr. Hume) had submitted his proposition to the house; the country was at any rate obliged to him for affording the rt. hon. gent. an opportunity of making so important a declaration.

The clause was then rejected; after which the bill was committed, and the blanks filled up.

The report was ordered to be taken into further consideration on Thursday next.

FRIDAY, FEB. 25.—On the motion for the third reading of Unlawful Societies bill,

Mr. Leycester said, that in his opinion, the Catholic Association had contributed to preserve the peace of Ireland, and he could not, therefore, doubt that it would continue to do so. He believed, too, and this was another reason which would make him regret to see it put down, that Catholic Emancipation would be hastened and rendered more certain by means of the Association.

Mr. Spring Rice: There was one of the clauses of the bill at which he was astonished, on account of the monstrous power which it proposed to vest in the hands of the Irish magistracy. The clause to which he alluded was that which empowered any mayor, sheriff, or justice of the peace, within their respective jurisdictions, to command all meetings declared in the bill to be unlawful immediately to disperse, and to demand admission into any house, out-house, or office, where they should have good reason to believe that such unlawful assembly might be; and if refused, to enter by force. Even if the magistrates of Ireland were all that was most pure, it would be wrong to entrust them with such powers; but how much more impolitic it became, when it was notorious that many of the magistracy had committed acts of the greatest injustice! There were several cases in illustration of their behaviour, to which he would particularly call the attention of the house. In Corrol v. Falkner, which was an action for false imprisonment, tried at Clonmel, it came out that the plaintiff was a police officer, who had entered the defendant's house for the purpose of serving a civil process. The plaintiff having neglected to take off his hat, was first ordered out of the house by the defendant, who was a magistrate, and was finally committed under the Insurrection Act, under the pretence of having behaved tumultuously, and having entered Mr. Falkner's house with armed men, which armed men were his brother policemen. In the course of that trial Mr. Doherty had observed, that "heretofore the laws of this country were only known to the peasantry by their severity, and we were not, like our more favoured neighbours, accustomed to look to them for protection; but a new era is dawning." The Chief Justice, in his summing up, had remarked, "that the only question was the amount of da-magistrates. That the commitment under the Insurrection Act could not have been bona fide by the defendant, was manifest; to say the best of it, it was foolish and unadvised." In the next case, The King v. Delap, which was tried at the Waterford assizes, a magistrate had perceived a poor labouring man meddling with some seaweed on the shore, which he was in the habit of using as manure, and the justice had expressed himself so warmly on the subject, that either through his orders, or some misunderstanding of them, Delap, who was a policeman, had shot the unfortunate man through a mistaken sense of his duty; and that circumstance alone had induced the jury to return a verdict of manslaughter, instead of murder. On the trial the following words had fallen from Chief Justice Bushe: "Nothing is more deplorable than that gentlemen, in vindication of their seal, or supposed civil rights, should resort to such rigorous and unwarrantable proceedings against men in humble station. I am convinced that this vindictive and overbearing spirit has been one of the principal causes of the turbulent and lawless proceedings which disturb the neighbouring counties, and I cannot feel surprised that it should produce such consequences. If persons in the higher ranks of society will lord it over their inferiors with a high hand—if they trample upon public justice, and convert the laws into instruments of oppression against the weak and powerless, it is in vain to hope that the people will feel for them either respect or affection; or that they will refrain from endeavouring to procure for themselves, by violence, that redress which the conduct of their superiors teaches them to believe is not otherwise to be obtained." Another case that had been tried at the same assizes, was that of Nagle v. Boyce. Boyce, who was a magistrate, had been the landlord of the plaintiff; being desirous of cancelling the lease, and not having either the patience or inclination to go through any plan that might have been proposed by Nagle, he resorted to the summary expedient of imprisoning the plaintiff on a charge of felony. On that charge he had been detained for fifteen weeks in the bridewell of Tallow, without food, fire, or candle, except such as he could afford to procure himself; and at length, on consenting to give up the lease, he was released without being brought to trial. On the trial that was instituted by Nagle for false imprisonment, Mr. Doherty had taken occasion to exclaim, "Was not this an abuse of the justice of the country, and of the laws of the land? It was monstrous to say that any magistrate should assume to himself arbitrarily, and at his own pleasure, the power of sporting with the liberty of any man, however mean, obscure, and humble. In giving their verdict, the jury would teach the magistracy this salutary lesson—that they should not abuse the great public trust reposed in them by perverting their authority, and making it accessory to private or political purposes." On the same occasion, Chief Justice Bushe had remarked, that "It would be but a mockery to open courts of justice, and for judges and juries to assemble to administer the law, if the very fountains of justice were to be polluted, or if men who were invested with an important public trust were to make their public authority subservient to their private ends; the defendant was, in his opinion, utterly unworthy of being restored to the commission." The last case that he would trouble the house with was another charge of false imprisonment against a magistrate, Lawrence v. Dempster. In that case a verdict had been returned for the plaintiff, and Mr. Doherty had made the following remarks: "This is the third case against magistrates at the present assizes. This case will show the manner in which the Insurrection Act has been administered in a part of this county. I rejoice that the cases of oppression which have been developed at these assizes were not earlier made public, lest the sturdy guardians of our rights and privileges, who yielded lately such a reluctant assent to this harsh, but, I believe, necessary law, should have been confirmed in their opposition, from seeing the vile, selfish, and tyrannical purposes to which it has been made subservient in the hands of arrogant and oppressive magistrates; and lest they should have formed their opinions from the abuse rather than the use of this salutary law. Teach him, if he continue in the commission of the peace, that he must learn to administer the law in its true meaning, and not, as in the present case, torture it into an instrument of caprice or malevolence." These, then, were the sort of men to whom the administration of the laws was trusted, and to whom the house were to look as the proper and becoming officers for carrying the present act into effect. The cases that he had quoted were cases that could be relied upon; and he trusted, therefore, that the house would suspend their judgment in so important a clause; more especially as it was not to these magistrates alone, but to every mayor and sheriff, that this power was extended. They knew something of these officers in Ireland, and he would put it to the Sec. for Ireland, if he were prepared to empower these men, who were under no controul, with such extensive means of mischief (hear, hear)? The abuses of the magistracy in Ireland was mainly attributed to the weakness of Lord Wellesley's administration. If the house would pay that attention which it ought to do to the subject, he had no doubt that it could either enable or compel the Irish Government to do justice in that country. The hon. gent. concluded with moving, that the bill be read a third time that day six months.

Mr. Doherty said, that he was not bound, standing where he did, to answer for any seeming inconsistency into which he might have been led as an advocate. The bounden duty of an advocate was to make the best of his cause; the duty of a senator was to maintain the truth. He maintained, that as far as the experience of seventeen years' attendance on the Irish circuits enabled him to judge, the administration of justice in Ireland was perfectly pure. He repeated, that the administration of justice in Ireland was perfectly pure, that the rights of the poor man were equally respected with those of the rich, and that no distinction whatever was made between Catholic and Protestant. He begged to call the attention of the house to the opinion of Sir John Davies:—"There is no nation of people under the sun that doth love equal and indifferent justice better than the Irish, or will rest better satisfied with the execution thereof, although it be against themselves, so as they may have the protection and benefit of the law, when upon just cause they do desire it." And again, "In time of peace the Irish are more fearful to offend the law than the English, or any other nation whatsoever." Such as the Irish were in the days of Sir John

Davies, they continued to be at present; and he would add, that Mr. Justice Day concurred in thinking the administration of justice in Ireland to be impartial. He mentioned several cases in which Catholic suitors had obtained ample damages against Protestants; and poor ones against the rich. Then, if justice could be done in Ireland between Protestant and Catholic, between poor and rich—equal, certain, and impartial justice—he entrusted that there might be an end of that unworthy slander which gentlemen were apt to cast upon the authorities of their country. He did not mean to say that the legal road was very smooth in Ireland—that it was quite clear, or that poor men could travel upon it without pain or cost; but where could they do this in England, or in any other country? It had been done in Ireland, and could still be done there, between man and man, without the aid of the Catholic Association.

Mr. Baring still believed, that in the present state of party, the impartial administration of justice in Ireland was impossible. Why, but a few years since, at Manchester, and again, after the riots at the Queen's funeral, the commonest court in England, the court of the coroner, had been found entirely inefficient. He did not believe that it would have been possible to get justice in Ireland, either in the late cases brought forward the other day by the Attorney-General, or in the proceedings that originated out of the affair in the theatre, where a bottle was alleged to have been flung at the Lord Lieutenant. The undue administration of justice in Ireland arose from the state of dissension existing there, and must continue as long as the present system lasted. While the Catholic claims remained undecided, he was sorry to see ministers coming down, year after year, with new measures of coercion, which must be wholly inefficient.

Mr. W. Courtenay said, that he had always voted in favour of the Catholic claims; but he supported the motion before the house, because he thought the Association one of the heaviest afflictions with which any country could be visited, as it interfered with the regular course of justice. It was incompatible with the spirit of the constitution, and ought to be put down.

Sir J. Newport denied that the Association interfered with the course of justice. The aid they afforded to the peasantry in obtaining justice for acts of oppression, was by no means unnecessary. It was proved before a committee up stairs, that magistrates were in the habit of receiving presents in kind from those to whom they administered justice. The witness who gave this evidence explained his meaning of "presents in kind," by saying that the magistrate who dealt out justice to the poor farmers had his corn reaped, his turf cut and drawn home, and other acts of service done by these poor individuals in return. Was this a system which looked like the result of a regular system in the administration of justice? With respect to the effects which the present bill might produce in Ireland, he held in his hand a letter from a most respectable Protestant, in which it was stated, that the papers announcing the first night's division had produced in the minds of the people the most intense anxiety. The writer concluded by expressing the most serious apprehensions as to what might be the effects of passing the bill. He had resided thirty years in Ireland, and no man was more competent to judge of the probable effect of such a measure as the present.

Mr. Goulburn denied the imputation of partiality which had been made against this bill, and he appealed to the statute-book for proof, that the house had legislated to put down other societies. Hon. members seemed to forget the act passed in 1823, to put down associations of a particular description, by which the Orange societies, though not mentioned by name, were particularly aimed at. Besides, Orange societies exercised no direct interference in courts of justice, as the Association had done. It had been said that there was one law for the rich and another for the poor in Ireland. If that meant that there was a denial of justice to the poor man, he begged to deny the fact; but if it meant only that great inconvenience was felt by a poor man in prosecuting a suit at law, it was no more than was felt in this country, and was incidental to the condition of the poor in every state. With respect to magistrates, he would assert, and he defied contradiction, that there was no such thing as a disposition amongst them to take bribes for the administration of justice to the poor. There might have been cases of injustice and oppression on the part of magistrates; but whenever a case of the kind came fully before Government, there was no indisposition to remove such persons from the commission. In cases which affected the conduct of magistrates, and which became the subject of judicial inquiry, it was the constant practice of the Lord Chancellor to inquire into the merits of the case by taking the report of the judge who tried it, and to act by his opinion. This was done, in Lawrence v. Dampster. It had been said that the giving power to a single magistrate to enforce this act in particular instances, was without precedent; but the Convention Act gave power, not only to a single magistrate, but even to a peace-officer, to prevent or stop a meeting held contrary to the clauses of that act. In the present act that power was given to magistrates. Yet even on this point he was ready to attend to the suggestions which had been thrown out, and to make the presence of more than one magistrate necessary in certain cases; and he assured hon. members opposite, that from the first he was prepared to give his most patient attention to every suggestion by which the severity of this act might be mitigated as much as possible, without destroying its effect. He then proceeded to show that the statement made by the learned member for Winchelsea, regarding the conduct of Baron McClelland on one of the recent trials in Ireland, was utterly without foundation. The learned member had stated, that the acquittal of the soldier was attributable to the interference of the learned judge in preventing one of the witnesses from giving an answer to the question why he had omitted to state at the coroner's inquest that which he was then stating to the court. Since that statement had been made, he had received communications from the learned judge, and from two of the counsel for the prosecution. Now, on the authority of the counsel he could inform the house, that no such question had been proposed to the witness as was stated to have been objected to; and on the authority of the learned judge, that he had not put any stop to such investigation. The learned gent. had also made, upon what authority he knew not, another charge against the learned judge.

Mr. Brougham.—I made the charges on the authority of one of the counsel engaged in the prosecution.

Mr. Goulburn.—The learned gent. had said that the learned judge had not only forbore to defer a trial, the name of which was not mentioned, till the counsel engaged in it was sent for from another court, but had also refused to read over to him the evidence of the witnesses who had been examined previously to his coming into it. Now he had received a letter from the learned baron, stating, that as the name of the case had not been mentioned, he could not meet this charge with as positive a denial as he had done the former, but that he had no recollection of such a circumstance having occurred on the circuit, and that he believed that no such circumstance had occurred, as it was in direct opposition to the conduct which he had long been in the habit of pursuing towards the bar. It was his invariable practice, when a counsel was engaged in another court, and afterwards came in, to read over his notes to facilitate the cross-examination of the witnesses (hear, hear). After such a statement, nobody would again impute to the learned baron the glaring misconduct which had been attributed to him by the learned gent. (hear, hear). He was sure that the learned gent. would be the first to regret that he had been led by false information to employ the weight of his great eloquence in bringing such unfounded accusations against a judicial character, and he trusted it would teach him to abstain from depicting him in future as a person who was half a tiger and half another animal which the learned gent. had named, though unfortunately the word had not reached his ears (hear, hear). Such language was quite unwarrantable when used towards an individual of the learned baron's high station and character. No individual discharged his functions more impartially, or oftener interfered to prevent the recurrence of the violent party disputes which so frequently came before the tribunals of Ireland (cheers).

Mr. Denman had waited with impatience for some explanation of the learned baron's conduct; but the explanation that had been given was any thing but satisfactory. The learned baron had met the first charge with a denial. Now he could see no reason why the judge was to be believed rather than the barrister. The denial, on which the rt. hon. gent. laid so much stress, was only a repetition of what had happened on all such occasions (hear, hear). If a man were to be considered innocent merely because he denied the accusation brought against him, why should not the Catholic Association have the benefit of the doctrine? It had certainly every claim upon their indulgence; it had challenged inquiry into its conduct; it had offered evidence of its proceedings; that evidence had been rejected, and its guilt had been taken for granted, not only without producing any facts to establish it; but after shutting out from the public view every document except these miserable papers which were now poised in from every quarter to blacken its conduct and objects (hear, hear). Gentlemen on the other side had told them that they ought not to attack the absent. He wished that they would follow the advice they gave; and before they poured the vials of their wrath on the Association, would recollect that they had driven its members from their bar, and had not allowed them to refute the charges produced against them. It was, however, ridiculous to talk of not attacking the absent, when it was of chancellors and of judges that they had to speak. When he found the Lord Chancellor acting as the head of administration, and putting language into the mouth of his colleagues which filled the country with astonishment, he should not be deterred by any invidious sarcasms from declaring his opinion of that noble lord's political proceedings. They were told that the noble lord, if his colleagues would not adopt his language, intended to resign. When gentlemen on his side of the house intimated their doubts as to that point, they were told immediately, "It must be so, for the noble lord is a man of honour and integrity" (hear, and a laugh). And yet the men who told them so were themselves men of honour and integrity, who agreed to adopt language as their own which they disapproved, rather than resign the good things of office (cheers and laughter). He then proceeded to argue against the bill, as calculated to excite lasting discontent in Ireland; and implored the house, if it wished to re-establish itself in the confidence of the people of that country, to put down this Association, not by fresh penal laws, but by the repeal of those which already existed (cheers).

Col. Fords bore testimony to the high character and impartial conduct of Baron McClelland as a judge, which he had an opportunity of knowing, as the learned judge went circuit in the county in which he resided. He further declared his intention of supporting the bill.

Mr. C. H. Hutchinson was for some time inaudible, owing to the noise and coughing in the body of the house. He said that he trusted, for the honour of the house, that they would hear him, for he represented a large body of men, who deemed this question of vital importance to the interests of Ireland. He proceeded, amidst much confusion, to reiterate his opposition to this abominable measure, which he considered to be full of mockery and insult to the Catholics. He trusted that if it were carried into a law in that house, the Catholics would not only petition the House of Lords, but in case it passed there, would petition the Throne to withhold the Royal assent. It was said that this bill was sanctioned by Lord Wellesley, but he could not imagine his Lordship possessed of such littleness of mind as to advocate a measure fraught with injustice to a great part of the community, and calculated to create disturbance throughout the whole country (hear, hear! and question). They had been told that it was the intention of Ministers to augment the army to the amount of 15,000 men. It was stated, that only 5000 men were required to be added to our force in India; and if so, he begged to ask what was to be done with the other 10,000 men (question, question)? Were they raised in order to—(question, question)? were they raised in order to—(the coughing and noise in the house rendered the other part of the sentence inaudible, although it was repeated two or three times). If they apprehended danger from abroad—and the great augmentation of the army strongly imported that they did—he would ask whether it was wise, whether it was politic, at such a moment, to enforce a measure which would offend and irritate near seven millions of their fellow-subjects (hear, and question)? He concluded by imploring the house to reject so unwise, so unjust, so impolitic a measure.

Mr. Peel began by some allusion to what had fallen from Mr. Tierney, in a former evening, with respect to Irish affairs, during the time in which he had been Secretary for Ireland. With regard to what had fallen on a former night from the learned member for Winchester, he now wished to repeat, as near as he could remember them, the very words he used in speaking of one of the most public acts of the Association. He said that they had committed an act of indiscretion, at least, by their address to Mr. Hamilton Rowan (hear, hear). He would now say, he had listened to the speech in which the learned gent. had commented on his observations with no feeling of hostility, and no other emotion but admiration for the splendid talents evinced by the learned gent. The charge of indiscretion against the Association he now repeated. The address made by them through their secretary on the same day with their address to the Catholics of Ireland, was an act calculated to excite the alarm of the whole Protestant community. The learned gent. had expatiated on the private character of Mr. Rowan; contending that he was an excellent father, landlord, master—that he fulfilled with unimpeachable integrity all the duties of private life. But had he impugned the private virtues of Mr. Rowan, or did the Association speak of them in their address to him? The Association addressed him as a man “whose life had been devoted, and almost sacrificed in the cause of his country.” He said at the time, and he now repeated, that this Address brought Mr. Rowan before the country, as a public character; and he was therefore liable to observations upon his public conduct. The learned member had described Mr. Rowan as a good father, a good landlord, and an amiable man in all the relations of private life. Did he deny this? He was as ready as any man to admit what the learned gent. had stated as to the private qualities of Mr. Rowan: but he spoke only of his public character; and he grounded his observations on the Report of the Secret Committee of the Irish House of Lords in 1794, in which it was stated, that Mr. Rowan was in communication with an emissary of France, and that he had subsequently been attainted of high treason. The learned gent. appeared, however, to think that the attainder would not have passed, had Mr. Rowan been heard against his accusers. He went further, and stated that Mr. Rowan had been received with courtesy by the Irish Government, and more particularly by my Lord Manners, whom the learned gent. had been pleased to designate as the pink of loyalty. It was true that Mr. Rowan had been attainted without having been tried; but the learned gent. should not forget the trial of Mr. Jackson, and the facts which were established upon that occasion. Was Mr. Rowan never called upon to answer for his conduct, and had the house no documents to go upon with respect to his conduct? Had they not an account of his trial, and sentence of imprisonment for two years? Had they not an account of his escape from imprisonment when he fled to France? Had they not also the Address published by the United Irishmen to the Volunteers of Ireland? Of that Society, Mr. Drennan was Chairman, and Mr. Rowan, Secretary. That Address was published during the French Revolution, when the National Convention was sitting, and when disorder and disunion prevailed in that country. What was the language put forth by Mr. Rowan, as Sec. to the United Irishmen? The Address commenced:—“Citizen Soldiers, you first took arms to protect your country from foreign enemies, and domestic disturbance; for the same purpose it now becomes necessary that you should resume them.” The Address went on:—“Citizen Soldiers, to arms, take up the shield of faith, and the pledges of peace—peace, the motive of your virtuous institution. War, an occasional duty, ought never to be made an occupation; every man should become a soldier in the defence of his rights; no man ought to continue a soldier for defending the rights of others; the sacrifice of life in the service of our country is a duty much too honourable to be entrusted to mercenaries, and at this time, when your country has, by public authority, been declared in danger, we conjure you, by your interest, your duty, and your glory, to stand to your arms, and in spite of a police, in spite of a fencible militia, in virtue of two Proclamations, to maintain good order in your vicinages, and tranquillity in Ireland.” The learned Judge, in passing sentence upon Mr. Rowan, observed:—“At this period (1794) the great body of the Roman Catholics were seeking relief by dutiful addresses, stating they were anxious to be liberated from the restraints they laboured under; but you advised them to take up arms, and by force to obtain their measures. They were palpably to be made a dupe to your designs, because you say you will proceed to the accomplishment of your beloved principles, Universal Emancipation and Representative Legislation. Seduction, calumny, and terror are the means by which you intend to effect them. The volunteers are become instruments in your hands, and despairing to seduce the army, you calumniate them with the opprobrious epithet of mercenaries. You say seduction made them soldiers, but nature made them men. . . . . You called upon the people to arm—all are summoned to arms to introduce a wild system of anarchy, such as now involves France in the horrors of civil war, and deluges the country with blood.” The learned Judge went on:—“It is happy for you, and those who were to have been your instruments, that they did not obey you. It is happy for you that this insidious summons to arms was not obeyed; if it had been, and the people with force of arms had attempted to make alterations in the constitution of this country, every man concerned would have been guilty of high treason.”—He must again repeat, that in speaking of Mr. Rowan, he only spoke of him in his public capacity, and he could not help adding, that the Address of the Catholic Association to him was calculated to excite suspicion and alarm. The learned gent. had stated, that Mr. Rowan had been received in public and private society in the most cordial manner. He did not mean to contradict this, but he would refer the house to Mr. Rowan's own statement, after having received his free pardon, in the course of which he mentions, that during his absence his wife and children had been most kindly attended to by Lord Clare, who had been described by the learned gent. as one of his greatest enemies. Mr. Rowan, on being brought before the Court for his discharge, observed, in a splendid speech:—“When last I had the honour of appearing before this tribunal, I told your lordships I knew his Majesty only by his wielding the force of the country; since that period, during my legal incapacity and absence beyond seas, my wife and children have not only been unmolested, but protected; and in addition to those favours, I am now indebted to the Royal mercy for my life. I will neither, my Lords, insist upon the rectitude of my intentions, nor the extent of my gratitude, lest my conduct should be attributed to base and unworthy motives; but I hope my future life will evince the sincerity of those feelings with which I am impressed by such unmerited proofs of his Majesty's beneficence" (cheers from the Ministerial benches). He had been charged with unfairly suppressing the fact of Mr. Rowan's having been received into public and private society. The learned member said, "You, sir, a member of the Irish Government, you a gentleman residing in Ireland, ought to have known the situation in which Mr. Rowan moved in that country; and," continued the learned gent., "you ought, as a member of that Government, to know that Mr. Rowan had been a Magistrate upon his return;—you ought to know that he had been received at the Castle as well by the prejudiced as the liberal Lords Lieutenant in Ireland. He had been received both by Lord Manners and Mr. Saurin, and they having found no fault, how dare you make an appeal against the beloved name of an individual whom the Government of Ireland have placed in the important situation of a Magistrate of the country" (hear, hear, hear)? For himself, he gave such credence to the statement of the learned gent. that he could not venture upon his own authority to contradict it. He therefore applied to the Hansard Office in Ireland, and the answer was, that after the most minute search, it was found that no such person as Mr. Rowan had been admitted to the Commission of the Peace for any county in Ireland for the last twenty years (repeated cheers from the Ministerial benches). He begged to assure the house, that in making this statement, he entertained no angry feelings towards the learned gent., but he would appeal not only to the house, but to the learned gent. himself, whether he had not by this simple statement, dashed from his hand that poisoned chalice which the learned member had commended to his lips (cheers).

Mr. Brongham: The rt. hon. gent. had commenced his speech in the most open and candid manner. He appealed to him and to the house with the utmost simplicity—and he repeated the terms "rash, indiscreet, equivocal," as applied to the conduct of the Association, in such a manner, that had no gent. in that house heard his former speech, the rt. hon. gent.'s statement would have perfectly answered his object. But, in his recollection, there dwelt an impression of that hon. gent.'s words so different in their spirit from the calm, candid, and plausible manner—so different from the tone of good feeling adopted to-night by the rt. hon. gent.—that he must declare that words less like than they were to what the rt. hon. gent. now spoke of, he had never heard. "Would they"—for that was the language of the rt. hon. gent.'s former appeal—"would they defend this Association, when on the very day of their declaration to the Catholic population of Ireland they issued an address, expressive of their love and veneration for an attainted traitor" (loud and continued cheering)? "Attainted traitor!" Those were the words. He appealed to the impartial men of that house, who mingled neither with one side nor the other, whether such were not the rt.

hon. gentleman's words uttered in the face of the country, without respect to the feelings of the individual, of his country, or his son? He appealed to the memory of the rt. hon. gent. after one week's recollection of what he had said (a laugh); he appealed to him, as placing himself in the situation of one of those gallant officers, whose distinguished bravery adorned a service, of which to be amongst its lowest members was, in itself, a high honour—and he asked, what must be the feelings of Capt. Hamilton when he heard his father publicly denounced as an attainted traitor (cheers)? Those were the words which roused his feelings, and which, perhaps, had roused them to excess. But there was not a word or a syllable which he had uttered on Friday last, that he was not prepared to use again. He had, on that occasion, defended Mr. Rowan. From that defence he did not shrink. He had defended the Association for mentioning Mr. Rowan, with respect and affection. That defence he was about to repeat. Although a week's reflection had considerably altered the tone of the rt. hon. gent., yet, with that exception, no part of the harshness or injustice of his original charge against Mr. Rowan and the Association was diminished. From that raking charge he was about again to defend them both. It was admitted by the rt. hon. gent. that Mr. Rowan had not been tried for treason—that he had been attainted without previous investigation. But then, a Mr. Jackson had been so tried, and the rt. hon. gent. thought that Mr. Rowan was implicated in that trial. But that was not all. The rt. hon. gent. said, that although the attainer of Mr. Rowan was not the result of a trial, that that gentleman had nevertheless been tried. But for what offence? For treason? For any offence which gave the rt. hon. gent. a right to call him an attainted traitor? No such thing: he was tried for a seditious libel. If the Association, however, had been wrong in putting an address into the hands of Mr. Rowan, because in troublesome and uncertain times he had written something that was deemed a libel, they had since committed another indiscretion of a similar nature. They first declared that they revered the name of a person who was convicted of writing a seditious libel, in 1794, and, thirty years' experience not having made them wiser, they confided their present petition to the care of an hon. bart. who had been declared guilty of a seditious libel, on very similar grounds, by a justly-judging and correctly-feeling jury; in consequence of which, he had been subjected to a long imprisonment, in the time of peace, on the very banks of that river, that washed the walls within which they were now assembled (hear, hear). Once for all, he said that he should not have felt any difficulty in those times, situated as Ireland then was, as an Irishman and a patriot, to set his hand to such a libel as that with which Mr. Rowan had been charged. It spoke of arming the people. That was in a country in which the Volunteers had been called the saviours of Ireland. What Mr. Rowan declared was, that the people should arm to defend their country, which was in danger. If he meant that they were not to stop after they had driven back the external foe, but were to proceed to obtain civil liberty, that was only what had formerly been done with the sanction of the Irish Parliament: that was only what the Volunteers of Ireland had done; that was only what, if it had not been done, would have left Ireland degraded and enslaved. They were times in which the wisest and best patriots might have been exposed to danger. Not even Mr. Grattan was safe. A consultation had been held in the Privy Council, on the propriety of trying Mr. Grattan; and there was reason to believe, that his leaving his country to attend his duty elsewhere saved him from much trouble on that occasion. There were other charges, however, against the Catholic Association, and against Mr. Rowan. (The learned gent. was here interrupted by a loud cry of order!) He wished the hon. gent. who cried "order" would resume the deep slumber in which he must have been wrapped for the last half hour; for nobody who had been awake during that time, and had listened to the important discussion which had been proceeding, could have thought of interrupting it by a cry of "order." It was true that he had asserted that Mr. Rowan was in the Committee of the Peace; but he begged to observe, that that alleged fact he knew no more than the rt. hon. gent. knew, except from information which he had received only ten minutes before he rose on Friday, from persons connected with the sister kingdom. He had since seen the same persons, and had been told by them that they had seen Mr. Rowan's signature to an address of the most loyal, and therefore of the most unexceptionable character, under a title which might have misled any one, namely, "The Address of the undersigned persons, being Magistrates and Grand Jurors of the County of Down." It was evident, therefore, that the mistake was very easily made. It must have originated in Mr. Rowan's having signed the address in the capacity of a grand juror, not in that of a magistrate. He, however (Mr. Brougham), stood perfectly acquitted. Having received the information as he had received it, he was bound to communicate it to the house. So far was he from repenting of the statement, that he should have been ashamed of himself if he had not made it. But there were some other statements to make on this subject, which he had omitted when he last addressed the house. Whether Mr. Rowan were a magistrate or not, was only one circumstance. Let it be taken out of his defence, and that defence would still be impregnable. Mr. Rowan was restored to his family and country. Was not that enough? He received a free pardon: was that nothing? He regained all the rights and privileges of a citizen: was that nothing? He was allowed to act as a grand juror—to pronounce on bills for high treason: was that nothing? He was received at the levees at the Castle—was that nothing? One Lord-Lieutenant after another treated him with courtesy and kindness. To show what was thought of him by one Lord-Lieutenant, he was authorised to read to the house a letter from the Duke of Bedford—a man not more disposed to be favourable to the propagation of high treason than the rt. hon. gent. opposite, although they assumed to be the only defenders of the altar and the throne. These were the words of the Duke of Bedford:—"One of the first of my official acts was to recommend to the Crown to grant a free pardon to Mr. Rowan. No one act of my administration has ever given me more satisfaction, because I am convinced that a more honourable and respectable man does not exist in all Ireland" (cheers). Be it known, then, to the world, that the most grievous charge against the Association amounted to this—that although he was no magistrate, they had pointedly shown their regard for a fellow-citizen, than whom a more honourable and respectable man could not be found in all Ireland (hear, hear). His Majesty did that very thing, for which his Majesty's ministers accused the Catholic Association (hear, hear). When the Sovereign had received him at the levee, no man living could charge, no man living ought to charge the Association with indiscretion in manifesting their respect to Mr. Rowan. He repeated his opinion that this gentleman had been ungenerously, unnecessarily attacked, and he envied not the feelings of those who, perhaps to round a period, or at any rate to make an impression, could indulge in such a charge. One word as to the observations which he had made upon Baron McClelland. He had before given his reasons for believing in the statement which had been made to him respecting those transactions: he still believed in that statement. He had his information from a gentleman whom he knew, and who was of counsel in the cause. The answer of the learned baron, as reported by the rt. hon. gent. with respect to one of the cases, was specific—in the other, general and argumentative. He found nothing in either of the answers to alter his belief, or effectually to meet that statement. He had been accused of using strong language—of attributing to that learned person very extraordinary and almost indescribable baseness and cruelty. He had in the most marked manner introduced those expressions as some which were applied to the learned baron by an hon. member of the house:

"Non meus hic sermo, sed quem precepit Oseolus, Rusticus, abnormis sapiens, crassaque Minervâ."

He was not answerable for that description of the learned baron. It was given by one who knew him much better than he did. Whether just or not might soon be known, if it should be the pleasure of the house to inquire into it: an opportunity would soon occur. A gentleman was coming over to support a petition which had been presented two years ago, who desired to be allowed to prove at the bar of the house, certain charges of malversation against Baron McClelland. He had stated what he had heard and believed—what he still must believe—because of the defects in the answer of the learned baron. It was not necessary that he should add more to his objections against the bill. He deplored its progress deeply: he denounced it as the harbinger of ill: it was his unalterable opinion, that it would produce remediless mischief—that it would break up that short-lived tranquillity which they owed to the exertions of this Association. He called on the house once for all to pause. It was not a measure directed equally against Orange and Catholic Associations, but against Catholic Associations alone. He had hoped, if not for the substance, at least for the semblance of even-handed justice. The Orangemen were prevented from associating in secret, so were the Catholics. But the Catholics were also prohibited from meeting in public, in order to obtain any alterations in the affairs of church or state. Who ever heard of Orangemen wanting any alterations in church or state? They were only too glad to maintain things as they were; alteration would annihilate them and their hopes. The Catholics only had good grounds for complaint. They alone wished for alteration. And this the house called justice! This was dealing equally between the parties! His last prayer was—if they would persist in this act of hostility to the Catholics—this grievous measure of injustice, which went to shut the gates of justice—he might almost say of mercy,—upon Ireland—that they would think deeply of it between this and Tuesday night. Then, if they were consistent—if they were not dead to the voice of justice, policy, and reason, late as it would be, yet not being too late, they would gladly retrace the steps which they had so madly taken, and they would give Emancipation to the Catholics (continued cheers).

Mr. Peel denied that he had on the last occasion on which this subject had been discussed, used any tone of peculiar harshness or vehemence. He now calmly re-asserted every single expression that had fallen from him last Friday. In the course of his observations on that evening, he had read a passage from the report of the Secret Committee, in which it was distinctly stated that Mr. Hamilton had been attained. What would become of the freedom of debate in that house, if such a proceeding were to be considered as justly censurable (cheers)?

The house then divided:—For the motion, 226; against it, 96.—Majority, 130.

The bill was then read a third time, and passed.

THURSDAY, MARCH 3.—Mr. Brownlow presented a petition from certain Protestants of Ireland, praying that the house would be pleased to institute an investigation into the principles and conduct of Orange Associations. The object of the petitioners was to clear themselves from the calumnies which had been heaped upon them as members of Orange lodges in Ireland. Mr. O'Connell had grossly libelled the members of Orange lodges, when he stated that they employed the two first verses of the 68th Psalm to express their enmity to the Catholics. The verse which was quoted by the Orangemen was that in which mention was made of the "bill of Bashan," and was used only as a sign by which they knew each other. He would take this opportunity of stating, that although he did not consider the bill which had lately passed through the house applied to Orange societies, because he did not think they were unlawful, yet it would have the effect, by putting down the Catholic Association, of putting an end to the former societies likewise. He believed he might venture to say, that when the Catholic Association should be no more, the Orange Associations would likewise cease to exist. He moved that the petition be referred to the committee for examining into the state of Ireland.

Lord Althorpe said, that a great part of what had been said of the Orange Associations was true; and that if Mr. O'Connell were not right with respect to the verse, he was with respect to the Psalm.

Mr. C. H. Hutchinson observed, that if the Orange societies had been misrepresented, it was the result of their own unwillingness to give any explanation of their views and proceedings. Sir A. B. King had refused to make any such disclosures two years ago, when examined at the bar of the house.

Mr. Peel said, that whatever objection he might have to the Catholic claims, no member of that house had heard with greater satisfaction than he had the statement that there was to be an end of Orange Associations, and no man could be more sincere in exhorting the members of these associations to refrain from entering into a contest with the legislature. In looking at the petition, he had observed that it referred to the testimony which he had, in 1814, borne to the loyalty of the members of Orange societies. He was willing to bear precisely the same testimony as to the great body of those who belonged to those associations. But the loyalty of those persons could be no compensation for the evil which resulted from the existence of the societies. His advice to the members of the Orange societies was to avoid in future every appearance of entering into a contest with the legislature. With respect to what had been said as to many persons holding official situations remaining members of Orange societies, after the passing of the late act against them, he could state that they had done so for the purpose of allaying angry feelings, and exercising a beneficial influence.

Mr. Brownlow did not mean to say that Orange societies were extinct, but only that there was nothing more calculated to produce their total dissolution than the bill which recently passed through that house.

The petition was then referred to the committee.

LORDS, MONDAY, FEB. 28.—The Unlawful Societies bill being brought up from the Commons, and read a first time, numerous petitions were presented for and against it; amongst others, the Bishop of Bath and Wells presented a petition from the city of Bath, in favour of the bill, and against the Catholic claims, signed by 300 persons. The rt. rev. prelate also presented a petition to the same effect from the Archdeacon and clergy of the diocese of Bath and Wells. This last petition, which was drawn up in strong language, intimated in one passage, that the Catholics had covered their designs with a cloak of loyalty, which they had now thrown off, and were proceeding to threats.

Earl Fitzwilliam condemned the use of such language as that which the petitioners used, on account of its impolicy as well as its illiberality and injustice to the Catholics. He objected to petitions from the clergy for the exclusion of others from constitutional privileges, as coming from an interested body. If a rich corporation petitioned for objects which were supposed to favour its interests, why might not the army be allowed to petition in the like manner? He condemned all penal laws for opinions—all attempts to control the consciences of men. Such conduct was flying in the face of Heaven, and it was dreadful to think of the consequences which might follow from thus persisting in inflicting misery on six millions of human beings. He wished their lordships to recollect that the only pretext for this manner of proceeding was a conscientious difference of opinion in men who acknowledged the same Saviour, and, in all its great principles, the same faith as themselves. He pointed out passages of the petition which ascribed designs to the Catholics which the petitioners could not know to be true, and ascribed motives to them which they disclaimed.

The Bishop of Bath and Wells thought that the sentiments contained in the petition re-fected credit on those from whom it came. He was not aware of any improper language in it. He could not see why petitions against a measure should not be received from persons whose interests might be affected by that measure. In the present case, he thought the clergy had as good a right to petition as any other class of his Majesty's subjects. If any thing could show the unreasonableness of such an exception, it would be the reception of a petition which professed to come from the whole body of the Catholic priesthood of Ireland.

Lord Holland would make no objection to the reception of this petition. He would receive it, notwithstanding the absolute falsehoods which it was said to contain—notwithstanding the gross allegations of improper motives with which it was filled—notwithstanding the spirit and temper which it displayed, and which he needed not to characterize (hear, hear). The petitioners in this case came before their lordships humbly representing their views and their fears; but what evidence did they give of Christian humility in their arrogant denial of equal privileges to their Christian brethren? They professed their regard for Christian establishments, but showed none to Christian charity. They broadly stated that the Catholics avowed the doctrine of the Pope's supremacy in civil matters—an assertion which the Catholics denied. They next asserted that the real object of the Catholics was to overthrow the Protestant Church establishment, and possess themselves of its revenues; and this the Catholics denied. It did not well become a body of men, professing to act under the influence of Christian charity, to suspect lightly the motives of others, even when there existed reason for suspicion; but no man with the least pretension to candour, or justice, or comprehending even the meaning of true charity, could impute bad motives to his neighbours while none existed, or ascribe designs to them which they disavowed. In every petition for Catholic Emancipation which he had seen, so far were designs against the Protestant establishment from being avowed, that they were distinctly disclaimed (hear, hear). In the general Catholic petition presented lately to the house, not only were such designs disclaimed, but the principles of civil and religious liberty were eloquently stated and enforced.

The Bishop of Hertford said, that the assertion about the Pope's supremacy was not made on light grounds. This doctrine was not disguised or disclaimed by the Catholics: it was openly avowed. There was a Catholic journal, extensively circulated among that body, which had lately asserted the doctrine in its full latitude. The editor, in speaking of a late ordinance of the King of France, disapproving of the conduct of a cardinal for compromising the liberties of the Gallican Church, said, that he could not agree with the views of the French Government on this occasion, because the King had no title to interfere with the conduct of the church to the injury of the indefeasible rights of his Holiness the Pope. The same doctrine was asserted by all the Roman Catholic priests of Lancashire. They made no scruple to say that the churches of this kingdom had been theirs once, and would soon be theirs again. He did not entirely approve of all the expressions in the petition (hear, hear). There were some that he would have been glad to see expunged, but it would be hard to refuse conscientious men the right of making known their fears, and raising their voices in defence of our establishments, though they might, in their sincerity and honest conviction, employ a greater severity of terms than the occasion warranted. If he wanted any further excuse for such conduct, he might find it in what the world looked upon as a justification—a similar harshness of language in the opponents of the petitioners. The worthy clergymen of the Establishment who conscientiously discharged their duties were styled "hungry Protestant parsons" in all the publications of the Catholics. He could not sit silent while he heard the conduct of the petitioners arraigned, and motives imputed to them which they would disclaim.

The Earl of Carnarvon did not disapprove of churchmen petitioning on public measures any more than any other class; but he objected to their separating themselves from the great body of the people in their applications. But he must observe that the petitioners evinced the strongest bias, and were actuated by prejudices which led them to distort facts. They prayed that the house would protect our established religion, which was threatened with spiritual tyranny and oppression. What man could look around him in the country and witness the situation of the two systems, and say that the Protestant body were threatened with spiritual violence, oppression, and tyranny from the Catholics? He had always heard it represented that the tyranny and oppression were not only threatened, but inflicted from the other side. However that might be, there was certainly spiritual coercion. He regretted that the petitioners should have thrown such discredit on themselves and their order by the uncharitable nature of their allegations, and the falsehood of their assertions. They had justified Lord Clarendon's character of churchmen, who said, "that of all mankind, the clergy were, on general subjects, the least informed, and took the worst view of the affairs of the world."

Lord King expressed his belief that such a petition could not have come from any other corporation or place in the kingdom than from the wise men of the diocese whence it issued. Such a mass of nonsense could no where else have been concocted. The clergy in that town were entirely in the dark. They read and knew nothing. They had not even perused the liberal proclamation of the liberal King of Hanover. He wished the rev. prelate would take that proclamation and hang it upon every chapel door in his diocese (hear, hear). He would probably be asked by the petitioners, "What have we to do with Hanover," as it had been anciently asked "what good can come out of Nazareth?" He would say, much good could come out of Hanover, if the rev. gentlemen would read that liberal proclamation.

The Bishop of London presented a similar petition from the Archdeaconry of Colchester.

Lord Cliffden believed that these petitions could not fail to do good by attracting public notice to the state of the Church Establishment—to the enormous wealth of some of its members, and the poverty of others. The inequality of the division of church preferment was scandalous, some individuals possessing 20,000*l.* a-year, while others had only 25*l.* The petitions were then received.

THURSDAY, MARCH 3.—Lord Kenyon had a petition to present from certain Irish Protestants belonging to Orange Societies, who thought themselves greatly calumniated and injured by the bill now before their lordships, and who anxiously wished for an opportunity to vindicate themselves, either before the committee now inquiring into the state of Ireland, or in any other manner in which their lordships might permit them to be heard. They stated these Societies of Orangemen had existed for a long period, and that many persons in parliament, and connected with the government, had often expressed themselves favourable to their principles, and satisfied as to the propriety of their conduct. They mentioned that their conduct had been spoken of with approbation by two generals commanding in Ireland (Lake and Knox), by a lord-lieutenant, and by a high civil authority (Mr. Peel) in the House of Commons, in 1814. Their lordships would recollect a bill which passed some time ago, which related particularly to the Orange Societies of Ireland, describing certain ceremonies which it enacted should be suppressed. With that respect to the law which always distinguished the Orangemen of Ireland, they paid full obedience to that statute; and they now thought it extremely hard that a bill expressly introduced for the purpose of suppressing another society, by no means distinguished for devotion to the laws, should be so framed as to apply equally to them. Why not frame the bill in such a manner as to make it apply only to those who were the real objects of it? He hoped that their lordships would allow them the opportunity of redeeming their character, for which they prayed.

The petition was referred to the committee on the state of Ireland.

The Earl of Caernarvon rose to present a petition from certain persons composing the Catholic Deputation, then in London, praying to be heard by counsel against the Unlawful Societies bill at their lordships' bar; and to move that their prayer be granted. He conceived, that like all individuals who were about to be affected by a proceeding before the house, the petitioners were entitled to be heard. This principle had always governed their proceedings, and should be strictly adhered to by that house, which was the highest tribunal of justice in the kingdom. His Majesty's speech had charged the members of the Association, with having "adopted proceedings irreconcilable with the spirit of the constitution, and calculated, by exciting alarm, and by exasperating animosities, to endanger the peace of society." Was not this a serious charge, coming, as it did, from the throne, and must not members of the Association consider it an imputation which they must be desirous to remove? Surely such charges entitled the individuals accused, to be allowed to come before that house, in order to prove that the imputations cast upon them were unfounded. Their lordships had no other means of ascertaining the truth of the representations which had been made of the conduct of the Association. Much of the information they were supposed to have had on that subject must have reached them through polluted sources, which could not be depended on. He was therefore instructed to say, that one of the objects of the petitioners in asking to be heard by counsel was, that they might have the opportunity of laying before the house the authentic minutes of their proceedings from the first day of their meeting to the present hour. Those minutes would show that there had been nothing censurable in their conduct—nothing which could subject them to the charges in his Majesty's Speech, which had been made the ground for bringing in the present bill. He knew not, therefore, how the noble earl (Liverpool) could justify a refusal of the petitioners' request: especially when their lordships were so careful, in other cases, as to personal interests, that they would not pass a bill to exclude a goose from a common until the owner was heard. But it was said that the petitioners had no personal interests at stake—that the measure was altogether of a public nature—and that it was not the practice to hear counsel against such a proceeding. If the petitioners had no personal interest—if they complained of no injury to themselves, this argument would be good; but these were men whose individual conduct was called in question, and who were charged with offences of the gravest kind. Had they no interest in the removal of such extraordinary imputations? It was impossible to deny that they had an interest of the most pressing kind. He must observe, that with respect to this bill, they were legislating in the dark. They might, however, easily obtain information; and ought not, for their own sakes, to refuse any evidence which was offered. Notwithstanding what had been said in the Speech from the Throne, all that they regularly knew of the Association was, that, since its meeting, tranquillity had been preserved in Ireland. Was it reasonable, then, to expect the same effect from putting it down? The necessity for obtaining information before they passed this act, was materially increased by the distance of the country and the persons, it affected. It was to affect the people of a country of whose true interests he feared many in that House were not informed—a people whose habits were very different from those with whom their lordships were more intimately acquainted. On all former occasions, when it had been proposed to pass a measure of this sort, in this country, it had always been the practice to precede it by a committee of inquiry. If, then, information was thought necessary before a measure affecting the people of this country could be adopted, how much more were their lordships bound to require it in the present case? This was the more imperative when it was considered that the Association had not only the great body of the Catholics in its favour, but that its leaders were among the ablest men in the country. From the petitions which had been laid on their table, their lordships knew to what extent it was supported by men of wealth and rank. Until better information was obtained, it was ridiculous to assert that the Association was dangerous to the country. If their lordships inquired, it was probable that the result of the investigation would produce important information. It was possible that some legislative measure might be found necessary; but, in the first place, let the house ascertain the real nature of the evil which had been pointed out in his Majesty's Speech and determine whether it required a remedy, or not. He wished for their lordships' own sakes—for the interests of Ireland—for the interests of this country—that they would not refuse inquiry. What, if the result should be, that it was not the Association which exasperated animosities, endangered the peace of society, and retarded the course of national improvement, as described in his Majesty's Speech? What, if it should be found that these evils were not attributable to them, but to others? If this should prove to be the case, why should we not return the ingredients of the poisoned chalice to their lips who were the real authors of the evil? Of this he was certain, that if they allowed the petitioners to plead their own cause, they would do much towards laying the foundation of permanent peace. If this were necessary for the tranquillity of Ireland, it was no less so for the security of Great Britain. England and Ireland must stand or fall together. They were united by nature; for England seemed placed in the midst of the subject ocean to protect her surrounding neighbours. But as long as Ireland was not cordially united with us, one limb of the empire was paralysed, and our vigour was imperfect. He saw no reason why Ireland should not equal the prosperity of England; under proper management it would probably be the most prosperous country in Europe. Their lordships were bound to inquire, whether it was not others who interrupted the peace of the country, and retarded those national improvements which might give to Ireland that degree of prosperity and wealth which was consistent with the number and the character of her population. He concluded by moving that counsel be heard against the bill.

The Earl of Liverpool conceived that, if their lordships acceded to this motion, they would give up all those general rules by which their practice had hitherto been guided, and would establish a dangerous precedent. The bill before the house was a measure altogether general. It did not even name the Association. He did not mean to deny that the conduct of that body afforded a ground for passing the bill; but unquestionably it was equally directed against all associations. It was, as the preamble stated, introduced for the purpose of preventing the evasion of a former act. This being the object of the bill, if every individual who might allege that he was aggrieved were to be heard against it, their lordships would never get to an end. If individuals were allowed to come forward and state reasons against the passing of general measures, parliament could never legislate. When any special pecuniary interest was supposed to be affected by a measure before the house, individuals so situated might be heard; but they were heard on their special interests only. What bill was there with regard to which a similar application might not be made, if the claim of the petitioners were allowed? If this Association were to be heard, every other society would have an equal claim, and their lordships might pass six months in hearing counsel. It had been said, that on all former occasions, before passing any bill of this kind, their lordships had instituted inquiries, and adopted the measure on the report of a secret committee; but this measure was grounded on the notorious nature of the proceedings against which it was directed. Indeed, there was not a fact respecting the conduct of the Association relied upon as a ground for this bill, which he was not prepared to give up if any noble lord would say that he knew it to be untrue. The petition, therefore, demanding to be heard against it, if granted, would only open the door to great delays and inconvenience. But he would say that if ever there were a case in which no ground could be stated for a departure from the common rule of refusing to hear particular parties on general measures, it was this. It was well known to their lordships that ministers had concurred in the utility of a general inquiry into the situation of Ireland. A committee had been appointed for conducting that inquiry by each House of Parliament; and he would ask all who were acquainted with the manner in which those committees conducted their proceedings, whether the best disposition was not shown to go into the investigation fully, and impartially, and to hear all the evidence that was likely to be useful. To those committees persons of all parties were welcome; and if any other inquiry were instituted with reference to the bill before the house, he did not see why the members of the Catholic Association alone should be heard. A noble friend (Lord Kenyon) had that night presented a petition from certain Protestants of Ireland, called Orangemen, who prayed likewise to be heard at the bar of the house respecting this bill, and he did not see how their prayer could be resisted, if that of the Catholic Association were granted. Both sides were invited to come before the committee of either house now sitting, and they would be heard. Considering, then, that there was no ground laid for compliance with this petition—conceiving that the provisions of the bill were of a general character, against which no man's particular interests entitled him to be heard—conceiving that the notoriety and undeniable nature of the facts were sufficient to warrant the legislature in its proceedings, he did not see why their lordships should establish an inconvenient precedent, which could not in this case lead to advantage, and which might be claimed in favour of all parties as well as of one. He thought he best discharged his duty by resisting the motion (hear, hear).

Earl Grey: Feeling that a more unanswerable appeal had never been made to the justice of the house against a measure which would condemn the petitioners without proof,—which calumniated their intentions without hearing their justification, and which, through them, imposed restrictions on the general rights of the people, on allegations the falsehood of which they offered and pledged themselves to establish, he should vote for the motion (hear, hear). He must begin by expressing his surprise at the ground taken by the noble earl, which he could not consider a very manly one, in contending that the bill was a general measure—that it was not particularly directed against the Catholic Association—and that the petitioners had therefore no reason to complain. On other occasions, when measures like this were directed against particular societies, they were named in the bill; a proceeding which excluded any pretence of the kind now set up. The Catholic Association was as exclusively the subject of this bill, as if its name had occurred in every clause of it (hear, hear). The fact was so notorious, that all petitions which had been sent in favour of the bill, spoke of the Catholic Association alone. Away, then, with the miserable quibble about the extent of the measure. Let not the house shelter itself, in resisting the prayer of the petitioners, under the dishonest pretext that the Catholic Association was not the exclusive object of the bill. Their lordships had heard of Orange societies which might be affected by the measure, and a petition had been read from certain parties who claimed that title; but did they complain of the bill? No; they knew that it was not directed against them; and, therefore, they did not endeavour to arrest its progress. They only prayed that they might have an opportunity of rectifying certain errors, or repelling certain calumnies, to which its introduction had given rise, before the committee (hear, hear). Taking, then, the Catholic Association as the undoubted object of the bill, he would ask, on what ground it was enacted? The Speech from the Throne, and the speeches afterwards delivered in its support, alleged the most grievous charges. It was said that the Association had erected itself into a Catholic parliament—that it had usurped the power of the legislature in levying taxes—that it interfered with the administration of justice—that it had become a source of alarm and danger, and therefore must be put down by this bill. He would ask what stronger charges could be made against any body of men? Ought the petitioners to be heard against such charges, or could the house justly proceed to legislate on the supposition of their truth, when the petitioners offered to prove that they were unfounded? But the noble earl said that he went on the notoriety of the facts, and that if any fact which was alleged was denied, he would admit the denial without hearing evidence of the truth. What said the petitioners? They met those facts with a denial. They said, "Your opinions are erroneous—your charges are false; give us an opportunity, and we will prove it." His noble friend had truly said that the most trifling right of common could not be taken away without hearing the party affected: and were the whole people of Ireland to be mulcted of their privileges; were a whole religious community to be punished, and, through them, the general liberties of the empire curtailed, without allowing them to come forward to explain and justify their conduct, to support their rights, to defend their characters, to remove error, and to repel calumny (hear, hear)? It had been said in the King's Speech, that "the Association had adopted proceedings irreconcilable with the spirit of the constitution, and calculated, by exciting alarm and exasperating animosities, to endanger the peace of society, and retard the course of national improvement." These were grave charges, and ought not to be believed without strong evidence. The petitioners offered to disprove them. They declared that their measures, so far from exciting alarm, had been the cause of tranquillity and confidence. They declared that they had been so far from exasperating animosities, that the country was never so quiet as since the commencement of the Association. In answer to the charge of checking improvement and retarding prosperity, they appealed to facts; to the embarking of new enterprise, and the employment of fresh capital in Ireland; and they even claimed support in this appeal from a most important declaration in the Speech in which the charge against them was made (hear, hear). They had been subsequently accused on other grounds, to which they offered the same triumphant contradiction. It had been said, that they levied taxes on the people of Ireland. Their answer was, "We levy no taxes—we only receive voluntary contributions, which we expend on public and laudable objects, and which are so far from being exacted by force, that they are the best test of the good-will and confidence of those friends who supply them" (hear, hear). But it was said that there were two books kept, a black and a red book—that the names of contributors were inserted in the one, and of those who refused to contribute in the other—that neither peace nor security could be enjoyed by the latter, and that though no legal force could be used, these taxes were any thing but voluntary. The petitioners gave a direct contradiction to this charge, and offered to prove its falsehood at the bar of the house. Since such was the calumny with which they were assailed, and such the bill founded on that calumny, had they not a right to disprove the calumny, that they might ward off the intended punishment? "But," said the noble earl, "there was no necessity for hearing the petitioners at the bar, as the house had already appointed a committee to enquire into Irish affairs. Let Mr. O'Connell present himself there, and he would be sure of a hearing." This was the most extraordinary recommendation he had ever heard. The bill, of which the petitioners complained, would have passed before they could enter that committee. The noble earl had said, that when ministers had proposed any general measure of restriction—such as some of those disgraceful bills suspending or curtailing public liberty, of which we had of late too many instances—they had presented papers to committees, and on the report of those committees the bills were introduced. But did any body ever hear of the restrictive bill first, and of the inquiry afterwards? The noble earl proposed to invert this order. The committee on Irish affairs was now sitting. The petitioners were referred to it, and he would advise them to accept the proposal, provided the noble earl would suspend the progress of the bill till the committee made its report (hear, hear). Let the petitioners be allowed to go before that committee—and to be there heard, before this bill was read a second time, and he would admit that there would be a show of justice in the noble earl's proposition. But to pass this bill, and then hear the petitioners against it—to punish first, and to try afterwards—to decide on a question, and then receive the evidence on which the judgment ought to be formed, was such a preposterous course, that he could scarcely express his surprise at the proposition (hear, hear). Suppose that the petitioners should succeed in proving before the committee, that all the allegations on which the bill was founded were false; and suppose in the meantime the bill had passed on the avowment of their truth; in what a situation would the house be placed! They would have passed a law, imposing restrictions on the rights and liberties of a great body of the people, and they would find that it was as unnecessary as it was obnoxious. As to the argument, that no particular individuals had a right to be heard against a general measure, it did not apply to the case. The rights of the petitioners were affected, and the justice of their demand to be heard was not lessened by the extension of the evil to others. As to the possible inconvenience of hearing parties in certain urgent cases, such cases would bring their excuse with them. Here there was no such urgency. The petitioners pledged themselves to disprove the allegations on which not only their own rights were curtailed, but popular rights invaded, which had remained untouched since the Revolution. He was satisfied that there never was a case in which they were called upon by so many powerful considerations to listen to the prayer of the petitioners, and therefore he would vote for the motion (hear, hear).

The Lord Chancellor began by stating, that a report had gone abroad that this bill was his, and he had been appealed to respecting its provisions. Now, though it had his most perfect concurrence, he was not the author of it; and although he had for some time been acquainted with its nature and objects, he had not even seen it till about eight hours ago. The Convention Act, of which this bill was an extension, was still in force in Ireland. What might be the law in Ireland with respect to the enforcement of that act, or any other act, he did not pretend to know, and therefore he could not state whether the proceedings of the Association were legal or not; but, according to the law of England, he thought the Convention Act would have reached them. When a society, committee, association, or other body, which represented, or assumed to represent, the people, under pretence of petitioning for an alteration of the law in church or state, was illegal, because it had been elected or constituted by the people so to represent them, he conceived it would be equally illegal if it pretended so to represent them, and performed in their name any acts, for which they subsequently received, or professed to receive, the sanction of their approbation. The evil to the community would be the same; and the evasion of the law, by avoiding direct delegation, would not be allowed. There had been a good deal said as to the parties which this bill was intended to affect. If the sole object had been to put down the Catholic Association, he would have wished the name of the Association to have been inserted in the bill (hear, hear). When upon a well-known occasion he had introduced a bill into the House of Commons, for putting down the Corresponding Societies, he introduced the names of those societies. This bill enacted, that every society in Ireland, corresponding with the description in the bill, should be deemed illegal, though not previously delegated or elected. Now if the Association had assumed a representative character, and had gone the length of taxing the King's subjects; if they had instituted a control over the administration of justice—it could not be endured that such a body should exist. Commanding subscriptions as they boasted, from six millions of people, where was the possibility of executing the laws or maintaining submission to authority? If the Catholics could form such an association, why not the Protestants? And if both were thus arrayed in parties, whence could jurors and witnesses be drawn, who would not all be liable to a challenge? With regard to hearing the petitioners at the bar, he must observe that the bill was a general one, and the rule in such a case was against the terms of the motion. Even in the case of excluding the goose from the common, a party could not be heard unless he made out a special interest. No man or body of men could be heard against the proposed enactment of a general law. There might be exceptions, but this was the rule: and Parliament might act on the exception or the rule. Cases might be put of a law passing both houses in one day, and that law affecting individuals; but the urgency must excuse the breach of principle. In some cases the danger might be so imminent, that if common forms were observed, the law might pass too late to meet it. The general rule applied to the present bill. The measure affected the Association by containing a right description of its constitution and objects. No evidence which the petitioners could offer should be allowed to delay the enactment. If it did not affect them when enacted, they would suffer no grievance, and therefore ought not to be allowed to oppose a general act which did not concern them. If it stopped them, they were doing what they ought not to do. If they were by the mere absence of direct delegation evading the provisions of the Convention Act, while they supported the character of a Convention, the present bill would supply the remedy (hear, hear).

Lord Holland said that he had no sooner read the bill than he recognized it not to be the work of the noble earl on the woolsack. He would go further, and say, not only that it was not the noble earl's, but that he was persuaded the noble earl had never read it (a laugh). Nobody denied that, to usurp the powers or overrule the authority of Parliament, was illegal. But had the Association done this? If the petitioners were heard, they would show that they had not controlled or overruled Parliament. They would show that the money they levied was employed for laudable purposes. Whatever might be the case in England, in Ireland the universal practice had been in favour of the prayer of the petitioners. But, independent of all these precedents, the great principle on which he should give his vote for hearing the petitioners at the bar was that of substantial justice, mixed with a generous consideration towards their peculiar situation. He was astonished at the noble earl, when he asserted that this bill was not directed against the Catholic Association—he was astonished at the assertion, for he confessed he had a great private friendship for him, and did not suspect him of resorting to a subterfuge or equivocation for any passing purpose of debate; nevertheless, it was impossible not to see that this bill was levelled at the Association. "Oh," said the noble earl, "why hear the Catholics? God bless me, they are not even named in its inhibition; this is a general bill—a measure not against any particular class, but intended for the general good of mankind." This was to quibble with a great question. They were called on to pass this bill on notoriety—newspaper notoriety. Ought not the Catholics to have the same benefit of notoriety in their favour, that was urged by their enemies against them? And was it not notorious that this bill was solely meant to affect the Catholic Association? To be sure, if the petition were complied with, they would have to deal with tangible evidence, with the speeches of advocates, of learned and eloquent men capable of exposing sophistry and detecting truth at their bar; and if this inconvenience could be avoided by the omission of a name, a most convenient way was discovered of sweeping away the rights of the people. He conjured the house to bear in mind, that no documents had been produced in support of the bill—no grounds laid for it, better than loose, interested report, controverted by the parties who best knew the truth, and who offered it to the test of rigid inquiry at their bar. He had a high opinion of the eloquence and talents of the learned gent. at the head of the Association, and he believed there were those who felt, that if that gentleman were admitted to their bar, he might possibly make some impression upon their lordships, fatal to the progress of this bill. At all events, if he were heard, it would give the unfortunate objects of the bill the consolation of knowing that their case had, at least, been argued. Sure he was that if that learned gent. had the eloquence which once shook Greece to its centre—if, instead of being what he believed him to be, the honest advocate for the stability of the two countries, he united the intentions of Catiline to the eloquence of the ancient orator—that he would be incapable with such combined powers of mischief to do half the injury that their lordships would do, by rejecting his claim to be heard (hear, hear). He appealed to human nature in support of his argument. Which did the most harm—the language uttered, or the grievance felt (hear, hear)? Let them remember that the great Franklin had rejoiced on being sent from their bar, unheard and insulted. If they really meant to confute and silence the detractors of Government, let them in the first place be just—if they wished to compose and allay the jarrings of party animosities, let them be conciliatory, indulgent, and generous; but above all, let them not on the faith of miserable precedents, ill quoted and worse understood, overthrow that great first principle of reason and justice—to hear before they condemned (hear, hear, hear).

Earl Darnley implored the house to pause before they decided upon sending unheard from their bar those who came to them as supplicants for justice against oppression, on the part of a large body of their suffering fellow countrymen. He hoped the house would open its eyes to the best means of securing the real strength of the empire.

The house then divided,

For the motion 23—Against it 69—Majority against the petition, 46.

The Earl of Liverpool, in moving the second reading of the Unlawful Societies bill, distinguished the present question from that of Catholic Emancipation. The bill before the house rested on grounds so distinct and different, that he sincerely declared, if he were the warmest friend of Emancipation, he should still say that this bill was necessary. In a preceding debate a noble earl (Grey) had accused him of not taking a manly course on the present occasion, inasmuch as he had not avowed that the bill was directed solely against the Association, but had argued it as a general bill. Now he had uniformly avowed that the Catholic Association was the principal object of the bill; but he said now, as he had said before, that though a specific evil might be the cause of a particular measure, yet, when that measure comprehended other objects, it ought to be differently considered as to its principle from a measure of single operation, and with a single object. There were strong reasons when they were to legislate against the Association, that they ought also to include all other societies having an illegal tendency—for instance, Orange Societies, and such, under whatever denomination, as were calculated to disturb the peace of Ireland. In that view he submitted this bill; he did not deny that the prominent object of the bill was directed against the Catholic Association, but it was coupled with a sweeping operation, which equally denounced all other bodies, acting upon a similar principle. The question, then, was to be taken in two ways: first, as to the evasion of the Convention Act; and next, as to its own merits, namely, the danger of the Catholic Association. In arguing this part of the question, he was ready to admit, that if the Association were in itself no evil, it would be impolitic to extend against them the provisions of the Convention Act. Without at all desiring to speak harshly of the Association, he had always thought that such institutions, in a country like Ireland, were utterly inconsistent with public tranquillity. He denied that the suppression of such societies was inconsistent with the free constitution of the kingdom. He admitted as broadly as any man, the right of the people to assemble for the purposes of appealing to the legislature for a redress of grievances, and of meeting and stating their opinions with a view of securing for their petitions a reasonable effect upon the minds of the constituted authorities to whom they were addressed. These were among the most sacred privileges of the subjects of the British empire. But he asserted that an assembly, not meeting for the purpose of petitioning—an assembly whose sittings were permanent—which met for the redress of unspecified grievances—which levied taxes, voluntarily or compulsory, it did not matter which—which interfered with the due administration of justice, whether beneficially or not he would not say—was inconsistent, not alone with the peace of Ireland, but of any other country in the world. It was impossible not to look at the circumstances under which this Association had been formed. The people of Ireland might think they laboured under grievances for which they were justified in seeking redress from the legislature. They might be dissatisfied with the remaining exclusions by which they were affected—and they might justly state their case to Parliament, where alone redress could constitutionally be sought. But could any man deny that more had been done for promoting the happiness of that country within a short space of time, than had been done by preceding Governments, for centuries before (hear, hear)? The revenue system had been completely reformed, to the entire satisfaction of those who were loudest in their complaints against it. Taxation had been reduced in Ireland to an unparalleled degree—her direct taxes were swept away, and she paid fewer imposts than almost any other country in Europe, while England had taken upon herself the whole of the debt. The administration of justice had been revised,—the magistracy had been reformed, and petty sessions established, every disposition had been shown to suppress those societies which had a tendency to produce civil dissensions. He stated those facts as a proof of the kind disposition of Government towards Ireland, and to show that no glaring evil existed, which required the establishment of a perpetual organ, like the Catholic Association. Yet, in this state of things, that body had been organized, and assumed a greater influence than had been exercised by the Catholic Convention, avoiding the letter of the law enacted for the suppression of the latter, but preserving virtually and fully, the evil of delegation, against which that law was directed (hear, hear). Their intent was proved by their acts, and the evasion of the law would be complete, if the legislature did not interpose its authority. In arguing this question, he meant to avoid any discussion of the particular proceedings of the Association. He believed it to be constituted in the same way as any other body of the sort would naturally be. Such assemblies were generally composed of various materials. Many well-disposed men were usually to be found among them, and the great majority never paused to contemplate the evils to which their proceedings led. His objection therefore to the Association was a general one; it was, that no such body could exist without producing evil. He agreed that it would be often unfair to analyse parts of the proceedings of such societies; for some evil they must necessarily produce. Some noble lords might think this society a good instrument for effecting a particular purpose—the best way, for instance, of promoting Catholic Emancipation; but he would ask those noble lords, if they thought a body like this would stop with any specific question: the Association had set no limits to its sphere of operation. On the contrary, they had heard, —he knew not on what authority, although the statement had certainly gone forth—that some communication had been made to them, that if the Catholic question would satisfy them, they should be satisfied, if it would separate. They replied that Emancipation would not satisfy them. From this it would appear that there was to be no end to their proceedings; and that if their professed aim were accomplished, their existence might still be prolonged for ulterior and unknown objects. He said this without reference to individuals: the nature of the evil was in the constitution of the assembly itself; and consequences must ensue, which no government could or ought to tolerate. He defied any noble lord to prove that such a body was ever permitted in a regular government. He would pass over the details of their discussions and debates, and come to the material feature of their system—the Catholic rent. The very name, its essence, nature, and definition, implied an obligation, and he could hardly think that no expressive name had been hit upon accidentally. But call it rent, or subscription, or what they would, it was any thing but a voluntary contribution. Though there existed no legal right to enforce it, yet where the country was cast into factions, and the appeal made to their sincerity, their zeal, or their passions, it was a farce to call it any thing short of compulsion. Who were the instruments for carrying the collection into effect? It was collected by the Catholic clergy, in the Catholic chapels. Who, then, who knew the connexion between the Catholic priest and his flock, could doubt what this subscription was? He had even heard of an instance where a peasant had been distrained upon for non-payment of this rent; but the quarter sessions had interposed, and protected him from the exaction. He did not press this subject for more than it was fairly worth in his argument, nor did he wish to touch upon the attendant circumstances, the registration, whether in black or red books; for, in such cases, where the whole population were to pay, each man knew how far his neighbour had contributed, and each was a check upon the other, without any extensive machinery of account keeping. Some paid this money for religion—others for policy; and he believed that nine out of every ten subscribers paid to avoid being looked upon with an evil eye by their neighbours. He appealed to every man's good sense, of whatever party, whether such must not be the case from the very nature of things? But what were the objects of this Association, permanent as it is, with revenue at its disposal, and avowedly interfering in the administration of justice? What an engine was it likely to become! Take the millions of population said to be under their control, and then let them estimate the danger. He remembered a saying full of wisdom which he had heard from Mr. Fox, on some question relative to the Dissenters. "I hate," said that eminent individual, "the tyranny of the few over the many; but there is one thing which I abhor still more, the tyranny of the many over the few." He applied this wise saying to the present case, and asserted that the more formidable the body, the more intolerable its existence was capable of becoming in the State. He now came to two arguments which had been used in the course of these discussions—first, it was said this Association had done no harm; and secondly, it was declared to have done good. As to the first, he would appeal to those who lived in Ireland to say, how exasperating the effect of this Association had been upon party spirit throughout the country, and how it had generated factious feelings of all kinds: with respect to the second argument—its doing good by promoting, as had been asserted, the tranquillity of the country—he should not, if it had done so, be the less disposed to denounce it on that account. If a body of this description had the power of promoting tranquillity, it must equally be capable of producing disturbance; and in either case he did not choose that the peace and tranquillity of the state should rest upon the prudence, discretion, or temper of any such body. Again he begged to observe that he did not accuse this Association, or any of the particular individuals who composed it, of bad intentions; but if he could have supposed that there were amongst them any who meditated mischief, he should give them no credit for the avowal of their peaceable intentions. The first object of those who meditated rebellion was to preach up peace and tranquillity! Nothing was so fatal to insurrection as a premature rising. Conspirators had a deeper interest in promoting peace than any other individuals. He referred to the history of Ireland in the year 1798. The principal men who were engaged in the rebellion of that year, were, up to the moment of the explosion, preaching peace to their fellow-countrymen. The rebels attributed their defeat to the premature violence which had roused them into action before their time; and a member of the Irish House of Commons had taken credit for himself and his party in having produced the insurrection before it was ripe. It was, therefore, by no means reasonable to conclude, that men's intentions should be taken exactly in the manner in which they chose to put them forth. As to the present state of Ireland, it was owing in some degree to the measures of its Government; not at all to the Association, and chiefly to the returning prosperity of the empire. In England, two or three years ago, temporary distress had led to petitions and meetings; reform was called for in our institutions—reform in Parliament—reform in financial policy. All this vanished at the return of prosperity, which engaged the industry of the country in the pursuits of commerce and agriculture, and put an end to those gloomy speculations. In Ireland there was a powerful check to her growing prosperity, in the habitual vice of idleness which afflicted the people. The industry of the country, aided by its capital, would urge them forward to something better. In the meantime they must be alone—their minds must not be influenced by the discussion of these angry questions. He owned that there was difficulty in legislating upon this point. He was not sure that this bill would prove a sufficient remedy, but he thought it not unlikely that it would. In 1796, a noble and learned friend of his had brought in a bill to prevent seditious meetings. It was then averred that the bill would be evaded, and he himself had been led, by a very ingenious speech which he had heard in the other house from Mr. Sheridan, to believe that it would be. It was, however, perfectly effectual. The same argument had been applied, followed by the same consequences, to one of the Six Acts. He could not persuade himself that this bill would be defeated in Ireland, after Parliament had solemnly pronounced its opinion upon the law, and give the whole weight which the expression of that opinion could inspire, to the law itself. But if it were likely to prove ineffectual, he would still advise the house to adopt it; for if nothing were done, other parties would form counter-associations. They could not say to the Catholics—"You may associate;" and to the Protestants—"You must not;"—they could not allow the Catholics to combine, and forbid it to the Protestants. Let them not suppose that the Protestants, though fewer, were so contemptible in numbers, wealth, and power, as not to constitute a formidable society. In what a state then would that country be, when arrayed in two great hostile parties! Let them at least have it to say that they had done their best to secure the tranquillity of Ireland. His noble and learned friend (the Lord Chancellor) had wished that the Association had been expressly named in the bill. After mature consideration he had come to an opposite conclusion. It was omitted to show that Parliament intended to deal equally, by putting down all such associations.

Lord King complained that the cases upon which Administration had depended in the other house, were not adduced by the noble Earl. He supposed it was apprehended, that like the case of Ballybay, they would have been blown into the air. Such was the state of law in Ireland, that in 1823 there were 497 persons committed under the Insurrection Act in Tipperary, and of them, even Irish justice acquitted 417. Throughout all Ireland there were 1700 and upwards committed under the same act in that year, and upwards of 1400 were acquitted. The noble earl had quoted the words of Mr. Fox, to show his dread of the tyranny of the many over the few. The house knew how to apply this to the state of parties in Ireland. As well might the wolves affect a dread of being devoured by the sheep, as the noble lord affect any dread of that sort on the side of the Orangemen against the Catholics. The question of the Catholic claims in that house had assumed the complexion of a suit in Chancery. There had been endless disappointment—the expense had generally swallowed up the estate in the one court, as delay had nearly destroyed the patience of the suitors in the other. The issue of both would be analogous, in the entire destruction of the estate.

Earl Grosvenor wished that this bill had been postponed till some measure of conciliation had been put in progress. He had good reason to believe, that if that course had been taken, the Association itself would not have objected to this bill. He urged the weight of the opinions repeatedly given by Lord Wellesley, though held back by Administration, to show that concession and conciliation should precede this measure of coercion. He exhorted the house to consider well the danger of endeavouring to put what had been called an extinguisher on the claims advanced by the Association. Whether the Association were legal or not, their conduct, and that of the Catholic body, proved against all the arguments to the contrary, that they were capable of using the advantages of representation in a wholesome and constitutional manner. The noble earl opposite was alarmed at the collection of the rent, and showed an instance to prove that it was nominally voluntary, and not really so. He had been given to understand since, that no such process had ever issued as that mentioned by the noble earl. As to the mode of collection, he could speak to instances of subscriptions in Protestant churches, where something very like a red and black book existed; where men had subscribed voluntarily, for fear of being marked men. Still there was no proof of the illegality of the practice in either case. He could not see any reason why the Association should be viewed with alarm. Its proceedings were open. Every facility was given to reporters attending it, so much so that it was upon the evidence of a reporter, that the Attorney-General for Ireland attempted to get up a case against Mr. O'Connell. Was that gentleman, he would ask, convicted, or even brought to trial for the language he used? No such thing—the bill against him was ignored even upon the evidence tendered by the Attorney-General. This was decisive proof that there was nothing faulty in the conduct of the Association. As no fault could be found with its actions, its opponents looked to its words; and they pounced upon "hate to Orangemen," with the utmost exultation. He fully agreed with a noble lord, that the words in question meant little more than, "by your hatred to persecution;" and if so, nothing could be more harmless. He was happy to see that notwithstanding the efforts which had been made to excite the prejudices of the people against Catholic Emancipation, they had been attended with imperfect success: they had dwindled into insignificance, when compared with their violence some years ago. At that time, every nook and corner of our streets bore the mark of

"No Popery," and, unfortunately for the cause of religion, the feeling of the people went along with that infuriated cry. At present the same hand-writing was on the wall, but the people cared little or nothing about it. Day and Martin, Dr. Eady, and Hunt, with his roasted corn and matchless blacking, beat it fairly from the field (a laugh). For his own part, he verily believed, that if their lordships were to grant Emancipation to the Catholics, it would either make no impression on the country, or be received as a great blessing (hear, hear). He could not speak with patience of the conduct of ministers on that question. That portion of them which wielded the lightning and guided the thunder of the state, which directed its energies and commanded its bayonets—was anti-Catholic (hear, hear). It was not enough, however, for the Cabinet to differ from itself, it differed also from its royal master, and placed him in a most distressing situation. As King of Hanover, he was all conciliation; as King of Ireland, he was all coercion. To the Catholics of Hanover, he said "aye," to the Catholics of Ireland, he said "no," upon the very same subject (hear, hear). It was true that his Majesty might dismiss such advisers. A breath could unmake as easily as it had made them. He was sure that the question of Emancipation might be carried with ease by any ministry that would act upon it with sincerity and open-heartedness. That event would call forth the shout of Io triumpho and Io Pæan, in every direction, and would unite our Catholic brethren to our side, in the strongest bonds of amity and affection. Capital would then flow from every side into that country, which had been so long blest by the bounty of Heaven, and cursed by the misgovernment of man. The general feeling would be

"Nunc est bibendum, nunc pede libero Pulsanda tellus" (a laugh).

The noble lord might smile, but the people of Ireland, though they drank deeply now, would fill their bumpers still higher than before, in honour of so glorious a consummation. He concluded by declaring his intention of voting against this bill.

The Earl of Gosford opposed the bill. He conjured the house to consider the situation in which Ireland would be placed by it. There was not a petty attorney in that country who would not torture this bill to suit his own views and purposes. The remedy was worse than the disease. He was convinced that the only way to confer a real benefit on Ireland was to grant Emancipation.

The Duke of Sussex: In rising to address the house upon a subject of such deep interest, and which had already excited so much discussion, he felt it necessary to treat their lordships' indulgence, and if, in the course of his address, he should make use of any warm expression, he trusted that noble lords would attribute it, not to any wish to offend, nor even to any indifference to the subject, but merely to the warmth which unavoidably attended a discussion of this nature. It was always with great diffidence that he had risen to express his thorough opposition to the measures pursued by his Majesty's Government with respect to the Roman Catholics of Ireland; but, in opposing the measure now before the house, he was actuated by a conviction that he was doing his duty by his country, and he had ever considered the best performance of that duty to be a support of the liberties of the subject. He opposed the bill before the house, because he thought that no ground whatever had been shown for the necessity, or even prudence, of passing such a measure. Upon former debates upon subjects of this nature, they had asked on that side of the house for information, which had constantly been denied them. The Speech from the Throne had said, that measures were to take place different from all antecedent proceedings; but no mention did that speech make of any documents upon which those measures were to be founded. From the delivery of that speech to the present instant, the only reason that had been given for this measure was, what was termed notoriety; but he begged their lordships to consider what notoriety, in such a case, really meant. Notoriety, in his opinion, was something or nothing. We were told that on the right and left they might hear this report and that report; but such idle rumours and mere hearsay evidence would not be admitted for an instant in any court of justice, however contemptible its functions or irregular its practice. Ought, then, such evidence to be admitted when the liberties of a country were concerned, and in matters of such paramount importance (hear, hear)? The noble lord opposite had fully illustrated what he had now said, for he mentioned that he had been told by some authority, that if Emancipation were granted to the Catholics, it was a matter of considerable doubt whether the Association would accede to the measure, or feel satisfied; but he asked their lordships whether it was not derogating from the dignity and character of the house to receive, much less to be influenced by such hearsay evidence? He maintained, that if the Catholic Association were to be put down by the arm of authority—if it were to be suppressed by harsh and coercive measures, they were bound, by every possible tie, to hear the evidence in support of the accusations which were made against them, and which were urged as the grounds of their suppression. He agreed with a noble lord who had preceded him, that the easiest way of putting down this Association would be by granting the object for which it petitioned. The noble earl (Liverpool) might smile again, if he pleased, at that declaration; but in uttering it, he spoke the conviction of his mind, founded upon the experience of history, which showed that complaint always ceased as soon as grievance was redressed (hear, hear). He had heard with regret the observation of a noble earl, that this Association, though it had done much good, might have done much harm. He would advise the noble earl to look to facts rather than to probabilities. The noble earl had endeavoured to illustrate his argument by saying, that a candle was very useful in its way, but was very dangerous when placed too near a muslin curtain. He allowed it to be so, but he would not on that account extinguish the candle and leave the room in utter darkness. The noble earl, in arguing the propriety of this measure, had touched lightly on the Catholic question. Now, he believed that the propriety of this measure could not be properly discussed without entering at some length into that question, which was closely connected with it. Since the year 1778, great privileges had been granted to the Catholics; and he believed that these grants, so far from inflicting any harm, had conferred great benefit on the country. He had bestowed much pains upon the consideration of that question, and he was convinced from the various debates which had taken place upon it, that it had been the intention of the legislature to throw open the door of the constitution to all classes of his Majesty's subjects, as soon as it could be done without difficulty and danger. He was convinced that the sooner the Catholics were admitted within the pale of the constitution, the better would it be for the tranquillity and stability of the empire. He made that statement from a recollection of the grateful manner in which former concessions had been received by the Catholics of Ireland. As soon as the first concessions were made, in 1778, Ireland furnished us with eighty thousand seamen, and so enabled us to recover our superiority on the ocean, from which we had been driven to the shelter and confinement of our ports. When he recollected that circumstance—when he looked to the immense force which we now kept up in Ireland—when he considered that measures of conciliation would tranquillize Ireland, and so enable them to dispense with that force altogether, or to employ it in some other portion of the empire—when he reflected that economy was the order of the day, and that the people had a right to expect some further reduction of the taxation which the war had entailed upon them, he could see many reasons why the house should emancipate the Catholics, and not one reason to the contrary. He was prepared to contend, that the laws which had deprived the Catholics of the political privileges which belonged to their Protestant fellow-subjects were introduced for very wise political reasons. The Pope was at that time possessed of considerable power. There was a Catholic sovereign in existence who had been very properly driven from the throne on account of his arbitrary notions. That sovereign, on retiring to Ireland, had obtained support from the Catholics of that country—a circumstance which naturally excited great jealousy in the minds of the people of England. The penal laws against the Catholics were therefore dictated by the paramount necessity of securing the liberty of the country by placing a succession of Protestants on the throne. The danger, however, which had led to the enactment of those laws had now disappeared, and the laws ought to disappear with it. There was now no Popish aspirant to the throne. The political consequence of the Pope was gone; and, in spite of what was now doing on the continent, would never again attain sufficient strength to become formidable. He recollected the noble earl opposite saying, during the war, "We must not grant Emancipation now, because the Pope is in the clutches of Napoleon, and may be compelled to use his influence against our interests." He had laughed at the argument at that time as unworthy serious consideration; and he must now laugh at the argument which had succeeded it, because, though dissimilar in its nature, it was equally ridiculous in its consequence. The noble earl now said, "We must be afraid of the Pope now, because the sovereigns who form the Holy Alliance have restored him to his dominions, and given him back a portion of his former power." He would allow that those sovereigns had recently paid much court to his Holiness; but he now stated what he had stated before, that they did it not so much for the sake of the Pope, as for the sake of securing their own power by his influence. The first moment that they chose, they could crush into nothing the idol they had just created. His opinion was, that if the restrictions which now pressed heavily on the Catholics were taken off, we should be able to bid defiance to a world in arms, and to take care of our own liberties—a circumstance which we ought not to treat with indifference, since he believed, upon his honour, that if we did not take care of them for ourselves, nobody would take care of them for us. He should watch over this bill in all its future stages, and give it his most strenuous opposition, if on no other account, at least to show the good will he bore to Catholic Emancipation (hear, hear).

Lord Kingston wished to make one observation on a case which had been alluded to by a noble earl. He had been on the bench at Fermoy, when the man came to swear that his sheep had been taken under a distress for the non-payment of the Catholic rent. Inquiry was instantly made into the complaint, and it was found that the sheep had been distrained, not for any Catholic rent, but were found trespassing in a turnip-field of one of the man's neighbours (hear, hear).

The Marquis of Lansdown complained, that after ministers had refused to give them any information on the extent of the evil which they sought to put down by this bill, and after their lordships had determined to reject the evidence tendered at their bar to prove the non-existence of that evil, they were called upon to give it their sanction upon a solitary fact, which had no sooner been stated than it had met with a positive contradiction (hear, hear). Before, however, he proceeded to discuss the details of this bill he should beg leave shortly to allude to the topics with which the noble earl had prefaced his motion. The noble earl had called the attention of their lordships to the great improvement which ministers had effected in the condition of Ireland. That improvement came rather late. Tax had been imposed after tax, upon that devoted country, until it was found that the tripled and quadrupled tax produced less than the original one (hear, hear). After they had achieved that discovery, ministers determined to repeal some portion of the taxes; and to see whether the revenue could not be increased by doing a simple act of justice, and they now claimed the merit of virtue for an act of necessity. With respect to the improvement in the administration of justice, he was sorry to state that he was more confident than ever he had been of its imperfect and partial condition. The proofs were now, or would very shortly be, before the public; and they were such as, while they called aloud for a remedy of the evil, admitted of no contradiction. With this conviction, then, he would never endure to hear it said that the adoption of any better system was an indulgence to the people of Ireland, or that it was any thing but an act of justice which had already been too long delayed. He now came to the particular measure before the house. He did not deny that the circumstances of Ireland were such as required great vigilance on the part of the government. No reflecting man could contemplate those circumstances without anxiety. When he saw the extraordinary, but not by him unlooked-for appearance which the country now exhibited, it was impossible not to apprehend that a rivalry, or, perhaps, he might rather be justified in saying, a conflict would arise between the power of the government and that power which had grown out of the actual circumstances of Ireland, which might lead to consequences full of danger. For this state of things he confessed that some prompt and vigorous remedy was necessary. But while he admitted this, he was bound to look, with no less caution, that the remedy proposed was sufficient. But the noble Earl (Liverpool) said, if even it should be shown that this measure was insufficient, still he would propose it; because, though it should prove ineffectual in putting down the Association, it would show that the effects of government were equally ineffectual in attempting to put down their enemies. This was in effect the argument of the noble earl. But did he think that it would be likely, among its other effects, to increase the respect of the people for the measures of parliament, because it taught them that they need not obey unless they should be disposed—that the power of the parliament was insufficient to compass its ends—that the law might be evaded, and treated with indifference, if not with contempt? Surely this proof that the government was

would have no other effect than that of alienating the minds of the people. But what was it that the present measure proposed to do, as against the Catholics? He did not find that there was any intention (and God forbid there should be!) to put down the meetings of the Catholics. Among other clauses in the bill he perceived an elaborate provision that any society which should continue to meet after the period mentioned, should incur—what penalty did their lordships think? Why, that such refractory society should not have the power of adjournment. A provision like this was worse than ineffectual, because it threw an air of ridicule over its own avowed weakness. He professed a great and sincere respect for the order and form of the proceedings of that house; but he apprehended, that if assemblies should continue to be held after the passing of this bill, the provision he had alluded to would hardly have any effect in checking them. He would next advert to the rent, with respect to which so much had been said. He was free to confess that he thought the name ill chosen and objectionable. But he asked their lordships whether it became them to pass such a bill as was now before them, on account of an improper phrase. If any authority had been exercised, if any attempt in the nature of a distress had been made to enforce the payment of that rent, then, indeed, something like a case would have been made out by those who supported the measure. But he had also to complain that on this subject there was something like special pleading in the terms of the bill. The words used were “levy and receive.” These two words, the meaning of which were wholly different, were coupled together, if not with an insidious intent, at least so as to produce an unfair effect. To levy money in any way but by the authority of parliament was unquestionably illegal; but this the Association had not done, and had not attempted to do. To prevent money from being received, while one party was willing to pay and the other to receive, was beyond the authority of parliament. He would ask, whether by any stretch of ingenuity, by any species of inquisition more searching and more rigorous than had been invented in the most Catholic country in the world, an accurate account could be extorted of every shilling that had been received, from whom it had been received, and to what purposes it had been applied from the Catholic laity? Yet without it, the clause could not be carried into effect. He would not detain their lordships by going into a consideration of the various means by which the provisions of the bill before them could be evaded. It was enough that they could be evaded. The bill, to be effectual, must take away from the Catholics the disposition or the power to do as they had hitherto done. The evil was deeply and firmly fixed; its root was in the state of society in Ireland. Every body knew that whole nations and communities might be held under an arbitrary domination—that the influence of power might wither and extinguish all the feelings and desires which tended to exalt and improve human nature; that men might be held in a state of servitude, and even reconciled to the loss of all their civil rights and privileges. This might be done—this had been done; but what arbitrary power could not do was, to keep a nation—and the Catholics of Ireland might, with reference to their numbers, be called a nation—in a state of deprivation of their natural rights, while they were intermixed with another people who were in the full enjoyment of civil liberty. All the ingenuity of the most learned lawyers—all the penal statutes which might be heaped upon the table of the house, could not shut the door against the influence of such freedom, could not intercept the feelings which must arise from the interchange of sentiments, the communication of wealth between the nation in thralldom and the nation which was free. If they still resolved to withhold from the Catholics the light and warmth of the sun of the constitution, they must not be surprised that they should seek illumination from those wandering lights, which fitfully and partially irradiated the political atmosphere, and glittered only to betray (hear, hear, hear). Let their lordships think to what manner of nation it was that they were asked to apply this rigorous restriction. It was a nation which he hardly felt himself able to describe, and to which he should therefore apply the words of a writer who was not less famed for the force and beauty of his prose than for the inimitable excellence of his poetry. Milton, in speaking of the English nation, and addressing its rulers, said, “Lords and Commons of England! Consider what nation it is whereof ye are the governors: a nation not slow and dull, but of a quick, ingenious, and piercing spirit; acute to invent, subtle and sinewy to discourse, not beneath the reach of any point the highest that human capacity can soar to.” Such a nation was Ireland. He besought the house to remember, that over this nation was exerted that tremendous engine of modern times—the press; a power which, like that of electricity, roused the latent fire which existed in every part of the national economy, and woke every sympathy of human nature to the keen enjoyment of the advantages which existed for the universal good of society.

The people of Ireland were invited to participate in the advantages of the extensive commerce which was one of the chief distinctions of England amongst the other nations of the world, and in all the hopes of higher and more noble things to which that commerce gave birth: they were invited to enter the army and the navy, and they were taught to imbibe a love of honour, and to seek for its reward: they were invited to become the possessors of landed property—one day he should take occasion to show the house to what extent they had accepted this invitation—and, consequently, to encourage a wish to cultivate those honourable relations, and to obtain that distinction to which the possession of landed property naturally led them to look, and which would alone enable them to make to their country a fitting return for those honours. After these feelings had been excited, after those hopes had been encouraged, did their lordships think that by penal acts of Parliament they could stifle the discontent which disappointment had engendered, or cure the sickness which was the consequence of those hopes delayed? It was not by making, but by repealing penal statutes, that they could hope to effect such a purpose. Such instruments were wholly unequal and unfitted for the purpose.

— “The elements
Of which your swords are temper'd, may as well Wound the loud winds, or, with be-mocked-at stabs, Kill the still closing waters” (cheers).

They must remove the necessity for such meetings as that against which the bill was levelled,—that alone would extinguish the mischief, and for ever annihilate the necessity of attempting to put down discontents. Since, however, this bill had been laid upon their lordships' table, he had entertained additional hopes that those discontents would be for ever composed. Hopes had been held out within the last eight-and-forty hours, which, if he knew any thing of the Catholic body, must exert a healing influence over them, and teach them the policy of suspending, for a time at least, the angry feelings which they had, not without reason, entertained*. They had now much to look for—much to hope for. He could not sit down without expressing his opinion on this particular part of the subject; and if he wished that any part of what he said should be heard, or should reach the members of the Catholic body, it was this;—He conscientiously believed that in this, as well as in the other house of Parliament, there were many persons who had voted, or who were about to vote, for the bill before them, but who were nevertheless warm friends to the cause of Emancipation. This he wished the Catholics to know and to be convinced of; and he wished them, moreover, to place their full confidence in those who were their real friends. He believed the bill could not succeed in the object which it had in view, for the grounds he had stated; and that it would never be called into action, because it would be evaded, or because it would be rendered unnecessary. Having stated his objections to the bill, he should not oppose it in its future stages with so much pertinacity as he should otherwise have felt it his duty to display; and he sat down in the fervent hope that the measure to which he had alluded, might have the effect of restoring peace and tranquillity to Ireland, and prosperity to its people (cheers).

The Earl of Harrowby said, that in the objections the noble marquis had made to the bill, it appeared to him that he did not deny the existence of the danger which it proposed to remedy, but he doubted whether its operation would be effectual. It doubtless would not be difficult for ingenious persons to find means of evading this or any other law; but he entertained a most sanguine hope, that when the Association should have been declared illegal, it would no longer be continued. It could not be said that Government had proposed the measure hastily. Ministers had waited for eighteen months to see whether the Association would conduct itself in such a way as to justify the tolerance of it; but finding that the very reverse had happened, they were compelled to call upon Government to put it down. He was firmly persuaded, that if Government had not adopted measures for the suppression of the Association, there would have been not one rival parliament, but two on the other side of the channel. He wished the bill to pass, because he thought it was the duty of parliament to provide, as well as it could under existing circumstances, for the tranquillity of Ireland. Whenever he had attempted, however feebly, to advocate the cause of the Roman Catholics, he did it, not so much with a view to their exclusive benefit, as because he considered that their admission to civil rights was fully as much for the advantage of the Protestant state—as, and of the Protestant church too—as for the Catholics themselves. Whenever that question should be again discussed in that house, as he trusted it soon would, and he should then have the pleasure of combating, side by side, with his noble friend opposite, he wished that it should come before them with every advantage—he wished that, instead of being obliged to rack his invention to find excuses for their conduct, interpretations for their expressions, and palliations for their deliberate resolutions, which he grieved to say, had done the Catholic cause more injury than ten thousand calumnies of its enemies could have effected—he wished, instead of this, to be able to show those persons who doubted the loyalty of the Catholics, that, however they had been misled by persons, some perhaps meaning well, and some perhaps meaning ill, they had immediately, in obedience to the will of parliament, abandoned the menacing attitude in which they had placed themselves. The present measure would afford the Catholics an opportunity of proving, that however they had been misled, they would readily submit to the authority of parliament. By so submitting, they would advantage their cause more than all the arguments of their most able advocates could do. To conclude, he supported the bill—he would not say notwithstanding—but because of his attachment to the Catholic cause (hear, hear).

The house then divided—Content, 146—Not Content, 44—Majority, 102.

* Alluding to the division in the Commons on Sir F. Biddell's resolutions, March 1.—See page 150.

MONDAY, MARCH 7.—The Bishop of Exeter presented a petition from the clergy of the

him unlooked-for appearance which the country now exhibited, it was impossible not to apprehend that a rivalry, or, perhaps, he might rather be justified in saying, a conflict would arise between the power of the government and that power which had grown out of the actual circumstances of Ireland, which might lead to consequences full of danger. If any authority had been exercised, if any attempt in the nature of a distress had been made to enforce the payment of that rent, then, indeed, something like a case would have been made out by those who supported the measure. But he had also to complain that on this subject there was something like special pleading in the terms of the bill. The words used were “levy and receive.” These two words, the meaning of which were wholly different, were coupled together, if not with an insidious intent, at least so as to produce an unfair effect. To levy money in any way but by the authority of parliament was unquestionably illegal; but this the Association had not done, and had not attempted to do. To prevent money from being received, while one party was willing to pay and the other to receive, was beyond the authority of parliament. He would ask, whether by any stretch of ingenuity, by any species of inquisition more searching and more rigorous than had been invented in the most Catholic country in the world, an accurate account could be extorted of every shilling that had been received, from whom it had been received, and to what purposes it had been applied from the Catholic laity? Yet without it, the clause could not be carried into effect. He would not detain their lordships by going into a consideration of the various means by which the provisions of the bill before them could be evaded. It was enough that they could be evaded. The bill, to be effectual, must take away from the Catholics the disposition or the power to do as they had hitherto done. The evil was deeply and firmly fixed; its root was in the state of society in Ireland. Every body knew that whole nations and communities might be held under an arbitrary domination—that the influence of power might wither and extinguish all the feelings and desires which tended to exalt and improve human nature; that men might be held in a state of servitude, and even reconciled to the loss of all their civil rights and privileges. This might be done—this had been done; but what arbitrary power could not do was, to keep a nation—and the Catholics of Ireland might, with reference to their numbers, be called a nation—in a state of deprivation of their natural rights, while they were intermixed with another people who were in the full enjoyment of civil liberty. All the ingenuity of the most learned lawyers—all the penal statutes which might be heaped upon the table of the house, could not shut the door against the influence of such freedom, could not intercept the feelings which must arise from the interchange of sentiments, the communication of wealth between the nation in thralldom and the nation which was free. If they still resolved to withhold from the Catholics the light and warmth of the sun of the constitution, they must not be surprised that they should seek illumination from those wandering lights, which fitfully and partially irradiated the political atmosphere, and glittered only to betray (hear, hear, hear). Let their lordships think to what manner of nation it was that they were asked to apply this rigorous restriction. It was a nation which he hardly felt himself able to describe, and to which he should therefore apply the words of a writer who was not less famed for the force and beauty of his prose than for the inimitable excellence of his poetry. Milton, in speaking of the English nation, and addressing its rulers, said, “Lo! Lords and Commons of England! Consider what nation it is whereof ye are the governors: a nation not slow and dull, but of a quick, ingenious, and piercing spirit; acute to invent, subtil to sinewy to discourses, not beneath the reach of any point the highest that human capacity can soar to.” Such a nation was Ireland. He besought the house to remember, that over this nation was exerted that tremendous engine of modern times—the press; a power which, like that of electricity, roused the latent fire which existed in every part of the national economy, and woke every sympathy of human nature to the keen enjoyment of the advantages which existed for the universal good of society.

The people of Ireland were invited to participate in the advantages of the extensive commerce which was one of the chief distinctions of England amongst the other nations of the world, and in all the hopes of higher and more noble things to which that commerce gave birth: they were invited to enter the army and the navy, and they were taught to imbibe a love of honour, and to seek for its reward: they were invited to become the possessors of landed property—one day he should take occasion to show the house to what extent they had accepted this invitation—and, consequently, to encourage a wish to cultivate those honourable relations, and to obtain that distinction to which the possession of landed property naturally led them to look, and which would alone enable them to make to their country a fitting return for those honours. After these feelings had been excited, after these hopes had been encouraged, did their lordships think that by penal acts of Parliament they could stifle the discontent which disappointment had engendered, or cure the sickness which was the consequence of those hopes delayed? It was not by making, but by repealing penal statutes, that they could hope to effect such a purpose. Such instruments were wholly unequal and unfitted for the purpose.

—“The elements

Of which your swords are temper'd, may as well

Wound the loud winds, or, with be-mocked-at stabs,

They must remove the necessity for such meetings as that against which the bill was levelled,—that alone would extinguish the mischief, and far ever annihilate the necessity of attempting to put down discontents. Since, however, this bill had been laid upon their lordships' table, he had entertained additional hopes that those discontents would be for ever composed. Hopes had been held out within the last eight-and-forty hours, which, if he knew any thing of the Catholic body, must exert a healing influence over them, and teach them the policy of suspending, for a time at least, the angry feelings which they had, not without reason, entertained*. They had now much to look for—much to hope for. He could not sit down without expressing his opinion on this particular part of the subject; and if he wished that any part of what he said should be heard, or should reach the members of the Catholic body, it was this;—He conscientiously believed that in this, as well as in the other house of Parliament, there were many persons who had voted, or who were about to vote, for the bill before them, but who were nevertheless warm friends to the cause of Emancipation. This he wished the Catholics to know and to be convinced of; and he wished them, moreover, to place their full confidence in those who were their real friends. He believed the bill could not succeed in the object which it had in view, for the grounds he had stated; and that it would never be called into action, because it would be evaded, or because it would be rendered unnecessary. Having stated his objections to the bill, he should not oppose it in its future stages with so much pertinacity as he should otherwise have felt it his duty to display; and he sat down in the fervent hope that the measure to which he had alluded, might have the effect of restoring peace and tranquillity to Ireland, and prosperity to its people (cheers).

The Earl of Harrowby said, that in the objections the noble marquis had made to the bill, it appeared to him that he did not deny the existence of the danger which it proposed to remedy, but he doubted whether its operation would be effectual. It doubtless would not be difficult for ingenious persons to find means of evading this or any other law; but he entertained a most sanguine hope, that when the Association should have been declared illegal, it would no longer be continued. It could not be said that Government had proposed the measure hastily. Ministers had waited for eighteen months to see whether the Association would conduct itself in such a way as to justify the tolerance of it; but finding that the very reverse had happened, they were compelled to call upon Government to put it down. He was firmly persuaded, that if Government had not adopted measures for the suppression of the Association, there would have been not one rival parliament, but two on the other side of the channel. He wished the bill to pass, because he thought it was the duty of parliament to provide, as well as it could under existing circumstances, for the tranquillity of Ireland. Whenever he had attempted, however feebly, to advocate the cause of the Roman Catholics, he did it, not so much with a view to their exclusive benefit, as because he considered that their admission to civil rights was fully as much for the advantage of the Protestant state—ay, and of the Protestant church too—as for the Catholics themselves. Whenever that question should be again discussed in that house, as he trusted it soon would, and he should then have the pleasure of combating, side by side, with his noble friend opposite, he wished that it should come before them with every advantage—he wished that, instead of being obliged to rack his invention to find excuses for their conduct, interpretations for their expressions, and palliations for their deliberate resolutions, which he grieved to say, had done the Catholic cause more injury than ten thousand calumnies of its enemies could have effected—he wished, instead of this, to be able to show those persons who doubted the loyalty of the Catholics, that, however they had been misled by persons, some perhaps meaning well, and some perhaps meaning ill, they had immediately, in obedience to the will of parliament, abandoned the menacing attitude in which they had placed themselves. The present measure would afford the Catholics an opportunity of proving, that however they had been misled, they would readily submit to the authority of parliament. By so submitting, they would advantage their cause more than all the arguments of their most able advocates could do. To conclude, he supported the bill—he would not say notwithstanding—but because of his attachment to the Catholic cause (hear, hear).

The house then divided—Content, 146—Not Content, 44—Majority, 102.

MONDAY, MARCH 7.—The Bishop of Exeter presented a petition from the clergy of the U less unlooked-for appearance which the country now exhibited, it was impossible not to apprehend that a rivalry, or, perhaps, he might rather be justified in saying, a conflict would arise between the power of the government and that power which had grown out of the actual circumstances of Ireland, which might lead to consequences full of danger. For this state of things he confessed that some prompt and vigorous remedy was necessary. But while he admitted this, he was bound to look, with no less caution, that the remedy proposed was sufficient. But the noble Earl (Liverpool) said, if even it should be shown that this measure was insufficient, still he would propose it; because, though it should prove ineffectual in putting down the Association, it would show that the effects of government were equally ineffectual in attempting to put down their enemies. This was in effect the argument of the noble earl. But did he think that it would be likely, among its other effects, to increase the respect of the people for the measures of parliament, because it taught them that they need not obey unless they should be disposed—that the power of the parliament was insufficient to compass its ends—that the law might be evaded, and treated with indifference, if not with contempt? Surely this proof that the government was

would have no other effect than that of alienating the minds of the people. But what was it that the present measure proposed to do, as against the Catholics? He did not find that there was any intention (and God forbid there should be) to put down the meetings of the Catholics. Among other clauses in the bill he perceived an elaborate provision that any society which should continue to meet after the period mentioned, should incur—what penalty did their lordships think? Why, that such refractory society should not have the power of adjournment. A provision like this was worse than ineffectual, because it threw an air of ridicule over its own avowed weakness. He professed a great and sincere respect for the order and form of the proceedings of that house; but he apprehended, that if assemblies should continue to be held after the passing of this bill, the provision he had alluded to would hardly have any effect in checking them. He would next advert to the rent, with respect to which so much had been said. He was free to confess that he thought the name ill chosen and objectionable. But he asked their lordships whether it became them to pass such a bill as was now before them, on account of an improper phrase. If any authority had been exercised, if any attempt in the nature of a distress had been made to enforce the payment of that rent, then, indeed, something like a case would have been made out by those who supported the measure. But he had also to complain that on this subject there was something like special pleading in the terms of the bill. The words used were "levy and receive." MONDAY, MARCH 7.—The Bishop of Exeter presented a petition from the clergy of the U diocese of Exeter, in favour of the bill, and against the Roman Catholic claims. The petition, which, on the motion of the right rev. prelate, was read and laid on the table, strongly censured the violent language used in the Association, protested against the Catholic doctrines, and deprecated the repeal of laws which formed the security of the church and state.

Lord King observed, that their lordships had now before them one more petition from the clergy against granting the enjoyment of civil rights to their fellow-countrymen, the Roman Catholics. How far those rev. gentlemen ought thus to meddle with politics he should not now discuss; but they always appeared eager to take part in them. He was informed that there was a city which had a rt. rev. mayor, and in which there were very rev. aldermen and well-benefited burgesses. He did not know whether they held their benefices in the diocese of the rt. rev. prelate, but he did know that the town was situated in his diocese. As these rev. gentlemen bestirred themselves so much to find fault where they had no business, he thought it would be but right to bring them back from where they had gone to where they ought to be.

The Bishop of Exeter did not understand on what ground it was pretended that the clergy should not be allowed the right of petitioning as well as any other class of his Majesty's subjects. Why should they not be allowed to approach that house when they addressed it in modest and humble petitions? With respect to the clergymen to whom the noble lord had alluded as holding magisterial offices, that was a circumstance which nobody more regretted than he did (hear, hear). Such cases did exist in his diocese; but it was not in his power to prevent them.

The Earl of Darnley referred their lordships to the petition which had been read at the desire of the rt. rev. prelate, in order to judge how far it was remarkable for modesty and humility. These reverend persons dwelt very much on the intemperate language and conduct of the Catholic Association; but if they had been placed in the same situation as the Catholics—if they had been so long debarred from their just rights, he doubted whether, partaking, as they surely did, of the common infirmity of human nature, they would not have used still more violent language. They protested against the Catholic doctrines, and said that they could not, consistently with their duty, remain silent, when the fences which surrounded the national church were proposed to be removed. Their language was throughout sufficiently strong, though they were not, like the Catholics, suffering from the operation of partial laws. Nobody was more attached to the true interests of the Church of England than he was, but this was a question which did not affect those interests. It was remarkable that no petitions had been presented in favour of the bill—at least, none had been presented in that house—except such as came from the clergy; but he would seriously advise those reverend persons to consider well whether they could really believe that at the present moment there was greater danger from granting than withholding the Catholic claims. He wished they would take the trouble to read what Mr. Burke, the highest authority on this subject, had said. They would then see that it was now too late to oppose the religious liberty of the Catholics.

On the motion for the third reading of the Unlawful Societies bill,

Lord Ellenborough said, that he by no means wished to be understood as countenancing the proceedings of the Association; but he did not wish that it should be put down by a measure imposing new restrictions on the liberty of the subject. Not that he thought the Association had hitherto done any harm, but because their future conduct might prejudice themselves and their cause; and therefore he hoped it would dissolve itself. He felt no regret that it had existed: on the contrary, he considered it a matter of congratulation. It had made both Catholics and Protestants think seriously of the evils arising from the existing laws; and he thought it had produced a stronger disposition in the minds of both parties to make mutual sacrifices of their prejudice, in order to set their differences at rest, and obtain a great national advantage (hear, hear). The Association had been harshly dealt with; they had been condemned unheard. It was said that they perverted the course of justice: but where was the proof? He could imagine that certain magistrates might feel uneasy under the eye of a Catholic barrister; or that a certain class of libellers might entertain strong fears of prosecution; but these were not reasons for putting down the Association. Some benefit must arise from the feeling which they imparted to the poorest man in the country, that whatever injuries he might sustain, there were persons ready to protect him. That feeling was certainly calculated to effect a benefit, rather than harm. He did not see why it was to be inferred, that because they had used their power in doing good, they therefore meant to exercise it in doing evil. He thought that the expectation of a great benefit now held out to them by the other house of Parliament, might have the effect of putting down the Association; but if that measure had not passed, he could not have expected it. The case of the Corresponding Societies which had been cited, had no analogy to the present. They were a few detached bodies of men; but here were six millions united in one cause. It had been said that the Catholics, when they obtained what they asked for, would ask for more. In reply he had to say, that he should never dread the Catholics, while they asked for what it would be unjust to give them. What he dreaded was, that they should continue to ask, and their lordships to refuse, those rights which it was unjust to keep from them. The better condition of the Catholics became in other respects, the deeper would be their dissatisfaction at the continuance of those laws by which they were at present oppressed. It was in vain, therefore, to talk of the prosperity of Ireland; it was in vain to pour benefits into her cup, while a drop of gall remained at the bottom which embittered the whole. He trusted that the Association would be induced, by the hopes which were now held out to the Catholics, to pronounce its own dissolution. He trusted that those hopes would not be again disappointed by that house (hear, hear); and that the noble earl would pause before he told six millions of people, who were now closely united for political purposes, that their eternal portion was despair (hear, hear).

Lord Callthorpe contended that the house had disqualified itself by its past conduct towards the Catholics from inflicting a measure of this

Now the Irish, previous to this arrangement, description upon them. There was much less danger to be apprehended from the conduct of the Association than from Parliament continuing to act towards the Catholics in that spirit which had given rise to the Association. He preferred conciliatory measures to those which were vexatious and oppressive. None of the noble lords opposite could hold the Catholic religion, as a system of faith, in stronger dislike than he did; but all the arguments by which their claims were opposed were grounded on the assumption that the Catholic religion was now, and would be in future, what it had been in those times when it was filled with slavish doctrines and prejudices, which were fostered by the corruption of the age. He was convinced that the best antidote to the injurious effects of their tenets, would be to grant them an equal participation in the privileges of the constitution. This house had been instrumental more than once in intercepting measures of grace towards the Catholics in their progress towards the throne; but he trusted that noble lords would not support this bill, because they had formerly supported measures which had produced the very consequences of which they now complained. He should vote against the measure.

The Lord Chancellor did not assent to this bill on such grounds as the noble lord, who had just sat down, had stated. If this house, impressed with a sense of the duty to the country, had formerly adopted measures which were now considered to be wrong, there never was a more mistaken principle than that their lordships should therefore pass this bill. No man could put his hand to his heart and say he would pass this bill, not because he disapproved of the conduct of the Association, but because he had done that which was wrong before. He would not consent to this bill, if he thought it would commit him in the course he was hereafter to adopt, when considering what he owed to the Protestant ascendancy in this country. His vote upon this question was dictated solely by what he considered his imperative duty to his country; and in whatever he should do in future he would be actuated by the same principle, and not by his past conduct. Upon that future measure he would act as he had always acted; which was to consult his conscience; and, under the responsibility of a being who must answer for his actions at the great account hereafter, to do what he considered best to be done. His conduct, on that question, had been founded on his conscientious opinions; and after having made it the subject of his anxious thoughts for thirty years, he saw no reason to believe that his opinions were ill-founded. But still he was open to conviction, if noble lords could persuade him by their arguments that he was wrong. Without pledging himself, therefore, as to what he might do, when called on to act, upon a future occasion, and governed by his opinion of the unconstitutional conduct of the Association, and of the dangerous principles upon which it had been formed and had acted, he would consent to the third reading of the bill.

Lord Dudley and Ward felt himself bound, with considerable regret, to vote for the measure. It was for their lordships to consider what might be their own conduct if placed in a similar situation, not for any crime, nor as the authors of any dangerous innovation; but because they had adhered to the religion of their ancestors, and had not received that great light, which after the darkness of a thousand years, had broken forth on the Christian world. If any of their lordships thought that, under such circumstances, he ought not to feel any irritation or discontent, but that he should bow with submission and kiss the rod, that noble lord might vote for this measure without regret. But in his view, who thought that the Catholic question ought to pass as soon as possible, and that the Catholics were placed in a situation most trying to their loyalty, he was not disposed to scan their faults too nicely. But indulgence must stop when danger began to appear; and it must be admitted that the Association had assumed a dangerous aspect. It set up a government against the Government, a parliament against the Parliament, and a revenue against the Revenue. He did not mean to say that there was rebellion in its acts, but there was rebellion in its tendency. It was the machinery of a rebellion for the time when an occasion might arrive. Such steps as these were always the first which were taken by sects against hostile sects or unpopular governments; and that government that would be intimidated by them would deserve to be overturned. Those who were at the head of this Association appeared to be able and intrepid men, and they might, perhaps, hate Parliament for doing their duty; but it was better they should do that, than be taught to despise them for neglecting it. It was because he was a sincere friend of Catholic Emancipation that he wished the Association to be effectually put down. So long as it existed, it would be cited as a specious plea against carrying the great measure of Emancipation.

The Earl of Rodow said, that he, as well as many of his friends, could bear witness to the violent proceedings of the Association during the last twelve months. They had erected an imperium in imperio, and lorded it over the whole Catholic population. They had been the means of fomenting jealousies, misunderstandings, and angry feelings between Catholic and Protestant; and if suffered to go on, would produce the most baneful effects. The situation of the peasantry of Ireland had, he conceived, been very much misrepresented. No set of people enjoyed more amply the benefits of the British constitution than the peasantry of Ireland; nor was there any body of people more ready or anxious to acknowledge the boons they had received from Parliament, during the last two or three years, if they were permitted to do so by those persons who assumed an undue authority over them. He was anxious that this Association should be abolished, as he was friendly to Catholic Emancipation. He was sure, if the bill passed those respectable noblemen, whom no person could mention without praise—Lord Fingall, Lord Gormanstown, Lord Killeen, and others—would do all that loyal subjects could do to enforce its enactments. Let justice be done to the Irish people, and tranquillity would be restored.

Pulveris exigui jactu, compressa quiescent."*

The Earl of Darney said, that the noble earl had spoken in flattering terms of the situation of the peasantry of Ireland: Did he really mean to state that the peasantry were in so enviable a state, that they had no just cause of complaint? Situated as they were now, it was impossible for them to be satisfied: from Lord Flaxall, to the lowest peasant in Ireland, all the Catholics felt severely the situation in which they were placed. The legislature had in its hands a better means of putting down this institution than that which had been adopted. He would not go into a discussion on the merits of the Association; but he would call their lordships' attention to an event which had recently occurred elsewhere, and which, if followed up, would give peace and tranquillity to Ireland. Let the house well consider the effect which had already been produced by that proceeding. He implored their lordships, he implored the learned prelates opposite, who had been the chief means of defeating, on former occasions, the measure to which he was now alluding, to pause before they dashed the cup of hope from the lips of the Catholics, and destroyed their just and well-founded expectation. Their numbers were great, their cause was irresistible, for it was founded upon reason and justice. The question must speedily be settled—for he was sure no noble lord could lay his hand on his heart, and say, that things could remain as they were.

Earl Grosvenor said, that they were now about to frame a law which would be fatal to the peace of this country, and of Ireland, if it were not accompanied by the measure to which his noble friend had alluded. They were proceeding to legislate in this manner, when the Catholic population had increased in knowledge and riches—when the numbers of that body were become enormous; and they proceeded to legislate, without stating in any part of the bill the nature of the danger that was apprehended. He was very glad to hear that some approximation of feeling between the two conflicting parties in Ireland had been manifested; but he trusted that the Catholics would never be satisfied with any trifling concession—that they would never be content with any thing less than a full participation in the rights and privileges of the constitution.

The bill was then read a third time and passed, and received the Royal assent on the ensuing Wednesday

Catholic Claims.

COMMONS, TUESDAY, FEB. 15.—Mr. Dickenson presented a petition from the Archdeaconry and clergy of the Archdeaconry of Bath, against the Catholic claims. It complained of the spirit of superstition, violence, and tyranny of the church of Rome, and of the threats of the Catholic population of Ireland, who had presumed to offer insult and violence to their Protestant fellow-countrymen. This feeling was calculated to place in peril the security of the Church and State of these realms, and of it, and the conduct of the threatening party in Ireland, these petitioners justly complained. He begged to state that in consequence of late proceedings, he had quite made up his mind against any further concession to the Catholics (hear, hear).

Sir T. Lethbridge expressed his satisfaction at the sentiments expressed by his hon. colleague, which were in accordance with his own, and, he believed, with those of the great bulk of the people; not that portion which had been described as low, and vile, and senseless, but of men whose sentiments were entitled to the highest respect in the estimation of Parliament.

Sir M. W. Ridley was sorry to see such a petition emanate from so respectable a body, and couched in such language as the petitioners had thought fit to use in the expression of their opinions (hear, hear). He the more lamented this intemperance at a moment when all sides of that house, and, he believed, of the country, speaking generally, had concentrated their efforts to bring all parties to the consideration of this subject with a mind and temper very different from that betrayed on the present occasion. The language of the petition was intemperate and unjust (hear, hear); and the charges it contained were unfounded (hear).

Mr. C. H. Hutchins said, he should abandon his duty to his country if he suffered so gross a libel as this petition to be presented to the house, without protesting against its crying injustice (hear, hear). It was an indecent and unprovoked attack upon the Catholic population of Ireland.

Laid on the table.

LORDS, THURSDAY, FEB. 24.—The Earl of Donoughmore presented a petition, subscribed by no fewer than 100,000 names, and if this extraordinary number of signatures would entitle a petition at all times to consideration from any description of his Majesty's subjects, how much more weight ought it to have, when the 100,000 persons by whom it was signed declared the sentiments of seven millions of their countrymen? Those signatures comprehended the most respectable persons in the Catholic body—men eminent for wealth, rank, and talent. The first name which presented itself in the list was that of the Premier Viscount of Ireland—Lord Gormanstown. He was the lineal descendant of the Lord Deputy of the same name—a statesman who once governed Ireland, although his descendant was now only permitted to come forward and solicit from their lordships the right of mere eligibility to office—a right which in common justice ought to belong equally to all his Majesty's subjects of every religious denomination. Having spoken of a former Lord Lieutenant, he would take the liberty to say a few words respecting the present. On the last occasion on which he submitted a motion to the house for redressing the grievances of which the Roman Catholics had to complain, the present representative of his Majesty had on this great question entrusted him with his proxy. The circumstances of Catholic Emancipation being thus supported by a present Lord Lieutenant, and petitioned for by the descendant of a former, ought, he thought, to have some weight with their lordships. Never had Ireland a Lord Lieutenant more anxious for her welfare than the present. He had done all the good in his power in the circumstances under which he had been placed. The noble earl concluded by a detailed eulogy on the administration of the noble marquis, after which the petition was read.

The Marquis of Landown submitted another petition in favour of the same object as that which had just been read, from Protestant landowners, merchants, and bankers, of Dublin and its neighbourhood. Though not so numerously signed as the petition which had been presented by his noble friend, it was in another respect entitled to the most serious consideration of the house. It was one which expressed the opinion of the most respectable and wealthy portion of the Protestant inhabitants of that part of the country from which the petition came, on the claims of their Catholic fellow-subjects. The first name that occurred was that of the Duke of Leinster; the next the Earl of Meath; the two greatest landed proprietors in that part of Ireland in which the petition was prepared. These names were followed by the signatures of the Marquises of Downshire and Westmeath. He next found the signatures of the Earls of Limerick and Charlemont—the latter a name connected and associated with the proudest period of Irish history. To these were added the signatures of Lords Glengal, Riversdale, Forbes, and many other noble names. Among the bankers and merchants, was the name of Latouche, and the names of others, the descendants of men who had fled from religious persecution in another country, and had found an asylum in this. Their ancestors, who were the victims of an act of great injustice committed by an ambitious tyrant, abandoned France in consequence of the revocation of the edict of Nantes. They suffered persecution as Protestants under a Catholic Government; for what religion existed which had not at some period or other been degraded and polluted by the fanatical zeal of those who thought they served it by acts of cruelty and injustice? The exercise of benevolent feelings, through three successive generations, had taught these descendants of persecuted Protestants to regard the Roman Catholics among whom they resided, not as enemies whom they ought to dread, but as brethren, as fellow-subjects of the same sovereign, discharging the same duties, and with whom they wished to live in the enjoyment of equal rights. They would besides find attached to this petition, the names of other Protestant bankers and of various capitalists connected with the interests of Ireland, and engaged in speculations just beginning to be unfolded for the benefit of that country. But did their lordships believe, that the noble and extensive landholders who had set their names to the present petition had subscribed it without well considering what would be the consequences of granting the prayer of the petition? Did not they believe that the great Protestant bankers and capitalists who here prayed for Catholic Emancipation, had seriously reflected on the effect which that measure was to have on their religion and their fortunes? He had always felt that this great question was not a Catholic, or a Protestant, but an Irish question; that it was a question whether or not several millions of Catholics should be admitted to an equal share of the benefits of the constitution. He felt that this measure, to use the words of a noble lord on the opposite side of the house, would inevitably pass. But he hoped it would pass soon, and he trusted, therefore, that when the measure was carried, there would be found on record the names of multitudes of Protestant petitioners in its favour, who by thus holding out the hand of peace, and promoting this healing measure, so necessary to the prosperity of their country, would have entitled themselves to lasting gratitude, when religious differences—no, not religious differences, for they would ever continue—but when the animosities of religion would have ceased to exist.

The petition was then laid on the table.

Lord Gort presented a petition of the Lord Mayor, Sheriffs, and Commons of the city of Dublin, praying that no farther concessions be made to the Catholics; and another to the same effect, from the Guild of Merchants in Dublin, which, he said, was composed of twelve hundred respectable merchants, noblemen, and country gentlemen.—Laid on the table.

COMMONS, TUESDAY, MARCH 1.—Mr. Brownlow presented a petition which had come into his hands at the end of last session. He then knew nothing about the facts which it contained, and he therefore postponed the presentation of it until he had made some inquiry on the subject. He had since obtained the testimony of a gentleman upon whose word he could place unqualified reliance, as to the truth of every fact in the petition. The petitioner, John Kirby, stated, that he had for 14 years kept a school in a parish in Kerry. On account, however, of the badness of the times, the parents of the children whom he taught, were unable to pay for their instruction, and the school consequently was obliged to be given up. The petitioner then thought of changing his residence in order to obtain a livelihood; and as a preliminary to that proceeding he applied to the parish priest to give him a character. The priest certified that the petitioner "had for many years kept a school, and conducted himself in an exemplary manner." It happened that about last February, an agent of the Hibernian School Society came to the petitioner's parish, for the purpose of establishing a school there. The school was established, and the petitioner was, on account of his excellent character, appointed to be the schoolmaster. The school had not been opened many months before it was attended by upwards of 100 children. It was then that the coadjutor of the parish priest, the rev. John Quin, called on the petitioner, and told him he must desist from teaching the children, because the education they received tended to make them Protestants. They were more taught to read the Bible, but no catechism, and the attendance of the Catholic priests was always solicited. The petitioner told the priest that he was himself a Catholic, and had no intention of making converts from the Catholic faith, and asserted that he ought to be allowed to get his livelihood as he pleased, so long as he did so honestly. The priest thereupon became enraged, and after dealing out some invective, went away vowing vengeance. On the next Sunday the petitioner was publicly pointed out in the house of the Lord by the priest, who exhorted his fellow parishioners to hold no intercourse with him, and excommunication was denounced against those who should continue to send their children to the school. About 50 children, however, still continued to attend. But soon after came the time when the priests were in the habit of receiving confessions, and then they took the opportunity of warning the children not to attend the school, and curses were pronounced from the altar on all who might thenceforth continue to do so. Under this continued opposition of the priests, the school sank to the ground, and the petitioner was compelled, by the threats of the priests, and the disrespect with which he was treated in consequence of those threats, to leave his parish, and go to other parts of the country. Wherever he went, however, he found that the influence of the priests had preceded him; and that those who were formerly disposed to befriend him, now denied him all friendly assistance. To crown all, the petitioner was cruelly assaulted, knocked down, and nearly deprived of life by five men, for daring to speak against the conduct of the parish priest, Mr. Egan, from whom he had endured all this suffering. This was only one instance; but he could quote many instances of the violence which Catholic priests had exercised towards schoolmasters in Ireland.

Mr. F. Lewis could, if he pleased, state to the house a hundred instances of similar conduct on the part of the Catholic priests. It was one of the misfortunes of Ireland, that at the present moment a struggle was going on between the Catholic priesthood, who opposed, and a particular Society who supported a certain system of education. It was the intention of the committee which was last session appointed to inquire into the state of Ireland, to propose a remedy for the evil to which he had alluded. In the meantime he begged the house not to enter into a discussion on the subject which the petition had brought under their notice.—After some remarks on the impropriety of presenting this petition on the present occasion, as if to prejudice the house against the reception of the Catholic petition, then coming on—it was laid on the table.

Sir Francis Burdett presented a petition, signed by a greater number of the Catholics of Ireland, than had ever, he believed, before affixed their names to any document of a similar description. In moving that the petition be printed, he declared that if he always felt considerable apprehension when called upon to address the house on any important subject, he had never experienced that emotion to the degree in which it then affected him, when a task was imposed upon him which he was unable adequately to perform; a task which he would have declined, but for the fear of seeming to avoid his duty, or to fail in that zeal for the Catholic cause, in which no gentleman in the country could ever exceed him. Still, when he called to mind the phalanx of talent, which, in times past, had been developed on the present question—when he recollected the eminent names which, for a century, had been marshalled in support of it; and considered that the brightest faculties of the present day would, within a very few hours, be drawn forth in the same cause—it was impossible for him not to feel some consolation in the reflection that every defect of his would be supplied by the ability of those who supported him; and that his cause—the cause of the Catholics of Ireland, of itself strong enough to sustain the weakest advocate—would be brought, and that night, to a favourable issue. It was a further consolation, to see on every side of the house, enlightened men equally anxious with himself in the success of this cause, and to know that the brilliant talents of hon. gentls. opposite, which had so often been exerted against him, would that night be employed in furtherance of the same great object. The petition which he had the honour of presenting, large as it was in appearance, and numerously signed, exhibited but an atom of that immense body of interests which it represented; and of which the full figure, if brought forward, would seem so tall and gigantic, that even the roof of the English House of Parliament might scarcely be lofty enough to contain it. It would be injustice to the extent of that petition to view it as involving only the cause of the Catholics—only the cause of the whole people of Ireland. The question to which it applied was one which affected no partial interests, but the safety and happiness of the British community at large. When he thought of this, he found the subject of such magnitude, that he almost abrank from the attempt to advocate it, and should still be inclined to do so, but for the resources and assistance to which he already had adverted. The grounds on which the petitioners came forward were so strong, so irresistible, that he could not imagine any principle on which they could be resisted. Upon every principle of honour, justice, policy, and good faith, the petitioners had a claim to which no answer could be given. His great desire at the present moment, was to avoid recurrence to any of those topics which had lately been before the house. He wished to touch upon no point which could excite angry feeling in the mind of any man. He looked to the exercise of the coolest judgment for the advancement of that object which he was endeavouring to support; he implored those around him, of whatever party, to merge for a moment every other feeling in anxiety for the public interest, and to consider only by what course the strength and resources of the empire were most likely to be served and to be consolidated. With that object, he should cautiously avoid every thing in the shape of a retrospective view. He would not, with an unhallowed hand, tear open the wounds under which the people of Ireland had been suffering; but would endeavour, by conciliating those people and the persons who were opposed to them, to show that they were interested in putting an end to the existing state of things. It was a state of things under which some moments of calm had, perhaps, lately been obtained, owing to the prevalence of something like a liberal system in the latter administration of the country; but in which no object which was really valuable, no prosperity to endure, could ever be brought about. Those advantages could never be expected but from the entire change in the policy of England towards Ireland, and from the concession of those demands, which her honour and her interests equally called upon her to admit. For of the Catholic claims he would venture to assert, that at the period of the Revolution, when there really was danger to be apprehended, when King James had been expelled because he wished to establish arbitrary power, and King William was but newly arrived, the hostility entertained against the Catholic religion was not a religious hostility, not the unworthy jealousy of the present day. In all times there had been a distinction between the spiritual and the temporal quarrel—between the Catholic of religion and the Catholic of the state. The former had always been safe; it was the last who had been crushed and persecuted—suspected of correspondence with the see of Rome, the exiled family, and the enemies of the new Government. With a new Government at home, a Popish Pretender supported by foreign Powers abroad, it was not wonderful that the people of England had looked with jealousy on a faith which they thought naturally connected with principles of tyranny and slavery. But after William III. had made good his footing in this country, and after James had been expelled from it, and sought protection from his subjects in Ireland—after he had disgusted even the last who adhered to him, the King of England, to win and pacify Ireland, sent over an offer of any terms,—for his proposal had actually been unlimited, and the Catholics of Ireland entered into a treaty, which provided only for their liberty of conscience—that was, the free exercise of their religion; with all those advantages to be possessed by them which were enjoyed by others, the King of England's subjects in general.

had not stood in the condition of insurgents: at that time England and Ireland were not united. James was King of Ireland when he went over to that country; Ireland, in defending him, only fought the battle of her lawful sovereign. In fact, the English were rather the rebels; though they were justified in what they did, because the interest of their country was at stake; they concluded this treaty even at the moment when a French fleet was entering the mouth of the Shannon; and by delivering up their arms, they had put it out of their own power again to be dangerous to England. One of the conditions of the treaty was that the Irish Catholics should not be compelled to take the oath of supremacy; and, notwithstanding that there were persons who thought the terms granted to them too good, the treaty of Limerick had been fully ratified and confirmed; Ireland had been restored to peace and tranquillity; and William, relieved from apprehensions at home, had been enabled to bend all his force against his opponent Louis XIV. The subsequent infractions of the treaty of Limerick had never been resorted to as securities. In the hour of danger these new guarantees were not thought of: it was in the hour of triumph that an angry faction had lost sight of justice and sound policy. Infractions of the treaty had followed, one after the other; the whole ending by imposing upon Ireland a tyranny the most sanguinary, and a yoke the most oppressive, to which any nation had ever been subjected. Now, unjust as that course of policy had been, it was not quite so unwise as wicked. The effect of it had been immediately to bend the people of Ireland to the earth; if followed up, it would probably have rooted out the Irish as a people, and though wicked—tyrannous—murderous—there would have been something, perhaps, like meaning in it. But the establishments of later days had deemed such a course too inhuman to be persevered in. By degrees those severities had been relaxed; and he advised the Catholics of Ireland never to forget, that year after year, they had been receiving benefits from this country—benefits to which, no doubt, they were entitled, but which they nevertheless would do better to keep in mind than the injuries they had suffered. Let the Irish Catholics carry their views but a little farther forward, and they would see how certainly, how necessarily, what yet remained to be done for them, must, sooner or later, be accomplished. He desired to remind the Catholics of Ireland of the abated rancour of those who had been their most determined opponents. He desired to impress upon them the absolute certainty of their final success, provided they would only so far keep a restraint upon themselves as to make the best use of all the advantages held out to them. They advocated claims which were borne out by reason, by humanity, and by the soundest principles of rational policy. If they would but exert themselves to forget old injuries—injuries which bade fair now to cease for ever—if they would only use common forbearance and discretion, it was impossible but that these claims must be successful. They might rely on it, unless the peace of this country were disturbed, the feelings of the enlightened part of it would make rapid progress in their favour. He, therefore, by no means considered himself at the present moment as the advocate peculiarly of the people of Ireland; still less as the especial supporter of the Roman Catholic religion. He was no advocate of the Roman Catholic faith; neither was he any opponent of it. In his view all religions were equally right, which the persons professing them followed with sincerity of heart, and which were founded upon principles of virtue and morality. That the Catholic faith was so founded, and so followed, abundant proof, in the way of example, could be given. At the same time, for himself, he had no hesitation in saying, that, having been bred up in the religion of the Church of England, that alone, in his mind, would be a good reason to give for his preferring it, and as ample a reason as any man could be called on to give for his religion (hear, hear). Farther, he certainly, upon reflection, did think, that if he had to choose his religion again, the Church of England was, of all others, the faith he would rather adopt. When he said this, he by no means meant to assert that objections might not be taken to parts of that system: many points in it, no doubt, might be altered and modified with great advantage; but his opinion applied to the system as a whole; and with respect to the clergy of the Church of England, take away only the ecclesiastical corporations, which like all other corporations, showed generally a narrow-minded, intolerant disposition, and for the clergy of the Church of England he had no hesitation in declaring, as far as his judgment went—a more enlightened liberal body of men did not do honour to this or any other country. If, however, he was a disciple of the Church of England, his first care should be, not to forget one of her purest precepts—to do unto others as he would wish others to do unto him. The constitution of England held, that all men capable of bearing equal burdens, were in a free state of society, entitled to the possession of equal rights. Upon those two grand axioms he fortified himself; and upon their authority he declared the present to be so little a Catholic question, that, in fact, the Catholics now stood upon Protestant arguments, and maintained their claims upon the principles which assured the security of England. The sort of change which had taken place in the views and situations of parties were singular enough. Those who had formerly rejected Catholicism for the alleged illiberality of its doctrines, were now acting upon the very principles which they had opposed, and refusing to proceed in conformity with their own; while the Catholics were asking for nothing more than the Protestants themselves had first desired—the right, and the enjoyment of complete religious freedom (hear, hear). They had heard much of the dangers to be apprehended from making these concessions; but he could never find out what they meant—in some men's minds, the very mention of the Pope raked up images of horror which had no connexion with the world as it now exists. Their terrors had been imbibed from books which, in early life, prejudiced their minds so deeply as to impede the progress of opinion, and they foolishly thought, that because their own minds stood still at a particular point, the opinions of the Catholics of the present day were the same as those of their ancestors; but those absurd notions no more resembled the state of our present existence, than that of the next (a laugh and much cheering). The grossest ignorance was a blessing, compared with the misfortune of having one's mind so imbued by prejudices derived from ancient histories (themselves exaggerated), as to render it incapable of receiving the truth (hear, hear). With respect to the Pope, the conduct of that portion of the Cabinet, who were hostile to Catholic concession, was inconsistent in no small degree; for they were the persons who had expended the blood and treasure of England in reinstating that Potentate, when his throne was subverted. He was found in subjection, and was replaced in his authority by those men who now professed to be alarmed at his shadow. If, as in former days, there were a league between some foreign powers and the Pope, to extend his authority, and if the danger had been occasioned by the re-establishment of the Pope, the Ministry deserved to be impeached for having created the danger—a danger so imminent that it was better to meet the hostility of six millions of people in Ireland, than to face it! In what a situation did this place us? we had destroyed the balance of power, and had distributed out Europe to the domination of two or three of the larger Potentates, who might at any time be combined against us, when they felt galled that England should pursue her own interests in recognizing the independence of the South American States. In such a case, instead of finding Ireland, as she would be if England did her justice, an insurmountable barrier, they might meet a people driven to desperation. England then would see her error; for if ever she were destined to follow in the fate of other nations, Ireland was the sea in which she would be swamped (hear, hear). Instead of Holy allies it was our obvious policy to seek an alliance with six millions of people, our own subjects. Ireland, in her present state, was the flaw in the heart of the empire. Let any man reflect on the transactions of the late war, and the dangers which Ireland so narrowly escaped; had the French Fleet landed in Bantry Bay, Ireland was irrecoverably gone. The sun of England was set, and set in eternal night (cheers). We could only attribute our escape to the extraordinary ignorance of our enemies, but we must not presume that now they were equally ignorant. They had had an extensive intercourse with us, had passed through the country, and had made themselves acquainted with the sentiments of the people; they accused England of hypocrisy in expressing a sympathy for the Negroes, and a desire to get rid of the slave trade, whilst she maintained a tyranny the most cruel over the Catholics of Ireland (hear, hear). These sentiments, constantly repeated in the French papers, ought to excite suspicion in the breasts of Englishmen, and urge them to consider how they could cure this evil, the continuance of which exposed the country to constant peril. This was the time to consolidate our resources, and to conciliate all parties—if it were omitted, no man could answer for the consequences. He therefore addressed himself to men of all parties, and, founding the question upon policy and justice, would appeal to their good passions as well as their bad, to their feelings of patriotism as well as their self-interest, and would tell them they ought all to unite in the necessity of doing justice to the people of Ireland. We had entered into a covenant of conciliation with Ireland; we had held out the prospects of peace, and wealth, and nothing could be more irrational than to stop in our course when we had done just enough to make it so injurious not to proceed, as that it would have been better not to have entered at all on a career of liberality and justice (hear, hear). Suppose these claims were complied with, what would be the consequence? A few Catholic gentlemen of great respectability would obtain seats in that house, and a few Catholic Peers would, as a matter of course, take their seats in the House of Peers. The King would have his prerogative enlarged, enabling him to place certain Catholic gentlemen in high offices; but what substantial power would this confer? Was there any fear that we should have a Popish King to betray and overturn the country? Until he heard what the danger was, he could not account for the opposition to the measure. The present time must be admitted by all parties to be peculiarly auspicious for taking the step which we were implored to take. The opinion of the country—that was, of England—of the larger, as well as the more enlightened part of the Protestants in Ireland, was decidedly in favour of granting the Catholic claims, because men felt that their own interest depended on their doing so. There was but one small faction in Ireland which opposed this liberal policy; and that opposition arose from their unwillingness to be deprived of the power they had been accustomed to exercise. He spoke of the party called Orangemen, to whom, at the same time, he was desirous to do full justice. It was his fortune to have been in Ireland—he had seen there both the Orangemen and the Catholics. Both of them he had always found to be equally disposed to be kind to their inferiors; and it was a great mistake to suppose that the landed gentlemen of Ireland were worse landlords or worse neighbours than those of any other country. There might be a few low pettifoggers hanging about the existing system, who might deserve this character; but he believed that, take the mass, there did not exist more honourable or more liberal men than the Orangemen of Ireland. This, however, was apart from their unfortunate propensity to domination, and from the right which they fancied they had by birth, to trample upon their Catholic fellow subjects. Except only this, and they were more kind in manner, and at least as kind in the essential, as gentlemen of England or any other country. It was time for them to get rid of this absurd and exclusive spirit—to consider only of the means by which the happiness and prosperity of their country could be increased—a prosperity in which they could not fail largely to share; as, instead of living in a society constantly tumultuous and distressed, they would see wealth and tranquillity on every side, superseding those measures of coercion which were at once the shame and misery of every state in which they were called into operation. For the people of England, too, independently of securing the country against foreign dangers, they had, in point of economy, a deep interest in the question of Catholic Emancipation. They who paid taxes would do well to consider what it cost to support the present system in Ireland. They talked of wanting taxes taken off; and the Chancellor of the Exchequer had proposed a few repeals, which were more acceptable from the complex machinery which they got rid of than from any immediate burden of which they relieved the subject; but, in Ireland, instead of thousands, millions might be saved at once by a change of system, independent of the wealth which must flow in from that country when once governed by a more liberal policy. If tyranny were a luxury, it was a very expensive one; of all modes of government, however simple in seeming, it was the most burdensome and costly. And all this expense, let it be recollected, came out of the pockets of England. In good faith and justice—for he never would give up the treaty of Limerick—in good faith and justice, we were bound to do all the Catholics desired. The understanding at the Union—that measure which had been a union in point of form, but which had left the division between the two countries more wide and open than ever—the understanding at the Union had been distinctly, that the Catholics might expect from a British Parliament that justice which the mean and corporate spirit of their own, gave them little hope of. The Attorney-General for Ireland had stated that when the Marquis Wellesley undertook the Government of Ireland, he found the vessel of state like a wreck upon the breakers, and that he enabled her to float upon the tide of prosperity that had since flowed in upon her: he hoped the Government would not stop there, but that they would trim the rigging, set all to rights, and above all, man the vessel well (cheers). He still hoped to see such an extension of the feeling entertained by that noble individual, that Ireland and England should be looked upon as one and the same country, and that men would feel, when they discussed the interests of an Irish province, as though they were arranging the affairs of Yorkshire or of Lancashire. Adverting to the opinions which the Attorney-General for Ireland entertained on the subject of Catholic Emancipation, he trusted that they would have due weight in the quarter in which the learned gent. now sat; and that he might be able to make a convert of a rt. hon. friend of his, a cabinet minister, who, unfortunately, was opposed to the claims of the Catholics of Ireland. It could not be denied, that since the system of the relaxation of the penal code had commenced in Ireland, the people of that country had received, with the most ardent expressions of gratitude, the benefits which that relaxation had conferred upon them. But if so much had been produced by small beginnings—if the field yielded so large a crop with so little labour, what a plentiful harvest might it not be expected to produce, when greater attention was paid, and greater labour bestowed on its cultivation. The people of that country were the most docile in the world. They were easily influenced by those whom they believed to have their real interests at heart. The Catholic priests were said to have a very considerable influence with them. They had so, and he should be sorry to see that influence diminished. He could assert, that they had always employed it for the tranquillity of the country. He was sorry that the disposition of the Irish to obey the laws where they were fairly administered, was not noticed in the way it ought. Of all the people he had ever met, the people of Ireland, as Sir John Davies had long ago observed, were the most willing to pay respect to the laws, where they had any protection from them, and the most contented and grateful for the smallest portion of justice. It was to be lamented that a people, enjoying so many blessings from natural situation, having the advantages of such ports, and rivers, and so many means of rendering them prosperous, should be deficient in good government. That want alone crippled all their energies, and rendered them discontented and unhappy. He did not mean to say that the particular measure of which he was then the advocate was to be looked upon as the panacea for all the evils of Ireland: it would be unfair to view it in that light. He should rather have it considered on its own grounds. He would wish to have it looked upon as the first step—as the sine qua non of all other measures which might be adopted. The question of Catholic Emancipation should be considered with reference to its own merits, and not mixed with other matter. He trusted that the house would not delay the putting a final stroke to this great work, which was to unite both countries in one bond under the protection of the British Constitution. He would not trouble the house by entering into any discussion on supposed religious objections, for he did not imagine there was any man in that house whose mind was so wrapped in prejudice as to assert that any individual ought to be deprived of his civil rights in consequence of his religious opinions. The only ground of objection which he could suppose was—that of some contingent danger to the State. When such an objection was urged, he would grapple with it, and endeavour to show that in the present state of society the fear was unfounded. For the present, therefore, he would say nothing on that subject, but would conclude by moving the resolutions he held in his hand*.

Mr. J. W. Croker rose for the purpose of seconding the motion. He concurred with the hon. bart. in thinking that those rights

* "That it appears to this committee, that in several acts passed in the parliaments of Great Britain and Ireland respectively, a certain oath, commonly called the oath of supremacy, is required to be taken as a qualification for the enjoyment of certain offices, franchises, and civil rights, therein mentioned.

"That in the said oath a declaration is contained, that no foreign prince, person, prelate, state, or potentate, ought to have any jurisdiction, power, pre-eminence, or authority, ecclesiastical or spiritual, within these realms.

"That it appears to this committee, that scruples are entertained by his Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects, with respect to taking the said oath, merely on account of the word "spiritual" being inserted therein; and that for the purpose of removing such scruples, it would be expedient to declare the sense in which the said word is used, according to the injunction issued by Queen Elizabeth, in the first year of her reign, and recognized in the act of the fifth of her reign, and which, as explained by the 37th of the Articles of the Church of England, imports merely, that the Kings of this realm should govern all estates and degrees committed to their charge by God, whether they be ecclesiastical or temporal, and restrain with the civil sword the stubborn and evil doer.

"That it is the opinion of this committee, that such act of repeal and explanation should be accompanied with such exceptions and regulations as may be found necessary for preserving unalterably the Protestant succession to the Crown, according to the act for the further limitation of the Crown, and better securing the rights and liberties of the subject, and for maintaining inviolate the Protestant Episcopal Church of England and Ireland, and the doctrine, government, and discipline thereof; and the Church of Scotland, and the doctrine, worship, government, and discipline thereof; as the same are by law respectively established."

of the Roman Catholics ought not to be longer deferred; but at the same time he considered that no arrangement would be satisfactory which did not include the Roman Catholic clergy, and decree a provision for them. If the hon. bart.'s motion were carried, as he hoped it would be, he pledged himself, that if no individual more worthy were found, he himself would move that such a regulation should form part of the bill.

Mr. L. Foster could not accede to the motion of the hon. bart. because he could not divest himself of the feeling that it would be injurious to the Established Church in Ireland. The hon. bart. had thrown out nothing which tended to secure that church. He was the more anxious on this subject, as he had heard, and the house had heard, from the hon. member for Aberdeen (Mr. Hume), a declaration that the Church of Ireland ought not to be suffered to continue on its present establishment. Such an opinion was not confined to members of that house. It was avowed by a rev. gentleman high in the Catholic Church in Ireland, who had been followed by several lay writers of that religion, that Emancipation ought to be accompanied with temporal grants, which would be inconsistent with the existence of the Irish Established Church. He was prepared to contend, that Emancipation, if it were followed as it was expected to be, with a permission to the professors of one religion to administer a Government essentially connected with another, would be against the spirit of the constitution, and that it would leave no means by which to decide which religion should predominate. It was to be regretted, that in advocating this question, on many occasions, attempts should be made to disparage the Established Church in Ireland. Its clergy were described as Orangemen—as men without property or influence but what they derived from the church. Great stress was also laid, in this question, on the numerical strength of the Catholics. That, he conceived, had nothing to do with the merits of the question. If every Government were to change according to the variations in the numbers of its subjects, all system resolved itself into the law of the strongest. But the number of the Protestants was by no means so small in Ireland as was generally asserted. Lord Charlemont had said to the volunteers, in 1782, that it was impossible for two millions of Catholics to be held in subjection by one million of Protestants. But that noble lord was mistaken in the actual numbers of the Irish population, and in the ratio between Catholic and Protestant. In the year 1821, the census showed that it was 6,800,000. He denied that there had been more than 100,000 increase since that time. The landholders of Ireland had seen the evil and had taken means to stay the increase of population (hear, hear). The necessity of such a course was now fully understood (hear, hear). But it was most unfairly assumed that the Catholics had increased, and that the Protestants had ceased to multiply. In the four provinces the number of Protestants was 1,860,000, and that of the Catholics 4,900,000, being numerically in the same ratio as Sir William Petty stated in his account of Ireland: among the Protestants there were not more than 665,000 dissenters of various sects. He must now proceed to another point, which he considered of considerable importance. Some years ago, the house was asked, on the subject of the Catholic Emancipation—"What are you afraid of? You have a sovereign on the throne of France, who is an enemy of all religion; you have the Pope a prisoner; you have got rid of the Jesuits; you hear no more of the infallibility of general councils; you have, indeed, a Roman Catholic religion, but of a very different character from that by which it was formerly distinguished;—of what then are you afraid?" The very mode in which this argument was put, showed that the parties who used it thought that there might be just ground of alarm in a king of France who was a firm friend to the Roman Catholic creed, in a Pope who was firmly established in his chair, in the existence of the Jesuits as a religious body, and in the restoration of the Catholic religion to all its old superstitions. Now let the house consider how the case stood at present. The Royal Family of France could not be taunted even by their bitterest enemies with being indifferent Catholics (hear). The re-establishment of the Catholic religion in all parts of the world where it had once been professed, was their first and leading passion (hear, hear). The chair of St. Peter was at present filled with a worthy successor of the Gregories and the Clements, his equal had not been vested with the tiara for many centuries (hear, hear). The Jesuits were again established,—not merely in France and Spain, but also in England and Ireland (hear, hear, and a laugh). The Catholic religion was again dealing out its miracles and indulgences, and displaying a spirit of intolerance and persecution which could only be equalled by that which it had displayed in the seventeenth century. The present was one of those epochs in which the prevalence of religious zeal was conspicuous. This was proved by the numerous Bible and missionary societies, which now existed in England, and by the proposition of a law of sacrilege in France, which was worthy of the most intolerant period of the reign of Louis XIV. The present was, therefore, in his opinion, the very last moment when any change should be made in the political condition of the Catholics. He was hostile to such change, because he saw them mixing up politics with religion, and because he knew that the alliance between religion and politics was always dangerous (hear, hear). He had been led to consider the compact between church and state as one of the principles of the British Constitution. To any measure, therefore, which tended to weaken that compact, he should always oppose the most strenuous resistance, regardless of all the reproaches which might be heaped upon him for so doing. He concluded by eulogizing the union between church and state, and sat down amid considerable cheering.

Mr. Conning said that he rose at this early period of the debate, because he was apprehensive that if he did not take that opportunity of addressing them he should not have strength at a later period. He praised the moderation with which the hon. bart. had brought forward his proposition, and expressed his intention of following his example. He should, therefore, not enter into any controversy, nor touch upon topics calculated to create an irritating discussion. He should confine himself to the expression of an opinion he had repeatedly expressed, and which he should be ready to support under any circumstances, from whatever quarter the support of it might be claimed (hear, hear). Undoubtedly, if his opinion and advice had been taken—and he by no means complained that it had not—he should have said that he did not conceive the present to be a favourable opportunity of bringing on this question. But having said that, he should pursue the topic no further, because he might appear to throw a doubt which he did not feel on the justice of the cause (hear, hear). The question was, however, before them, and it was their duty to consider how they would deal with it. He would deal with it now as he had upon every other occasion, and would not hesitate to give it his most cordial and conscientious support (loud cheering). Although there were circumstances which made him consider the present an unfavourable time for the discussion of these claims, personally he was not sorry that they had been brought forward. After having recently lent his aid to restrain and suppress the irregular zeal of some of the Catholic body, he was not sorry to have an opportunity of showing that it was only to the indiscretion, which had been superinduced that he objected, and that his opinions and feelings regarding the merits of it were, at the bottom, not only unaltered, but unalterable. The principles upon which this proposition appeared to him to be worthy of the consideration of the house were so plain and simple, that he could hardly imagine on what grounds it could be opposed. He could understand why a person who was called upon to vote in favour of it, might demand that many modifications should be introduced, many concessions qualified, many inconveniences provided for, and many dangers—some of them, in his opinion, imaginary, and others real—guarded against; but he could not by any process of reasoning understand why all the subjects of the same kingdom, all the inhabitants of the same soil—who mingled in the daily offices of life, and professed a common Christianity, should be excluded from the common benefits of the constitution of their country (cheers). The onus probandi, the necessity of making out the reasons for their exclusion, was thrown upon the other side. It appeared to him that the state in which they now stood had been justly described by his hon. friend (Mr. Foster), as a state which was now a century old. But, as that hon. gent. had said, "what was a century in the age of religion?" By altering the present system, we restored to it that which had a still longer age in its favour. If the argument of age were of any value, why did they hesitate to restore the Catholics to that state in which they were placed before the passing of the penal laws? To stand where they were, was to alter; to make a change, was to return to the old system (hear, hear). By this statement he pressed into his service all the enemies of innovation, unless it could be shown that the present state of things was fixed in so strong a necessity, that it could not be abandoned without a dereliction of principle or of honour (hear, hear). He was too weak to enter deeply into this question. One or two topics, however, had been urged by his hon. friend, which he could not bring himself to pass over in silence (hear, hear). His hon. friend had set out by saying, that nothing was so dangerous to the peace of society as the alliance between politics and religion; and how did he conduct his speech? By a laboured eulogium on the alliance between church and state (hear, hear, and a laugh). He could not imagine how it was that it never occurred to his hon. friend on the many occasions on which he was called on to utter those mystic words at night con-

vial moments than the present, to ask himself if church and state was not an alliance of politics and religion (hear, hear, and laughter). He concurred, however, up to a certain point, with the opinion of his hon. friend. He did think that the alliance of politics and religion, where it led to a divergency of sentiment, and to the doubtfulness of allegiance, was to be denounced as eminently objectionable; and here, again, he must look to his hon. friend's speech for an illustration. His hon. friend had told them, that never was the feeling of religious zeal so paramount over political ambition among the governments of the Continent as at the present time. He believed that to be the case; but what was the inference he drew from it? Mankind were divided into two classes, by two lines of demarcation. There was one line between the Protestant and the Catholic churches, and another between British and foreign influence. He would say, "Efface the line of separation which divides the inhabitants of the British islands into two classes, and by so doing strengthen the line of demarcation which separates British from foreign influence" (cheers). These were the principles on which he had always advocated the Catholic cause. It was unnecessary for him to say to his hon. friend, that with regard to the dangers which he and other hon. members anticipated to the Protestant Establishment, he had lately given a pledge, which he was now ready to repeat, that he would go as far as any man to retain it in full dignity and security (hear, hear). He would go even further: he would declare, that if his reason could be convinced, that they must either stand where they then were, or by proceeding risk that establishment which was interwoven with their happy constitution, he would stand where they then were at all hazards, and at the hazard of being charged with inconsistency, oppose the motion of the hon. baronet. It was because his reason could not be convinced of this fact, but was convinced of the contrary, that he was now determined to support it (hear, hear). It was because he was convinced that it would increase the strength of the empire at home and its respectability abroad, that he was for opening wide the vest of the constitution, and receiving in its bosom all those who lived in its allegiance, and were ready to support its Government (hear, hear).

The Solicitor-General declared himself hostile to any further concessions to the Catholics, and contended that if any gentleman had, upon former occasions, made up his mind to yield them, he ought now, from their recent conduct, to alter his resolution. Claims which had been denied to reason, argument, and quiet solicitation, ought never to be yielded to menace or intimidation. He could never find out what the Catholics proposed as their ultimatum (hear, hear). Former concessions were made the groundwork of further demands (hear, hear). Whatever admiration he might feel for the talent of his learned friend the Attorney-General of Ireland—however he might feel that he was "improvisator celestis,"—still he must oppose him upon this subject, and rebut the arguments which he continued to bring forward in this sanctuary of legislation (hear, hear). His learned friend had said, "You gave the Roman Catholics political power when you gave them the elective franchise; why, then, do you hesitate to give them more?"

Nothing was withheld from the Catholics under the present laws, but the bench, the parliament, and the high offices of state (hear, and a loud laugh). If these were granted to the Catholics, he had no doubt but they would ask for the church also (hear, and a laugh.) Gentlemen might smile; but he would give them proof that what he had just said was not mere idle assertion on his part. He would read to them a passage from the proceedings of the Catholic Association. It was proposed in that turbulent assembly to present a petition to the House of Commons for the abolition of tithes, and to send it for presentation to the hon. member for Aberdeen, because he had taken the Church into his holy keeping. The hon. member had brought in a string of resolutions, twenty or thirty in number—he was wrong—only six or seven (loud laughter). If they were not numerous, they were at least strong. The hon. member's plan was to slice and cut up the Church of Ireland as if it were the shares of a joint stock company. He objected to concession on account of the power of the priesthood. Since the Unlawful Societies bill had been before the house, a Dr. Magee had said at Kilkenny, that "If they put down the rent, we will make the public advance it on the altar, as the price of their redemption." Was this language to be tolerated? Were these men whose power was to be despised? The Catholic priesthood would enter into no compromise with our Government. Under Lord Howick's administration, in 1813, they rejected the veto, and at the time of Mr. Grattan's attempt, the domestic nomination. He knew how to deal with the Catholic laity, for they had no interest separate from the state (cheers from the Opposition); but not so the Catholic clergy, for they had avowed a distinct interest, which, with their great controlling influence, they were determined to work for the overthrow of the Established Church, and the possession of its wealth, and ecclesiastical revenues. It had been said that the Catholics merely asked for equal privileges with the Protestants. This was not to state the case fairly: they asked for more; for the Protestant church had not in any way the same influence as the Catholic over the minds of the Irish people: so that if the two churches were placed upon a par in point of civil privileges, the preponderating influence in Ireland must be with the Catholics, and the overthrow of the present Church Establishment must follow. This concession to the Catholics would involve a violation of the constitution. Was not the principle of the Protestant religion in church and state, made a fundamental and inviolable part of the compact with King William III., after the expulsion of James II.? And would they abandon that indispensable principle of the Bill of Rights? It was true that the Catholics might be more numerous than the Protestants in Ireland, but this was not an Irish, but a British question; and in Great Britain the numbers of the Catholics generally was much inferior to that of Protestants. He was surprised to see this experiment attempted so repeatedly upon the constitution; and should therefore oppose the motion.

Mr. S. Wortley expressed his firm belief, that no substantial peace would be established in the country, until this question were conceded, and the Catholic and Protestant population of the empire incorporated in one feeling of civil concord. The learned gent. who had last spoken, had asked the house where they meant to stop in this range of concession? They ought to stop when they had done justice to the Catholics and not before (hear, hear). It was no part of his inquiry to ascertain what would or would not satisfy the excited feelings of the Catholics; he would do them what he thought to be justice. But the learned gent. declared that this was not the time for making concession, lest it should be interpreted as a wish to conciliate the Catholic Association, which they had just determined to put down. He thought, on the contrary, that this was exactly the time when they ought to show the Catholics, that though they would not permit them to overawe or usurp the functions of the constituted authorities, yet they would not deny them the enjoyment and exercise of those privileges which the constitution conferred upon the people of a free country (hear, hear). They had been told that the Catholics, though a majority in Ireland, were, nevertheless, a minority as compared with the whole population of the country. That was no reason for excluding them from eligibility to civil privileges, for if it were, it applied equally to other Dissenters, who were still permitted to form a part of the legislature. When the learned gent. talked of the overwhelming power of the Catholic clergy, and their desire to overthrow the Established Church, he was starting a chimerical apprehension; his fears were absolutely vague and groundless. This question was virtually carried in the year 1812; from that moment he considered its ultimate decision irrevocably fixed, and if so, why continue these protracted discussions? He was ready to guard the passing of the measure with the best provisions for the security of the Protestant Church Establishment (hear, hear), and to take care that it remained as firm as it did now. Sure he was that if they continued to refuse to the Irish people their just and natural rights, they would do more to endanger the Protestant church and state, than they could possibly do by the enactment of any measure of concession and conciliation (hear, hear). He expressed his opinion thus openly, because it differed from that of many of his constituents, but if the minds of the people of England were changed, they would have petitioned the house on the subject. His impression, therefore, was, that the repeated discussions within that house had mainly brought the public out of doors to a calm and temperate consideration of the subject, and that they left the decision to the deliberate judgment of the legislature (hear).

Mr. Banks (Cambridge Univ.) said, that the absence of petitions against this bill was ascribable to the little time which had elapsed since the notice of the discussion was given. He knew that petitions were in preparation if time permitted, and that the heads of colleges of the learned body which he had the honour to represent were convened for the purpose by the Vice-Chancellor, who was not a member of the Established Church, but a layman. With respect to the general feeling of the people, it appeared strange to him how they could have altered their former opinion—with what spells the Catholic Association, its edicts, or exhortations, civil or spiritual could have made converts of the Protestants, he was at a loss to guess. If what had alienated the friends of the Catholics, had at the same time reconciled their Protestant opponents, then Prince Hohenloë must have been at work with both churches (a laugh). With respect to the dangers to be apprehended from concession to the Catholics, he could only say, therefore, that if a large body of Catholics were to be invested with extensive privileges, and a certain number of them to obtain a footing in that house, an opportunity would then be afforded of agitating such questions as would facilitate the overthrow of the Irish Church. The Catholics in the prosecution of their claims looked farther than to the enjoyment of civil privileges. [Here the hon. member pulled a paper out of his pocket, and read part of a speech.] Mr. O'Connell says, "It was suggested to me, if we desisted from petitioning against Church Rates, and against the payment of tithes in parishes where there is no Protestant Clergyman, or the building of churches where there are no Protestant inhabitants—if we would confine our views and our ambition to procuring seats for some half dozen of our Peers in the House of Lords, and a few of our gentry in the House of Commons, we might have that privilege at once; but we will consent to no such compromise." [At the words "payment of tithes in parishes where there are no Protestant clergymen," the hon. member was interrupted by a general laugh, and loud cries of read, read; the hon. member betraying rather an unwillingness to proceed with the quotation. On coming to the words "no Protestant inhabitants," there was another laugh, and a cry of read, read. The hon. member said that he had read the wrong part, and was going to put the paper in his pocket, but the call of read, read, being repeated; he wondered, he said, at the impatience of the house, but read the following extract:—"We seek to establish a holy alliance between the English throne and the Irish people; and, so long as the mockery exists of making the people pay church-rates where there is no church, and the tithe where there is no parson."—When the hon. member came to the words "tithe where there is no parson," he was disposed to stop, but there was another general cry of read, read, and loud and continued laughter. The hon. member put away the newspaper from which he was reading. He then continued.] The hon. gentlemen opposite were very loud. He would confess that he had watched the progress of such things, and they went on hair by hair (great laughter). The hon. member said a few words more, and apologized for addressing the house.

Mr. Pakenham said, he had long since made up his mind on this question. With deep and intense feelings for the maintenance of the best rights of the empire, his decided and inalienable conviction was, that this measure could not be too speedily carried—that no time was too early for its adoption; and none could arrive, when it should not have his most zealous support (cheers). With respect to what had fallen from his learned friend (the Solicitor-General), as to the expediency of the time, why did he call upon those who differed from him to consider that part of the consideration? At what time would he be prepared to declare his consent to such a motion as this (hear, hear, and a laugh)? He feared that his learned friend had made up his mind to a perpetual opinion, which would render any argument as to the expediency of time a useless waste of words. If it be a time of calm—if the sea be still, if there be no agitation among the Catholics, he will tell you—non quiescit movere

—nobody calls for such a discussion. If the ocean rages and the wind blows he will say the storm must be controlled (hear, hear). So that in calm or in storm, there would be no time that was not inopportune in his learned friend's view of the matter. He (Mr. P.) entirely agreed in the observation of the hon. member for Yorkshire, that there was a peculiar grace and fitness in the present time. Some of the friends of the Catholic body had been induced, by what he felt to be a most painful necessity, to enact a measure of restriction; it was therefore just the time to show the Catholics generally, that, notwithstanding this necessity, Parliament was still ready to consider the justice of their claims. He solemnly assured the house, that if he thought this measure could risk in any degree the security of the Church of Ireland, instead of being its advocate, he should be found among the ranks of its warmest opponents. But he thought the measure eminently qualified to support that church. Some allusion had been made to former bills, and among the rest to one of his own, respecting this subject; and to show how clearly on all these occasions the security of the Established Church was provided for, he would read a paragraph from his own bill of 1831, which was copied from the preceding bill of Mr. Grattan; it was as follows:—"And whereas the Protestant Episcopal Church of England and Ireland, and the doctrines, discipline, and government thereof, and likewise the Protestant Presbyterian Church of Scotland, and the doctrines, discipline, and government thereof, are, as between Great Britain and Scotland, severally and respectively, permanently and inviolably established in these realms." Could it be said that no adequate provision had been made for the security of the Established Church? His learned friend (the Solicitor-General) had failed to show that the measure was at variance with the principles of the constitution: the excellence of our constitution was, that it had no unbending principles, no positive regulations, but adapted itself to the varying circumstances of society as they arose. The claim of the Roman Catholics was to be admitted members of a free representative government—to be admitted to institutions the advantages of which belonged equally to every subject of that government. He did not say that the principle would admit of no exception or control, or that these advantages formed part of a great common which had been left unenclosed. There was nothing in the social fabric concerning which he would venture to make that assertion. Even the enjoyment of natural rights must in a state of society be qualified with conditions; but these conditions ought only to be imposed in the degree which would be the most likely to protect and preserve the rights and privileges of all. Whether the rights enjoyed by individuals were of the character of natural or of chartered rights, they were liable to be sacrificed to general expediency. But then the expediency must be clearly and unquestionably made out. He directed the attention of the house to the circumstances under which our ancestors had thought it necessary to limit those rights in a peculiar manner with respect to Roman Catholics. At the reformation the main object was to protect the rights of the throne against the claims of a foreign power, and against the disaffection of those subjects who might reserve their allegiance for that foreign power, to the detriment of the throne and of the state in general. The legislature accordingly provided—first, for the absolute integrity and inviolability of the church; further, for the spiritual prerogative of the crown, forbidding at the same time the exercise of any other than the established religion. These provisions of the legislature were intended to prevent the claims of the Pope, or any other foreign power, to interfere with the Church. Did they bear at the present day of any claim to that interference, to the right of deposing kings, or dissolving the allegiance of their subjects? Was that believed or asserted by any man in either kingdom? Those enactments were, therefore, gradually done away. The law forbidding the exercise of any other religion was done away by the repeal of the act against recanancy; therefore the act of uniformity, was at an end, and in deciding what ought to be conceded to the Catholics in the present day, we ought not to act upon the alarms which prevailed at the time of the reformation. The wisdom of our ancestors watched the progress of time, and took their measures accordingly. In the reign of Charles, they observed a new danger—a monarch careless about religion, or secretly affected to an unconstitutional one, and likely to be followed by a Popish successor. They provided a remedy, not adapted entirely to meet the evil, but the best they could devise, which was to require certain oaths to be taken by those who were to take seats in Parliament. That having been found insufficient on the accession of James II., who openly maintained the Roman Catholic religion against the constitution and the rights of his people, the legislature prudently shifted their ground, and had recourse to a measure at once wise, bold, and salutary. They drove the monarch from the throne for violating the constitution, and they resolved that the sovereign power should be held unalterably in Protestant hands (cheers). Did he deny that the throne must be Protestant? Was he suspected of wishing to subvert the Established Church because he was the advocate of the Catholics? If not, and the dangers of the period to which he alluded had ceased to exist, he called on the house to be just, and concede to the Catholics that equality of rights of which they had been so long deprived. But to return. What were the dangers which afterwards threatened the establishment? The claims of an exiled family driven from the throne, and the plots and agitations of a disaffected party retained in its interests. He admitted that the Roman Catholics of that period were suspected justly. All the former measures against the Papists were continued. They were not to be trusted with honour or power in the state. They were coerced in their persons and property—were deprived of their civil rights—and became sunk and degraded into that wretched state, from which they were relieved by the benignity of the last reign. This was a natural course of proceeding, though he did not conceive it a very wise one; but it showed that our ancestors adapted their remedies to the evils then existing, and premised upon their apprehensions. In 1781, a new danger and a new difficulty presented themselves. The Catholics were so sunk and degraded, that by the depression and privations imposed upon them, the heart's blood of the state was impoverished. The landlord found that his lands could not be cultivated—the energies of labour were every where paralyzed. If the annals of that period were to be properly read and considered, the late King would be for ever illustrious in history, as he was entitled to the especial gratitude of every Roman Catholic in Ireland. That system of beneficence which he introduced had been now in practice forty years—it had raised the Roman Catholics of Ireland to a state of affluence and respectability—it had given them a perfect equality of civil rights—it had enabled them to participate in the advantages of our institutions. What was the danger they had now to dread? It was not that the Pope would attempt to govern the Church of England; that he would arrogate to himself the power of absolving the subjects of those realms from their allegiance; not that any Popish adviser might obtain a situation near the throne; not that the Roman Catholics, if admitted to an equal participation in the constitution, would become bad subjects—for we had found that even under all their privations they had been faithful and loyal. We had to fear not any of these dangers, but dangers of a new and different kind. The hon. member for Louth had spoken alarmingly of six, or five, or four millions of persons in the communion of the Roman Catholic Church. What he feared was to see four millions—taking them at the lowest—of subjects, having wealth, power, and respectability on their side, awakened to a full sense of their condition, coming up year after year to claim the rights and privileges enjoyed by their fellow-subjects, and retiring dejected and disappointed continually (loud cheers). That was the danger the house had to fear. Yet the hon. member for Louth would persist in telling them not to look at the dangers of their own times, but to go back to the reformation, the reign of James II., and the revolution. He would say that the present danger was the greatest, perhaps the only one for them to consider. The other argument proved a want of acquaintance with human nature; an ignorance of the use and application of the manual of history. It had been well said by one of our greatest philosophers, "that time is the greatest of all innovators" (cheers). Time never slept—never stopped;—it moved on with rapidity and with certainty, changing in its course the aspect of all human affairs (cheers); and it was the province of human wisdom to keep close to the wings of time—not for the purpose of destroying their effect, or wresting their course—either would be an impossibility—but in order so to direct the government of a state, as to make its varying form correspond with the varying form of time and circumstances (cheers). If we went back to the necessities of former times, in order to justify our legislation at the present day, we should be led into gross error; we should make history no better than an old almanack; we should make experience no better than a swindler, who thrusts upon us a false coin which we utter at its imaginary value; we should make knowledge and prudence change their names for folly and dotage (cheers). He did not mean to assert that there were not many dangers on the present occasion, but the question was, how to meet them? If the Roman Catholics came in a clamorous and turbulent manner; if they raised the shouts of expected triumph, he should laugh at their insolence; if they came with threats and menaces, he should despise their insolent boasting; if they came with force and arms he should meet them with force, and easily subdue them; but when they came before us humbly to solicit justice—when they came before us to implore an equal participation in the blessings of the British constitution, he confessed he had no armour with which to oppose them (loud cheers), and he knew of no mode of treating them but that of taking them to his arms as allies, friends, and equals (cheers); as men who were to enjoy equal rights and privileges with himself, and who were cordially to co-operate with him for the defence and security of this country, be it at peace or be it at war (loud cheers). They were told that there was a bar—that the principles of the constitution were opposed to the admission of the Roman Catholics. He had read with eagerness—he had carried on his researches with deep anxiety—he had endeavoured hard to find out where that principle could be discovered, and he solemnly declared that he could not discover it. It had been urged that there was a material difference between civil and political rights, and that dissenters from the Established Church, though enjoying the one, were debarred from the other. Did not every day's experience disprove that assumption? Was not the hon. member for Norwich a proof of the contrary? Had there not been a Lord Chancellor of England (Lord Rosslyn) who was a Dissenter? Were hon. members ignorant of what had been doing in Ireland? The test laws had there been repealed for fifty years, and the dissenting influence had ever since been on the decline (loud cheers). When that repeal was talked of, there was great alarm. Dean Swift, with all his wit and talents, felt and spoke of it with horror, and prognosticated from it the immediate downfall of the Established Church and Protestantism. For forty years past it had not been heard of, was almost forgotten; and the Dissenters had ever since declined (cheers). On the other hand, the laws of persecution had remained in force against the Catholics, and that body had gone on increasing in numbers, in influence, and in respectability (cheers). But it was said the Roman Catholics must not expect political power; that the constitution prohibited. Was there nothing of political power in what they possessed? They had the right of electing members to serve in Parliament. They acted as magistrates; they served as jurors. This country had liberally imparted education to them; did not that put the means of political power within their reach? Where was this line of difference between civil and political power marked in the constitution? The warmth of discussion apart, he denounced the doctrine as inconsistent with the principles of our free constitution, and only fitted for the meridian of a despotic government. He once endeavoured to define civil liberty to the house; he used the description which he found in the books—Civil liberty consists in doing all that which the law allows you to do. But he went beyond that. There was also a political liberty which secured every man the exercise and enjoyment of civil liberty. Once admit men to enjoy property, personal rights, and their equal consequences, and on what pretence could they be excluded from the institutions by which the whole of these must be guarded? It was asked, what have the Roman Catholics to complain of? They are only excluded from the Parliament, the bench, and the offices of state (cheers)—which meant, that they were only excluded from the making and administering of the laws, and from all posts of honour and dignity (cheers). These were bagatelles, for which, according to the argument, it was not worth while for the Catholics to contend, and therefore it was scarcely worth the while of the Parliament to refuse. How would the learned gent. who used this argument like to be excluded from his chance for these trifling privileges (loud cheers)? He begged to ask if these were not the very privileges in defence of which Englishmen would cheerfully lay down their lives (loud cheers)? Did they still talk of the danger of admitting the Catholics? He put it to the house to consider if they would willingly see such a body represented any where but within the walls of Parliament. Shutting them out from Parliament, after giving them every thing else to render them of consequence, was teaching them to array themselves elsewhere. Somewhere else they must go, if the house could not make room for them. God forbid the recurrence of bad times; but it might happen that a bad prince might mount the throne, and then, perhaps, being refused admission where they had a right to it, they would range themselves behind the throne and assist in the sacrifice of these liberties in which they never participated. His learned friend, the Solicitor-General, was satisfied as to the laity, whom he considered as sufficiently good subjects. The danger which his learned friend apprehended was from the Roman Catholic church. He dreaded, in a country where the majority differed from the religion of the state, the uncontrollable and all-controlling influence of priests, who were themselves detached from the state. France, it had been said, had of late shown herself active on the subject of religion; and looking at what might be her views with regard to Ireland, there would be great danger. If the measure now proposed had for its object or tendency to increase the power of the Roman Catholic clergy, then there might be grounds to pause and to think the measure attended with danger. But had his learned friend any remedy of his own, since he did not choose theirs? His was the old pancea of trusting to time and proselytism. Much might be done by proselytism. The children of their children might see strange things—they might see the portals of the constitution thrown wide open to all religious persuasions. But that prospect was remote and uncertain; while the dangers around them were clear and imminent. So long as a line of demarcation was continued between Protestants and Catholics, so long the latter were aliens to the state; in the meanwhile proselytism would be at a stand, for any man who became a Protestant under such circumstances would be abhorred as an abject apostate. As to the measures calculated to remedy these evils, he would begin by doing away grievances; he would first relieve those who were bound by a common bond of oppression. He would make a respectable provision for the Irish Roman Catholic clergy. In his opinion this should accompany the bill of emancipation. They had been told that the Irish clergy would not accept it. He gave assurance, upon a considerable experience of that country, that they would receive it with sentiments of gratitude. The Roman Catholic clergy would not, it was true, purchase a permanent provision by the disgrace of having abandoned their flocks, but if the laity were relieved from disabilities they would gratefully receive it. There was no danger of their ever attempting to usurp the Protestant hierarchy. If that hierarchy were destroyed to-morrow, and offered to the Roman Catholic clergy, the laity would not permit them to accept it. Honourable members who knew any thing of Ireland must know the opposition which would be made by the laity to the resumption of power and tithes by their own clergy. But if the Protestant clergy persevered in resisting the claims of the Roman Catholics, was it not compelling the Catholics to oppose the Protestant clergy in self defence? He was a zealous supporter of the Established Church, but when he had been most zealous, he had never rendered it better service than in giving this salutary warning. If a foreign enemy were landing on the coast to-morrow, the house would not grant to the Roman Catholics any thing it could not concede with honour and safety to the Established Church. It was because he knew no such danger existed at present that he called on them to do that which a sense of justice ought to compel them to do even in a time of the greatest danger. Let them not be told of the want of acquiescence in the Catholic body. Take away the grievances first; then if the concurrence of that body were improperly withheld, they would be deprived of the power to do injury because they would be deprived of the power of just complaint. The Roman Catholics of Ireland were at present loyal and tranquil; they were determined to remain so. They were satisfied that there was a feeling in this country sufficiently favourable to them, and that something must sooner or later be done for them. The increase of wealth and other advantages which they enjoyed taught them to expect their freedom with becoming patience. If France or any other power speculated on dividing Ireland from the empire they deceived themselves grossly. The Catholics of Ireland would rally round the constitution at their approach. Why? Because the laws passed in the last thirty-five years had imparted to them advantages which they would not risk, much less exchange, for the chances of foreign rule. But he wished for something from them beyond loyalty; he wanted their affection and cordiality, and their unrestrained confidence; and he would obtain these by giving them an equal participation in the blessings of the constitution (loud and continued cheers).

Mr. Peel did not find all the arguments he had heard sufficient to induce him to deviate from the course he had uniformly pursued. He thought the hon. bart. in his able and conciliatory speech, had introduced the question on its true grounds—on the grounds of positive treaty, natural rights, and political expediency; and in that order he would examine his arguments. If in the first place there really existed a claim on the part of the Roman Catholics, established by solemn treaty, he should be disposed to treat it with the utmost deference. But he denied that the Catholics could claim any privileges on the foundation of the treaty of Limerick, or that any privileges had been withholden in violation of its terms. He would not now enter into the question whether the act passed in the reign of Queen Anne was an infraction of that treaty. He admitted that that statute was an unjustifiable measure; but the house must consider that it was an act of retaliation against the Catholics for what they had done while in possession of political power. By the first article of the treaty the Roman Catholics were exempted from all molestation on account of their religious tenets: by other articles they might claim the privileges of property on taking no oath but that of allegiance. The hon. bart. extended their right to a claim that the Roman Catholics should be entitled to the enjoyment of office on taking the oath of allegiance only: that he denied, and rested his denial upon the speech of Sir Theobald Butler, who was employed by the Roman Catholics to speak in the House of Lords against the bill for preventing the growth of Popery. The whole of his argument went to show, that the six objectionable clauses of the act were an infraction of the rights not of the Roman Catholics, but of the Dissenters. Yet he was Solicitor to James II., and employed in drawing up the treaty of Limerick. "The 10th, 11th, 12th, 13th, and 14th clauses of the bill," said he, "relate to offices and employments, which the Papists of Ireland cannot hope for the enjoyment of, otherwise than by grace and favour extraordinary: and therefore do not so much affect them as it does the Protestant Dissenters, who, if this bill pass into a law, are equally with the Papists deprived of bearing any office, civil or military, under the Government, to which by right of birth, and the laws of the land, they are as indisputably entitled as any other their Protestant brethren; and if what the Irish did in the late disorders of the kingdom made them rebels—which the presence of a king they had before been obliged to own, and swear obedience to, gave them a reasonable colour of concluding it did not—yet surely the Dissenters did not do any thing to make them so, or to deserve worse at the hands of the Government than other Protestants. Whatsoever the Papists may be supposed to have deserved, the Dissenters certainly stand as clean in the face of the present Government as any other people whatsoever: and if this is all the return they are like to get, it will be but a slender encouragement, if ever occasion should require for others to pursue their example." With respect to the claim on the ground of natural right, it had been agreed that the legislature had no more right to exclude the Roman Catholics from office than to divest them of their property: but he could not allow that the subjects of this country had any such claim as an abstract right, and he did not believe that the doctrine had been maintained until the year 1790. Previously to the reformation there had been no dissent, and consequently no motive to exclude; no reason for frauds or checks: but ever since the reformation—for 300 years—that oath had been enforced which had operated to the exclusion of the Roman Catholics. As far as the practice of the constitution was concerned, it had gone in contradiction of the doctrine advanced by his learned friend. And when it was said that this principle of exclusion had existed from a period comprising about 150 years past, he must deny such proposition (hear, hear), for in his judgment it had its origin with the first rise of dissent in matters of religion. But let the house inquire a little what had been the doctrine of the most celebrated men in respect of this exclusion from civil offices. He had before had occasion to refer to certain opinions which he was sure would be received with the highest respect, particularly by hon. gents. on the opposite side. He would now allude to a former conference of this house with the Lords, on this very subject of right and capacity as to civil offices. It might be proper to premise, that the Lords had objected to a bill which subjected to certain penalties those who should appear to have been guilty of occasional conformity. Among other important doctrines they declared, at this conference, that "Their lordships looked on the power of demanding qualifications for offices of trust to be one so naturally lodged with the legislature, that without being required to assign any reason for it, but on any apprehension of danger, however distant it might be, every Government might put such restraints, and regulate by such rules the entering into offices of trust as they should see sufficient cause for. But penalties and punishments were of a different nature from such restraints." Now could any thing be more clearly laid down than this distinction between penalties and disqualifications for office—between punishments and disabilities? That was managed by the Duke of Devonshire; the Earl of Peterborough; Burnett, Bishop of Salisbury; Lord Halifax, and the great Lord Somers (hear, hear). But if this authority would not satisfy his rt. hon. friend, what would he say to that article in the Act of Union with Scotland, by which Roman Catholics were permanently excluded from certain offices in Scotland? If, as it had been contended, there were an inherent natural right in members of the community to claim office, and that right were, as it had been represented, analogous to the right of property, was it possible to conceive that the great men who framed the Act of Union with Scotland would have ever introduced into that important measure the principle of exclusion, without reference to the dangers which were to be apprehended from its omission? And yet, without any of those immediate dangers from the power and tenets of the Roman Catholic church, about which the rt. hon. gent. had spoken as the only causes that could justify such a measure now, the law of exclusion was introduced into that Act of Union. He wished that the house would look at the debates of Parliament in the years 1771 and 1772, on the Quebec Act. Earl Camden and Lord Chatham both contended, "that the oath of supremacy was the great charter of the established religion of the kingdom." How could these opinions be reconciled with the doctrine of natural right? It must be admitted, indeed, that in the conference already referred to, the Lords acknowledged that exclusion by law from office was one of the severest punishments which could be inflicted on any class of subjects (cheers from the Opposition). But at a still more recent period of our history, 1790, when there were some very important discussions on the repeal of the test laws, Mr. Pitt did not support the principle of the rt. hon. gent. who had addressed the house this night. And yet Mr. Pitt was the warm friend of the Roman Catholic claims. Mr. Pitt said, "that if dissent were entertained of any one of the three branches of the constitution, it ought to be directed against the executive. The person excluded by the test laws laboured under no kind of stigma; but it was the policy of private life not to allow any man to manage your affairs whose principles you did not like." The same principle prevailed at present in this empire in respect to eligibility to the offices in question. If this doctrine of exclusion was not to be defended on such principles, on what grounds was the partial exclusion of the Protestant subject from the exercise of the elective franchise to be defended? The theory of the constitution was this—that no man was to be bound by laws to which he himself did not assent—that no laws were to bind, in the passing of which he had not a vote. But did not every hon. gent. know, that practically speaking all this was not true? On what principle, again, was it that no man could sit in that house unless he were possessed of 300*l.* a-year? If the doctrine maintained by his rt. hon. friend were true, why might not the man of 200*l.* a-year sit there (hear, hear)? Or why might not all the inhabitants of the kingdom send him? He contended that the state had a right to exclude on any apprehension of danger: He might make history a miserable almanack, or convert experience into a swindler who passed base coin; but if he were to follow the advice of the hon. baronet he should derive no benefit from history, no lesson from experience: he should neither take a retrospect of the past nor a prospect of the future. He therefore felt himself compelled to deny the existence of the supposed abstract right; and though he did not feel himself conclusively bound by the existence of former laws, yet where he found a law had been passed 300 years ago to guard against dangers which he thought were still to be apprehended, he would not consent to the repeal of the law till it was proved to him that these dangers no longer existed. Exclusion from admissibility to office, was, he admitted, a serious evil; but it was a much less evil than those which would follow upon its removal; and this brought him to the third branch of the question, the political expediency of the measure proposed. The object of the hon. bart. he presumed, was to invest the Roman Catholics with admissibility to office, with a fair share in the framing and administration of laws; and the question was, whether the proposed measure of relief would conduce to the restoration of tranquillity? If he (Mr. P.) thought that it would—if he could persuade himself that having passed it, there would be an end of those unhappy animosities which all persons must unite in lamenting—he would not oppose any theory of the constitution to such an immense practical advantage. It was because he doubted whether the removal of disabilities would have the effect of re-establishing tranquillity, that he opposed the motion. Were these civil disabilities the cause of those disorders which had so long ravaged Ireland? If they were, how happened it that in the province of Ulster, where the numbers of the Roman Catholics and of the Protestants were more nearly balanced than in other part of Ireland—the Insurrection Act had never been enforced? In fact, the removal of disabilities, to the extent to which that removal had yet been carried, had never, hitherto, had the effect of tranquillizing the people. In 1792, the Roman Catholics confined themselves to asking for admission to the magistracy, and extension of the elective franchise to freeholds of 12*l.* a-year. The elective franchise was confirmed to them to the full extent in which it was enjoyed by the Protestants; and forty-thilling Catholic freeholders were created, in all respects on the same footing as Protestant freeholders; besides this, Roman Catholics were admitted to serve on grand juries. But, since these concessions, had the religious animosities of Ireland been at all allayed? He knew hon. gent. on the other side would probably answer, "nothing effectual could be done while any thing was withheld; and the true secret of conciliation consisted in rendering Roman Catholics and Protestants equal in all civil respects, and in removing all Catholic disabilities" (hear, from the Opposition). Still it would be impossible to satisfy the Roman Catholics, even if their claims should be acceded to, that the distribution of offices was made without partiality or favour on the part of the Crown and of Government, when there were no longer any legal grounds of exclusion. They would entertain a jealousy of the Government, and consider the exclusion of a Roman Catholic, however accidental, a personal measure. It would appear that there were in Ireland about 4,500,000 Roman Catholics, and 1,800,000 Protestants. Here was an enormous disproportion of numbers. But the landed property possessed by the Protestants was as to that possessed by the Catholics in the proportion of about 20 to 1. It had, indeed, been stated as high as 50 to 1; but perhaps it was safer to take the former estimate. Was he to be told, that, retaining the religion of the minority as the religion of the state, it would be safe to allow the majority to come into an equal participation with them of rights and power (hear, hear)? It was to be recollected that the temporalities of that state religion were once possessed by that majority: and as long as that was the case, it was absurd to suppose that the Roman Catholics would be content with what they could get by the mere concession of their claims to be relieved of civil disabilities (hear, hear). As to the security of an oath, he did not at all mean to say, that he would not believe a Roman Catholic upon his oath; but it must still be asked, with what feelings—if he were actuated by the ordinary feelings of a man—would he look at the Protestant religion, its church, and its clergy? Would he look with the same eyes as we upon the principal epochs of our history (hear, hear)? At the Reformation, for instance, and the Revolution? Must he not regard the separation of our church, and the suppression of his own, as acts altogether unjustifiable? And yet it was proposed to admit the Roman Catholic, with feelings of this sort, to a participation in the privileges of the Protestant community. The bill which was to be brought in would admit the Catholic to office if the King approved the appointment, and on equal terms with the Protestant. Of what injustice would not the Roman Catholic have to complain of, if, after developing in Parliament all the talents and the zeal which might recommend him to the most important posts in an administration, the King, acting upon his right of sanctioning or withholding his appointment, were to refuse to consent to his entering upon the discharge of such high official functions; and yet, whatever might be his talents, could it be maintained that such a person would be well qualified to advise the Crown upon matters connected with the welfare of the Church of England? It would be much better, by keeping to the existing law, to prevent difficulties of this kind, than to leave the whole matter so to be dealt with by the discretion of the Crown. It was impossible altogether to lay out of view the spirit and temper of the Roman Catholic religion itself; and turning to these, he confessed that he looked with the greatest alarm to the restoration of the Catholics to power. In that case, too, the connexion of the Roman Catholic religion with the state would be one of a new character. It was proposed to grant an establishment, and funds to be voted by the Government for the support of the Catholic clergy. It would be difficult to conceive the multiplied inconveniences and animosities that must arise from two establishments with almost similar hierarchies, the Roman Catholic prelaty boasting its apostolic transmission. In proof of the little alteration which the spirit of the Roman Catholic religion seemed to have experienced from time, notwithstanding all its asserted improvement in the 19th century, he read a passage from a work relative to the miracles performed by Prince Hohenlohe. Her highness the Princess Matilda Von Schwartzenberg, of Wurzburg, was among the cures. She had been lame from her 8th to her 17th year, and had vainly expended on medical aid 50,000 florins, but was cured by the Prince's intercession. He inferred, that the Wurzburg doctors who got 80,000 florins had had a very fine time of it, and that the name of Prince Hohenlohe could not be very popular among them (continued laughter). But at Bamberg the Prince's success was yet more miraculous. Four sisters, who had all been confined with lameness for ten years, were cured (a laugh). Councillor Jacob, a councillor of state, who had not stirred out of his chamber for some years, suddenly accompanied his doctor from the third story to the street door (a laugh). A beneficed clergyman was cured of the gout while passing through the streets of Bamberg, without ever getting out of his carriage (a laugh); and besides these famed persons, an upholsterer, a saddler, and a stonemason, had been all operated on by similar miracles (a laugh). Honourable gentlemen might laugh, if they pleased, at so much credulity; but they should know, that in no part of the world were the wonder-workings of Prince Hohenlohe talked of with more profound respect and faith than in Ireland (hear, hear). The rt. hon. gent. next read from a book, signed J. K. L., but said to be written by Dr. Doyle, a communication (The Encyclical Letter) to the whole Roman Catholic communion of Ireland, of the rescript of Leo XII., the present Pope, addressed to the Bishops, &c. complaining of the mischief effected by Bible Societies; and containing the passage—"The power of temporal princes will, we trust in the Lord, come to your assistance (hear, hear), whose interests, as experience shows, are always concerned when yours are in danger; for it never hath happened that the things which are Cæsar's are given unto Cæsar, if the things which are God's be not given unto God." If any thing were wanting to convince him of the necessity of retaining the oath of supremacy in this country, he should find it in the admission of such letters as these. The concessions proposed to be made would not allay the animosities of the Irish, or satisfy their demands; as indeed Dr. Doyle himself seemed to think when he talked of the "ulterior measures" that would be necessary after Catholic Emancipation. He assured the house that he had no personal interest against the Catholics, but was convinced that the welfare of the country demanded his opposition. He thought it would be just that every thing in the nature of a penal law should be repealed. The Roman Catholics ought to have every fair protection, to enjoy every liberty, and be allowed the possession of property, and ought to enjoy in every respect the same privileges as other subjects. He was as anxious as any one to quiet all feelings of irritation, and to put an end to these dissensions. But he was convinced, for the reasons he had stated, that the concessions which were sought were utterly incompatible with the welfare of the kingdom (cheers).

Mr. Brougham could not allow the speech of the rt. hon. gent. nor the new topics which had been introduced in it, to pass unnoticed, notwithstanding the late hour of the night. The arguments which those who supported the motion had urged, remained untouched by any thing the rt. hon. gent. had said. The speech of the rt. hon. Sec. for Foreign Affairs remained unanswered, as he believed it was unanswerable (hear, hear). When the rt. hon. gent. supposed that the hon. bart. in alluding to the treaty of Limerick, meant to rest upon it the strongest part of the case, he was mistaken. The hon. bart. only touched upon it because it was in the petition, and without laying any greater stress upon it than it deserved. But no one could deny that in all the stages of the question it formed a very important feature. It was now 130 years since that treaty was made. It had been violated; by whom he cared not; but the wrong done by that violation was perpetuated by the Parliament of the present day, if they refused to fulfil it. One clause in the treaty promised, in express terms, that the Catholics should enjoy the same privileges they had been in possession of in the reign of Charles II. In that reign they possessed the privilege of being eligible to Parliament. They had access to all the offices of the state, and from these they were now wholly shut out. There was a passage in Mr. Burke's posthumous works, in which reference was made: to this treaty, and to the injustice which the Catholics suffered from its not having been carried into effect; the consequence of which was, that they were precluded from their natural rights, and from the benefits of society. That brought him to the second head of the rt. hon. gent.'s arguments, and he contended that natural rights stood on the same footing as civil rights. To have the privilege of being elected, as well as that of electing, was the right of every man who was capable of exercising it; and to say that a man who was in every way fit to serve the state, who was, in point of wealth, abilities, acquired knowledge, and all necessary requisites, most competent to discharge the duties of the station he was to fill—to say that such a man should not be elected because he conscientiously believed in the worship of the mass, and in the doctrine of transubstantiation, was a wrong, and a deprivation not to be justified. It was true that private rights were every day sacrificed when the interests of the community demanded it: but, as in bills for railroads and canals, the necessity of the sacrifice was always first made apparent. There was no such necessity in the case of Catholic exclusion, and what folly was it at this time of day to tell us that it was only from political rights the Catholics were excluded—to say that the Catholics of the present day were not, like their ancestors, ousted of their property, because they worshipped God according to the dictates of their consciences—to tell them that they were no longer the hewers of wood and the drawers of water to their Protestant brethren—that they were privileged to eat and drink, and be clothed—that they were no longer persecuted and tortured for their religion's sake—and that all the disabilities they lay under were such as they might therefore ensure without repining? Were they not shut out from all that dignified and exalted the character of men in society? Was not a broad distinction drawn between them and us, which made their lot as degrading as ours was splendid? Were not the portals of the temple of honour shut against them? Were not the entrances to the legislature barred? Had they any voice in making the laws which they were compelled to obey, or in the imposition of the taxes which were levied upon them? Were they not deprived of all share in the civil government of the state, and did they not endure all this because they dared to be honest and to worship God according to the religion of their ancestors and the religion of their own hearts? What worse than folly was it, then, to say that these were only political disabilities—that this privation of all the civil rights best worth enjoying could be justified? The concessions which had already been made, were, in a great degree, illusory. Did they think they gave men the right to elect, and to send members to Parliament for the purpose of representing their opinions, and advocating their interests, if they told them at the same time, "You have full power to choose whom you please, excepting those whom, of all others, you wish to choose?" The only value of the elective franchise was, that it enabled men to send to Parliament persons who agreed with them in political sentiments. He would suppose, for example, that the Tories, having the right to impose such terms on the Whigs, should say to them, "We look upon you all as damnable heretics; you profess political opinions which have kept you out of power for 60 years, as we Tories were kept out of power for 60 years before, in consequence of the opinions we entertain. We consider, that of all heresies yours is the most detestable; you believe, that all power is held in trust for the people; and he who thinks this is 'fit for treasons, stratagems, and spoils—let no such man be trusted.' If the benches on that side of this house should be filled with Whigs like you, no one could tell what might be the consequence. But we mean to confer upon you the elective right: you shall send whom you please to Parliament, but you shall select them from the body of the Tories." The members of the Universities of Cambridge and Oxford would little like the application of this principle to themselves. They would feel it something like injustice to be told, "You may elect whom you will, excepting persons of your own body. They are all a set of men whose minds are narrowed by prejudice, and darkened by learned ignorance. They are persons to whom history is merely an almanack, and experience a swindler—to whom knowledge is pedantry, and caution dottage. They shall not be allowed to take their places here, because they will oppose every thing which tends to the improvement of mankind, and to the diffusion of wise and liberal principles. You may choose any body else you like, but we will have none from Cambridge or Oxford. Go to the University of St. Andrew's and Aberdeen, where there are many able, liberal, and enlightened men. None of the prejudices which grow so luxuriantly on the banks of Granta or Isis can have extended their influence to them: they will not endeavour upon all occasions to prevent the march of improvement, and the progress of the human mind (hear, hear)." He did not think the members of Cambridge or Oxford would thank the house for such an elective franchise. The Catholics scarcely did so when they obtained it, although as it was the first, it was a very important concession to them. When Lord Buckinghamshire (then Major Hobart), in the year 1793, brought in and carried a bill, which had been rejected in 1790, and which was only granted at last—as the history of Ireland would show every thing had been granted—because the Government was in some difficulty, he was asked whether he was instructed to say that the Catholics would be satisfied with having the elective franchise granted to them? His answer was, that they could not be satisfied. But leaving the history and the natural justice of the question, he came to the expediency of emancipating the Catholics from the disabilities they had so long suffered under. There was a great fallacy in the argument of the rt. hon. gent. As combatants were apt to do—he looked only on the side on which he fought, and forgot that the same complaint which he made of the vexation on one side, applied to the other. For example, much stress was laid upon the danger which must arise to the Protestant establishment, owing to the great disproportion of the numbers of the Catholics. This was exactly what he (Mr. B.) said. He saw that they were surrounded by peril, and he wished them to find their way out. The rt. hon. gent. saw it too, but he said, “Let us do nothing, and wait the event.” But the rt. hon. gent. said, have not the Catholics power now? They had not that power to which they were entitled, and of which he believed they neither would nor could make any improper use. If they were admitted to that house, the stigma which rested upon them would be removed, and a general conciliation would be effected. His belief was, that if as many Catholics as could be supposed should be returned to Parliament, thirty or forty for example, not one proposition against the Church would proceed from them. The Dissenters, of whom there were as many in number out of doors as of the Established Church, had only four or five of their body in the house, and from them no proposals had ever been made of a nature hostile to the church establishment. He was not a little surprised to hear the statement which the rt. hon. gent. had made respecting the supposed effect which the miracle of Prince Hohenlohe had produced. If he had wanted an antidote to the alarm which the rt. hon. gent. had attempted to excite, he should have thought he had found it in the pamphlet which the rt. hon. gent. had so gravely read to the house. Would any body believe that an assembly of educated men, with all their Protestant prejudices in their bosoms, could be influenced by such trumpety fanaticism? Could it be supposed that the admission of a few lords into one house, and of commoners into the other, would have the effect of overthrowing Dr. Middleton's Free Inquiry, and induce a belief in the stories of the cures performed on a saddler, on a prioress, and on a gouty old man? If this pamphlet were the most reductive of all the legends that the Church of Rome ever vomited forth—and he could assure the rt. hon. gent. that there were many most ingenious productions—he would pick out three of the weakest men in the house—he meant on his side of the house—where the men must, of necessity, be weak, since, although they had no test act applied to them, they had kept out of office for sixty years; to those three he would add six others from out of the house, all of whom should pore over it for a whole calendar month, and they should not only be neither converted nor perverted, but confirmed in their faith by the perusal. The rt. hon. gent. had read, too, with a triumphant air, a declaration of Pope Leo XII., in which he expressed his expectations that Bible Societies would be put down by Geo. IV. and other temporal princes. But the Pope was not alone in his wish to prevent the dissemination of the Bible without note or comment. The same sentiments were avowed by the heads of the Universities; and he had read a clever but injudicious pamphlet by the Archbishop of Canterbury's chaplain, in which this Romish doctrine was laboriously enforced. Were there no Dissenters in that house who held offices? In certain cases were not the ordinary tests dispensed with by law? Had this country never seen a Lord Chancellor, with the patronage of the Church in his hand; professing the doctrines of a Presbyterian? Had this country never seen a state minister who was imbued with the heresy of Socinus, as the established Church called it? All these they might have had in office, some of them they certainly had, wielding all the power of the State, directing the monarch in all his measures; and had any danger, during those periods, menaced the safety of the Church? Had his hon. friend near him (Mr. W. Smith), ever made any attempt to undermine the interests of the Established Church? Had any Dissenter who had ever entered that house, made such an effort? No. Years had revolved—very nearly a century had passed by since that body were permitted to enjoy those privileges which the Catholics now called for—and no such attempt had they made during that period. And yet they were now told—ay, gravely told—that right, and justice, and expedience, must, in the case of the Roman Catholics, be thrown aside, because, if they were restored to their privileges as freemen, the Church would be in danger (hear, hear). But had the Catholics no power at this moment? He entreated the house to consider the subject in that point of view. They had power as great, in degree, as if they were admitted into Parliament; but of a much worse quality. It was, at present, a dangerous—it might become a mischievous, a fatal power. Let the legislature, then, convert it into a regular, constitutional, proper power; and there was an end of the danger. He would name no man; but this he would say, that greater natural abilities, more acquired talents, finer skill, and, what he would very much dread to encounter in an opponent, nicer discretion, he never saw displayed, in a more extensive degree, than by those who now conducted the affairs of the Roman Catholics (hear, hear). He spoke not merely from public report; but also from private knowledge. Men so accomplished—so richly endowed by nature—so much improved by study—backed by their countrymen, he cared not whether six, or five, or four millions—such men, it must be admitted, possessed power. That which he had described was power, or he knew not what power was. The power which those persons wielded was dreaded by the Government. Why did he assert that it was dreaded? Because, to control that power the government broke through the principles of the constitution, and enacted mischievous and revolting laws. His passion was—“Give to those people their birth-right: you thus take that power from them. Let the six millions be sixty millions; if they have no grievance, you have no cause of fear. Act thus, and all this national talent—all this acquired ability—all this practised skill—all this nicely-balanced discretion, will be exerted for your service—will no longer be wielded against you" (hear, hear). The elements of strife and confusion were abused. The energies which often accompanied political disappointment, the fire which always attended religious zeal, and the discontent which a refusal of justice must ever engender, might when combined, produce the most fearful effects. His remedy was plain and rational—"Take all those elements into your own hands—work them properly—control them, not by coercion but by kindness—attract them to you by benefits, instead of repelling them by injuries; and no longer will you lie down under the apprehension of nightly insurrection" (hear, hear). The rt. hon. gent. said, even if he were a friend to this measure, he would not be frightened into it. This was the worst of all possible arguments. Why should any man say, "I will abstain from doing right, because it is boldly demanded?" It was degrading for a man, through fear, to submit to do that which he ought not to do; and was it not equally degrading, from a principle of obstinacy, to refuse to do that which he ought to do? He would put this argument of not being threatened into compliance, to those who were well-wishers to the measure. If they adopted the argument, they would in effect say, "I wish to carry the measure; but, alas! you frighten me!" It was declaring, "We wish for the measure, and the legislature is bound to listen to the proposition; but the present is a time of danger, and we will not concede this measure on compulsion." This, however, was a fallacy. No government, no legislature, need fear the attack of factious men, if justice were done to the community. But that which was really formidable, that which the legislature ought to listen to, was the fear of doing wrong and injustice. Such acts were criminal in themselves—such acts were formidable, for they tended to produce discontent, with all its train of evils. The Catholics were now asking for that which was reasonable; but, said the rt. hon. gent., "If we grant this, they will ask for something that is unreasonable;"—then, he would say, wait till they make the demand, and then refuse them; but do not reject a reasonable suit, from the fear that an unreasonable one, which might be rejected, should follow. He was astonished when he heard the rt. hon. gent. state that no mention was made of securities. He had distinctly heard his hon. friend say, that he would vote for no bill unless it was stated in the preamble that the Protestant Church, as it now existed, in Ireland as in England, should be inviolably preserved. He understood him to say, that securities were to be introduced substantially the same as those which were contained in the former bill, and that a new one, and he conceived the best, would be added—namely, provision for the whole of the Catholic clergy. The course which he now advocated, he had suggested long before the Catholic Association was in being. If that course were pursued, he was sure the Roman Catholics would be satisfied, and that Ireland would be placed in a state of safety. What might happen if this proposition were not agreed to, he could not say. But well he knew what dire effects were produced when those who had the power of conciliation in their hands, permitted eternally in perpetrating wrong, instead of doing justice. And he thought that if the measure now proposed were not carried, the peace of Ireland would be placed in jeopardy. He earnestly and solemnly entreated the house to take that opportunity, while a measure of a different description was pending in another place, to adopt a line of policy which would improve the state of Ireland—would reconcile the Catholic and Protestant body, and would put an end to all those factions and dissensions which had so long distracted that country (hear, hear).

Sir C. Fortescue opposed the motion, on the ground that the Catholic Association threatened that if Emancipation were not granted voluntarily, they would compel the house to concede that measure.

Sir F. Burdett having briefly replied, the house divided, when the numbers were—

For the motion, 247—Against it, 234—Majority, 13.

TUESDAY, MARCH 15.—Lord Palmerston presented a petition from the Chancellor, Masters, and Scholars of the University of Cambridge, against the concession of any further claims to the Catholics. The petitioners declared, that though their apprehensions on this subject had been often previously stated to the house, they had recently been much strengthened by the violent language used by the Catholics in this country. The petitioners discovered, both in that language and in the language used by the Catholics elsewhere, proofs of their entertaining principles hostile to religious liberty. They were convinced that if the concessions which the Catholics now asked were granted, they would lead to fresh demands. They also thought that the measures which they sought to carry could only be devised with the intention of producing a great change in the Church Establishment of England. They therefore prayed the house not to entertain the question, and more especially not to entertain that part of it which went to admit Roman Catholics into the great council of the nation. The noble lord, without any further observation, moved that the petition be brought up.

Mr. W. J. Banks rose to say a few words in support of this petition. He would mention a fact connected with it, which might, perhaps, give it a stronger recommendation to the notice of gentlemen on the opposite benches, than it would otherwise possess. Those who were at all acquainted with the institutions of our Universities, were aware that it was seldom that a layman filled the office of Vice-Chancellor. A layman, however, Mr. Le Blanc, now filled it, and fully concurred in the prayer of the petition. It was consequently a petition which expressed the sentiments, not merely of the clerical, but also of the lay members of the University, and therefore might be received without exciting the sneers and tauntings which had been excited by some petitions on the same subject, for no other cause that he could learn, except that they came from clergymen. He protested against the scoffs which were cast upon the petitions of the clergy; considering their education, their rank in life, and their importance in the country, they were entitled at any rate to attention and respect. If a word were said against the army, the navy, the law, or the commerce of the country, there would be members belonging to those different occupations ready enough to start up, and retort with interest the sarcasm on the offender. The clergyman, however, was obliged to silence, and could not defend himself by the eloquence of any of his brethren. They were the only class of men not represented in that house: they ought, therefore, to be defended by the generosity of the house against sneers and sarcasms, which, if they meant any thing, could only mean that they ought not to come there as petitioners. He contrasted the different modes in which the petitions of the Catholic clergy and those of the Established Church were received by the house. The former were heard with kindness and attention, and were made the subject of lofty encomiums; the latter were flouted and discountenanced, and all but laughed out of the house. He thought that hon. gentlemen would perform their duty in a more fair and candid manner, by listening to the arguments which the clergy urged against these claims, than by denouncing them, without examination, as absurd and ridiculous, and by assailing them with laughter as soon as they were brought into the house.

Mr. Hume protested against the language of the hon. member who had just sat down, as utterly uncalled for by any thing which had occurred in that house. It would be preposterous indeed for men who professed liberal principles, to adopt such an illiberal mode of proceeding (hear, hear). The hon. gentleman had raised a phantom, which had no existence but in his own mind, for the sole purpose of demolishing it after it had been raised. What he (Mr. Hume) had said regarding the clergy on a former night, he was ready to say again. He had expressed his regret that the clergymen of England, who were so superior to the generality of the people, in education and rank in life, should be a century behind them in mildness and liberality of feeling. With Christian charity always in their mouths, they ought to exhibit a little more of Christian charity in their practice. Enjoying civil rights themselves, they ought not to seek to debar others from full participation in them. If there were any difference in the attention which the house bestowed on the petitions received from the Catholics and the established clergy, it was owing to this circumstance—that the former petitioned for justice, whilst the latter sought to perpetuate injustice (hear, hear).

Sir Etiah Harvey begged to observe, in corroboration of what had just fallen from the hon. member for the University of Cambridge, that when he presented the petition from the Archdeaconry of Essex, which did equal honour to the hearts and heads of those who signed it, it was received with an uproar and clamour which was more worthy of a bear-garden than of the House of Commons (hear, hear).

Mr. Spring Rice allowed that the petition was entitled to every attention; but at the same time, it ought not to be taken as conveying the unanimous opinion of the University. There were a great many of the resident members who dissented from its prayer; and among them some of the most enlightened and popular members of the Senate.

The petition was then laid on the table.

THURSDAY, MARCH 17.—Mr. Peel presented a petition from the University of Oxford, praying that those laws might not be repealed which excluded Catholics from certain offices of the State, and from sitting in Parliament.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 23.—Sir F. Burdett brought up a bill to provide for the removal of the disqualifications which at present affected his Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects.

On the motion that it be read a first time,

Sir T. Lethbridge said, that he rose to enter his protest against it. He not only intended to object to the details of the measure, but also to the principle upon which it was founded. He could not allow one single stage of it to pass by him without expressing his decided opposition. Of the bill itself, he knew nothing, but at any rate, it went to alter the test acts, and so far to change the ancient constitution of the country. If this bill repealed the oaths of supremacy and abjuration, so as to render them palatable to the Roman Catholics, it must be pretty nearly the same bill which had before undergone the consideration of Parliament (hear, hear). If that were the case, though novelty could not be urged against it, the same objections which had formerly been urged, might be repeated with all the confirmation which they had received from recent transactions. He allowed that on the last debate he had heard fascinating arguments advanced by the advocates of concession. Still he had not heard sufficient to satisfy him that more could be granted to the Roman Catholics, without danger to the constitution of these realms as by law established. He had not heard several very essential points of the Popish creed properly explained; and till that was done, he could never consent to give those who professed it, any thing like unqualified emancipation. They were told, however, that they had nothing to do with the religious tenets of the Popish creed, and that they ought only to look at the political bearings of this important question. This he denied, even at the risk of being denominated a fanatic or a bigot. He knew that a great endeavour had been recently made to throw new lights upon this subject. He regretted, however, that they had not been brought into such a focus that any member of the house might seize them in his grasp and make himself master of them. He did not know whether it was orderly for him to refer to what had passed in the committee then sitting above stairs; but he had been informed by hon. members who had paid great attention to what had taken place there, that several witnesses had made depositions of a very extraordinary nature. Four bishops, as they were called, of the Catholic church, men of great learning, piety, and unblemished character—had given evidence before the committee up stairs, which was at variance with all the notions which had been usually entertained regarding Catholicism. It might be that the Roman Catholic church had recently adopted new doctrines, and if so, much of his former objections might possibly be removed. He did not, however, expect to have that point admitted; and till it was admitted, he must continue to press his former objections.

Mr. Peel said that though he did not intend to take the sense of the house at present, he wished it to be distinctly understood that his opinions on this question were entirely unchanged—that he was not inclined to enter into any compromise with the Catholic body—that he should give to this bill the same determined opposition which he had given to every bill with the same object which had preceded it—and that he should certainly take the sense of the house on the second reading (hear, hear).

He hoped that even those gentlemen who differed from him as to the principle of this measure would, if they succeeded in carrying it through its next stage, pay great attention to the details of it when it reached the committee; more especially since it had transpired, that the person who prepared the draught of the bill was Mr. O'Connell, the leader of the Association which the house had deemed it prudent to suppress.

Mr. Tierney, as one of the committee which had been appointed to draw up this bill, begged leave to say that he never knew of any such thing (hear). Ever since the Catholic deputation had been in England, he had not had one minute's political conversation with Mr. O'Connell: on the contrary, he had carefully avoided it. He had himself assisted in drawing up this bill, and did not know, nor did he believe, that Mr. O'Connell had any share of it. Some gentlemen of the committee might have consulted Mr. O'Connell on the subject of this bill: and he, in return, might have communicated to them his sentiments in writing. Those sentiments Mr. O'Connell might have considered as the foundation of the bill, and so it might have got abroad that he had drawn it up.

The bill was then read a first time with only three dissentient voices.

LORDS, FRIDAY, MARCH 25.—The Bishop of Bath and Wells, on presenting a petition of the Archdeacon and Clergy of Taunton, in the diocese of Bath and Wells, thought it right to trouble their lordships with a few observations. It had been asked whether it was consistent with that charity which distinguished the Christian religion, for the clergy to come forward with petitions against the proposed measure in favour of the Catholics. Many aspersions had in this way been cast on the clergy, but he thought that the petitioners acted up to the true spirit and letter of Christian charity, when they came forward and endeavoured to maintain pure religion—when they endeavoured to support Protestantism and the principles of civil and religious liberty against Popish domination. He trusted their lordships would always maintain the Protestant Church Establishment in this country; and concluded by moving that the petition be read.

The Earl of Darley contended that no aspersions had been cast on the clergy. If those reverend persons conceived that they were upholding the church to which they belonged by the petitions which had been presented, it was their right and duty to address them to that house. At the same time he could not help alluding to a petition from the clergy of Ely, which he could not regard as remarkable for its charitable sentiments. He thought the right reverend prelates ought to consider it their duty to admonish their brethren against coming forward with petitions of this kind. The reverend persons who signed this petition, cherished all that exclusive spirit of domination, and all that hostility to other sects, for which they blamed the church of Rome. They censured the Catholic clergy of Ireland—men who performed their duty in a way which it would be well for the petitioners to imitate. The reverend persons were not content with the state of the law as it now stood, but wished their lordships to retrace their steps, and again impose those restrictions from which the Catholics had been relieved.

from Ely, that the church of Rome enjoined the prostration of the will and understanding of the people to the clergy, at first wondered from whom the reverend petitioners had stolen this fine phrase; but, in fact, it was taken from a charge of the Bishop of London. In another part of the petition, certain members of the Roman Catholic Church were styled "factious demagogues." Now this sort of vague charge was one which might be applied any where. It might just as well have been applied to the members of this house. A great many petitions had been presented from the clergy, which had better have been deposited with the chronicles of the church, and there left to rot. At present they came forward like an old medicine of the shops called album græcum which might be found about the corners of cathedrals. This medicine was once in high repute, like "No Popery," which was now rejected by the stomachs of the public, as much as album græcum would be if it were administered.

Lord Calthorpe acknowledged that sentiments appeared in some of the petitions which were not consistent with humanity and justice.

The Bishop of Chester presented a petition from the Dean and Chapter of Chester, against the Catholic claims. Before the petition was read, he would make a few observations on the comments which had been thrown out on the petitions presented from the clergy to their lordships. A few rash words which found their way into those petitions, were no more calculated to afford a just idea of the character of the clergy, than words occasionally employed in their lordships' house were fit to be quoted as expressing the opinions and feelings of that assembly. He should be very far from judging of the character of their lordships' house by the speeches of some of its members, who might choose to draw metaphors from a dog-kennel. Noble lords had charged the clergy with intolerance; but he distinctly charged those noble lords with greater intolerance. They pretended not to oppose the presenting of petitions from the clergy; but nothing was better calculated to exclude them, than attacking the petitions one by one, and picking out any objectionable expressions which might appear in them. Reproaches had been thrown out against the Bishop of London for having employed that expression which had been so particularly applied in the petition. This was not the first time that the charge of the right rev. prelate had been misrepresented. That right rev. prelate recommended to all Christians, the prostration of the will and understanding before the precepts of the Gospel; but he did not recommend them, as the Roman Catholic priests did, to prostrate the will and understanding to a temporal authority, falsely presumed to be infallible. He did not know in what school the noble lord had studied his political tactics, but he would tell him that venting sarcasms against the clergy was an artifice to which the enemies of pure religion—amongst whom he did not mean to class the noble lord—had recourse in every age of Christ's church. He was satisfied that these sarcasms would not be attended with any success in that house; but it was impossible to hear them repeated night after night, and remain silent. If these personal attacks upon the bishops were parliamentary, it was time that the rules of Parliament should be changed; but if they were not parliamentary, then he called on the house to protect them from such missiles by the shield of its authority. They held their seats in that house by a tenure which was both legally and morally not less strong than that by which the noble lords opposite held theirs; and they belonged to a body of men whom their lordships would find out one day, as their ancestors had found before them, that they ought to treat with respect, and not with contumely (hear, hear). He moved that the petition do lie on the table.

Lord King said, that the reverend prelate had insinuated that he (Lord King) was not a friend to the Church of England. He was not a friend to the Church of England whilst it encouraged intolerance, pluralities, and non-residence, and all the other abuses which at present existed in it. Out of eleven thousand parishes in England upwards of seven thousand were held by non-residents, and only somewhat under four thousand by resident clergymen. He wished that those champions who stood up for the almost apostolic purity of the Church—

The Duke of Newcastle rose to order. He was not aware that there was any question before the house regarding the purity of the Church.

Lord Holland agreed with the noble duke that this discussion was not regular. He deprecated the idea that the introduction of this measure was to be considered as an attack upon the Church of England, on the one side; whilst he wished it to be understood, that the noble lords who opposed it on the other side, were not insisting on the merits of the Church of England, but were advocating the continuance of a monopoly of power—he did not use the phrase in an invidious sense—to themselves.

The Earl of Liverpool reminded the house that this discussion had arisen from the unusual course adopted by noble lords of entering upon a debate on the particular terms in which a petition was drawn up. He was far from saying that if a petition were presented to their lordships couched in indecent language, he would not object to its being laid upon the table; but he contended, that if the terms of every petition were to be discussed in this manner, it would be extremely detrimental to the right of petitioning.

The Lord Chancellor begged to enter his protest against the practice of making observations of this nature on petitions presented by the clergy, who had a right, as men, under the constitution of this country, to petition their lordships on the subject of any measure before them. They ought to be, of course, couched in decent language; but if their lordships were to observe upon every term contained in each petition, they would be subjecting them to a trial which, not even their own debates, if dealt with in the same way, could bear; he had reason to complain of communications having been made, in which he was said to have changed his opinion upon this question. He, therefore, took this opportunity of saying, that so far from having changed his sentiments upon the subject, every successive event—all the circumstances that were taking place around him—served to confirm him in the persuasion, that every man who wished to support the constitution in church and state, would go along with him in opposing the measure.

The petition was laid on the table.

MONDAY, MARCH 22.—The Bishop of Gloucester presented a petition from the clergy of the diocese of Gloucester, against the Catholic claims.

Lord King said this was another of those petitions in which the clergy took upon themselves to give advice in a matter of a purely political nature. He had been accused the other day of being out of order in commenting on a petition of this sort. Now, if the clergy chose to come forward and give their advice against granting the Catholic claims, he did not see how he was out of order in giving his advice against their petitions. Their forwardness on this occasion reminded him of a story he had heard. A French ambassador at the court of Madrid asked the Spanish minister, why his Catholic majesty was so fond of taking the advice of his confessor. The Spanish minister replied, "Surely your master does the same." "Yes," replied the French ambassador, "he does, and for that very reason our affairs are so badly managed." Whether the clergy were Catholics, Mahometans, or of any other religion, they had all the same propensity to give advice, and their advice, if followed, always produced the same mischievous result.

COMMONS, MONDAY, MARCH 22.—Mr. Spring Rice rose to present a petition from a number of gentlemen of consideration in Ireland, in favour of the Catholic claims. Many of these gentlemen, among whom there were six magistrates, and the owners of landed property to the amount of 300,000*l.* a year, had been formerly hostile to these claims. They now came forward to declare, that they thought the concession of the Catholic claims essential to the tranquillity and security of the empire. The petitioners added, that the concession of this measure would give them still greater satisfaction were it connected with two others—namely, an alteration of the existing rights of the 40*s.* freeholders, and a state provision for the Catholic clergy. He concurred with the petitioners in these opinions, and thought there never was a time at which this measure could be accomplished with more grace by the government, considering that they had lately passed a law against the Catholic Association. If he thought that any alteration in the constitution of the 40*s.* freeholders would be a violation of popular rights, he would be the last man to advocate such a step; but believing, on the contrary, that the suggested alteration would be a wise and salutary reform in the existing system, it should have his support (hear, hear).

Mr. M. A. Taylor begged to enter his protest against the alteration in the elective franchise, and the public provision for the clergy. If funds could be found for such a purpose in Ireland, let the clergy be paid out of them; but he should resist their payment in the manner proposed. He had opposed the plans of the new churches, because the people were refused the appointment of the clergymen. With respect to the alteration in the elective franchise, he, who had been a member of the society of the "friends of the people" (a laugh), and had always contended for the extension of popular suffrage, could not now acquiesce in its contraction.

Sir J. Newport was convinced that a measure like that proposed for reducing the fallacious votes of 40*s.* freeholders, in Ireland, would greatly tend to smoothen the progress of the bill. He was the last man to wish to de-give even the lowest member of the community of any wholesome rights or privileges. But knowing the state of Ireland better than it could be known by the hon. member for Durham, he would venture to say, that it would do much in allaying the apprehension of danger as to the result of granting Emancipation. The hon. member might be alarmed at paying 300,000*l.* or 300,000*l.* a year to priests: would he prefer paying 3,000,000*l.* for soldiers to keep the country quiet (hear, hear)? These were not sufficient objections for delaying the ultimate decision of a question upon which depended the power of the British government to keep in peace and order a whole people, at present discontented, and paralysed in their powers to contribute to the general welfare of the state. As to the question of the elective franchise, whenever it should come before the house, he would prove, to the satisfaction of the most incredulous, that the people called upon to exercise this right, were not, as might be supposed, required to exercise it as free agents—they were dragged to the hustings to give their votes under arbitrary dictation, and not according to their own wishes. The franchise was not an advantage to them, but a serious evil.

Lord J. Russell thought that any abuses with respect to the exercise of the elective franchise, ought to be inquired into and ascertained by a committee, before the house proceeded to any alteration of the franchise. He approved of the provision for the clergy; but if he had even objected to these two proposed appendages of the bill, yet he would support them as conditions for securing Emancipation.

Sir P. Bury undoubtedly concurred in the sentiment of the noble lord, that if any considerable support could be acquired for his bill by admitting the two appendages proposed, he must concede them for the sake of that which he deemed of the first importance—Catholic Emancipation. But he thought that he ought to demand the clearest testimony before making those concessions: otherwise he might lose on one hand what his ill-timed complaisance might acquire for him on the other. As to the stipend to the Catholic clergy, in the view of economy, the money required for that object would be so trifling, that it would not balance the weight of a straw in the conclusions of any rational mind one way or the other. But, at all events, he was not implicated in the fate of these propositions. Catholic Emancipation was the sole measure for which he was pledged; nor would he consent to mingle less significant details with that question.

Mr. Peel would not accept of the two measures now proposed as a compromise of his opposition to the bill. Neither the payment of the Catholic clergy by the government, nor the disfranchisement of the forty-shilling freeholders, would induce him to relax in his hostility to the bill.

Mr. Tierney was hostile to the two propositions, yet if it could be proved that they were likely to become means of conciliation, he would not object to their adoption.

Mr. Brougham, from an extensive correspondence with those who had lived in constant hostility to Emancipation, was enabled to say, that in the event of that question being carried, it would materially lessen the general alarm, if it were to be accompanied with a provision for the Catholic clergy and a qualification of the franchise. Whether the Catholic question were carried or not, it was nothing more than a becoming measure to provide for the Catholic clergy, who, in the performance of the most arduous duties, might be said almost without a figure, to be left to beg their bread. As to the question of elective franchise, it was misnamed a franchise when applied to forty-shilling freeholders—they were not freeholders—they had no free choice. A Catholic bishop had declared, that he had seen men with the appearance of mendicants going to register their votes, though there was nothing like a qualification in their leases. They were compelled to go, or they must look for the severest consequences.

LORDS, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 13.—The Bishop of Exeter said, he had several petitions to present against the Catholic claims, which were not from the clergy, but were signed by Dissenters of every denomination. The first was from the churchwarden and inhabitants of the parish of Kenton, in the county of Devon; the second, from the churchwarden and inhabitants of St. Lawrence, Exeter; and the third from the inhabitants of North Bishop, Devon; all praying that no further concessions might be granted to the Catholics. The fourth petition he had to present was the only one concerning which he expected to hear a dissentient voice, as it was from that proscribed body, the clergy. In common, however, with all his Majesty's subjects, they had a right to petition. They came before their lordships, not to offer advice; and it was one of the most essential privileges of the people of this country that the doors of parliament should be open to their petitions. The petition he had to present was from the Archdeacon and Clergy of Totness, Devon. The petition had been agreed to by all the clergy of the archdeaconry, regularly assembled, with only one dissentient voice.—The petition was then read.

Lord Holland held in his hand a petition from the Rev. John White Jones, a humble curate in the diocese of the rt. rev. prelate, who had dissented from the opinion of the meeting at which the petition from Totness had been signed. A rt. rev. prelate had described the petitioners as the proscribed clergymen of the Church of England. He did not know in what sense the rt. rev. prelate meant that phrase to be understood; but the petition he (Lord H.) had the honour to present, came from a clergyman, who might justly be called proscribed. He was curate of North Bovey, in Devonshire. His petition was the more deserving the attention of their lordships, as, in consequence of having formerly shown his zeal on the same question, he had found himself precluded from obtaining promotion in his profession; his diocesan, the rt. rev. lord's predecessor, having refused to grant him the necessary testimonials. That rt. rev. prelate had since been promoted to a higher and more lucrative diocese, but the humble curate of North Bovey remained where he was. At the meeting where the last petition was agreed to, he attended, and protested against the decision of the majority. With regard to petitioning, he (Lord H.) could not subscribe to the opinion of a learned lord (the Lord Chancellor), that it was not proper to notice the language in which such petitions might be framed, but thought they were the more called upon to scrutinize the language when the petitions came from an educated class of persons. Many of these petitions had been remarkable, not only for interperence of language, but for containing all sorts of fallacies, and were calculated to impress upon the public notions respecting the proposed concessions to the Roman Catholics, which were quite the reverse of the fact. The petition was then read.

MONDAY, APRIL 18.—A great number of petitions against the Catholic claims were presented, amongst which were several from the clergy.

Lord Calthorpe regretted the pains taken by the clergy to bring forward petitions on this subject. Notwithstanding the number of petitions which had been presented, he was persuaded that what was called public opinion in this country, instead of being against, was in favour of the Catholic claims. They had received no petition from bodies of persons whose opinion ought to have great weight on such a question as this. Had they received any from grand juries; from county meetings; from any considerable meeting of manufacturers or commercial men—in short, from any description of persons, except the clergy? He was extremely sorry to find that on this question the clergy of the Established Church stood insulated and detached from the feelings of the other well-educated parts of the community.

COMMONS, MONDAY, APRIL 18.—Numerous petitions were presented against the Catholic claims, of which a considerable proportion were from various dissenting congregations.

Mr. Brougham said, he held in his hand a petition from certain inhabitants of Great and Little Bolton, in the county of Lancaster, in favour of the bill now before the house, for relieving the Roman Catholics from the disqualifications under which they at present laboured. In presenting this petition to the house, he would take the liberty of stating the opinion which he had always held, and always should hold—namely, that all tests, and all disqualifications to hold particular offices, on account of religious belief, ought to be removed (hear, hear). He spoke not of the Roman Catholics merely (hear, hear). The pure doctrine of religious toleration ought to be extended to all sects, as well as to the Roman Catholics, because a man was no more answerable for his religious belief than he was for any peculiarity in his physical or mental constitution, over which he had no control (hear, hear). To adopt a different maxim—to inflict punishment on men because they adhered to certain religious opinions, was, in fact, to make them hypocrites; for, however interest might induce them to submit to tests and forms, their religious opinions would remain unaltered. Cherishing these sentiments, it was with feelings of sorrow and disappointment that he looked to the quarter whence some of those petitions came. That the petitions brought forward by the hon. member for Kent (Sir E. Knatchbull) should darken their doors, was not at all surprising. That petitions were signed by the archdeacons and the deacons of Canterbury—by the clergy of the Established Church—and by select vestries: this was in the natural order of things, and could surprise no man; at least no man who knew the Church. But there was a class of persons whose signature he was ashamed to see affixed to petitions of a similar tendency. He alluded to that most respectable class of men, the Dissenters of this kingdom. If there were one class of men more than another bound to petition in favour of the Roman Catholics, that class was the Dissenters (hear, hear). Those persons were, he supposed, sensible that they themselves laboured under disabilities (hear, hear); and he hoped, as toleration was always on their lips, they would extend to the Catholics a small portion of that toleration which they claimed for themselves. He trusted, he said, that a little more of that discussion, which they so much admired, would have the effect of altering their opinions, ere long, with respect to the question of Catholic Emancipation; and remind them how grievously inconsistent was the conduct they pursued. Did they forget that they held only offices by connivance, because the religion which they professed was not the religion of the state (hear, hear)? Therefore it was, that an annual indemnity act was passed, in the absence of which all of them who held office were liable to penalties by law. And yet, labouring under those disabilities, they called on the Legislature to continue the disabilities of the Roman Catholics. James II. was addressed by the Quakers, on the occasion of his accession to the throne, in these terms:—"We hear that thou no more agreeest with the Established Church of this land than we do ourselves; for the which reason, we expect that thou wilt extend that toleration to us which thou thyself standest in need of." Now, he would apply to the Dissenters the words of the Quakers. Well might the Roman Catholics say, "We, like yourselves, are oppressed by disabilities; and we hope that you will bear with us, as the State bears with you—that you will allow us a little of that toleration, so great an abundance of which you enjoy, but none of which is extended to us." Some of the petitions to which he had referred came from Scotland. Presbyterianism was the chief religion of Scotland; how would his Scotch friends of that persuasion feel themselves, if the doors of all offices, great and small, were shut in their faces? They had, however, enjoyed the most considerable offices in the country, though in a manner contrary to law; but that objection was met by the indemnity act. The law, which he must call a most savage one, required that all those who accepted of situations of this nature, should receive the sacrament of the Church of England; Dissenters who abhorred that form, were required to have the sacrament administered to them; but by the indemnity act they got over that difficulty, and were enabled to hold office, without violating their feelings. This was an act which enabled the Government to procure the assistance of very able men—it was, no doubt, useful to the country, and was not, he hoped, at all disagreeable to those who took advantage of its provisions (a laugh). A little more discussion would, he trusted, place this matter in so clear a light, that they should have no more anti-Catholic petitions from the Dissenters. If it were not for the respect he bore them, he would not have trespassed so much upon the time of the house; but what he had thrown out was intended as a friendly, and he trusted it would be received as a kindly admonition, by those to whom it was addressed (hear, hear).

Mr. Peel wished to offer a remark or two in defence of the conduct of those whose petitions

he had presented. One of those petitions—that from Bolton—was signed by nearly 10,000 persons, comprising almost the whole of the Dissenters in that neighbourhood. He saw no inconsistency in the conduct of Protestant Dissenters, when they petitioned against granting further concessions to the Roman Catholics, because those Dissenters were protected by the annual indemnity act. That circumstance did not alter the state of the question. They felt that the doctrines maintained by the Catholic church were farther removed from their own than the doctrines maintained by the Church of England; and they had a right to petition against granting additional privileges to a body of whose intolerance all history informed them.

Mr. W. Smith expressed his belief that the great body of Dissenters were, as he was, favourable to the claims of the Catholics. He was very glad that this conversation had taken place, because it would tend to do away a very mistaken opinion which prevailed in that house, and throughout the country at large, that because an indemnity bill was annually passed, the Dissenters laboured under no disability, disqualification, or reproach. He felt that they laboured under all these. A Roman Catholic in approaching that house, or in holding office, would not have to encounter greater difficulties than were opposed to the Dissenter.

Mr. Abercrombie contended that no petitioners had ever come before the house with a worse grace, or with less consistency, than those Dissenters who petitioned against the claims of the Catholics. The Dissenters, generally, were an enlightened and liberal body, but he could not view with any feelings of respect the conduct of those who now obtruded themselves on the notice of the house for such a purpose. They were fanning the flame against the Roman Catholics, and yet at the same moment they had a bill before the house for relieving themselves from disabilities; that which they would not allow to others they claimed for themselves (hear).

Mr. Brougham said, when the Dissenters found the Church at a pinch for a cry of "No Popery," they were induced, under a delusion, to step forward at that critical juncture for the purpose of raising it. But they most egregiously deceived themselves if they thought the Church of England would, in return, do any thing for them (hear). He thought he knew the Church (a laugh)—he spoke of the High Church—and he was sure the Dissenters who came forward with these petitions knew little of that establishment if they thought that in the hour of need their conduct on this occasion would stand in their stead. The Dissenters might come to them and say, "Don't you remember on the 19th of April, 1825, when you were in the greatest distress for a 'No Popery' cry—when the Solicitor-General was in despair—when every body, even the hon. member for Somersetshire, complained of the apathy of the people—that we came forward and gave you a few drops of alarm, a few crumbs of comfort, in the shape of ominous forebodings (hear, and laughter); and will you not now assist us in getting rid of our disabilities?" How would this be received? The question would be—"What did you come forward for? Did you not come forward according to your conscientious belief that danger was to be apprehended? Were you not really alarmed? Certainly you were; and you came forward not to assist us, but to help yourselves (hear, and laughter). You have a monopoly of toleration—you have got into a snug birth yourselves, and all you wished for was to retain it. We have become enlightened on this subject ourselves, and we think it very inconsistent for you, the Dissenters, to have acted as you did. For us it was the best thing that ever was done. You performed the work, and we despise you heartily for it (hear, hear); but, as to our assisting you, we are astonished how such an idea could ever have entered your minds" (hear, hear). He might be allowed here to observe, and it was an axiom as true as any that was to be found in the Principia, that the odium theologicum operated in an inverse ratio to the approximation of opinion amongst different Christian sects—a principle which undoubtedly applied to the Established Church. The nearer those sects approached, the more they hated each other—and, when the shade of difference was very indistinct indeed, as between a Dissenter and a Protestant, the parties hated one another to a degree of pure bitterness. In the early ages of Christianity, one little letter, one tota, had produced much enmity and bloodshed. The church was divided between the terms, Ilmoouision and Homoloouision, and much strife was engendered between those who defended the former word, and those who supported the latter. The distance between those parties was not, it appeared, very great, but their hatred was most persevering. Now, if the Dissenters hoped to receive any benefit by showing how near they were to the Church, they deceived themselves. The nearer they proved themselves to be, the worse would they be hated.

The petition was then ordered to be printed.

TUESDAY, APRIL 19.—Mr. W. Smith observed, that his learned friend (Mr. Brougham) was so far mistaken yesterday as to attribute to the Protestant Dissenters, generally, in consequence of some petitions having been presented from Dissenters, a strong feeling against the bill for the relief of the Roman Catholics. Now, he believed, that up to yesterday not more than nine or ten petitions from Protestant Dissenters had been presented. He had this morning looked over an alphabetical list of 2000 congregations in England; and he declared, that amongst those he could find but five or six congregations that had appeared before the house. Gentlemen might easily calculate how small a proportion this number bore to the general mass of Protestant Dissenters. He held in his hand a list, comprising the whole period from the year 1733 down to the present time, of Protestant Dissenters properly so called. These were divided into three classes—Presbyterians, Independents, and Baptists. When they agreed on any public act, that act was performed by a number deputed from the general body. In that list he found 97 congregations. He had dissected the list of petitions as well as the time would allow him, and he could discover no more than five which came from persons who could by any possibility be said to belong to the sects he had mentioned. There were a great number of persons, he doubted not, very worthy and respectable persons, who belonged to the class of Methodists, who were sometimes confounded with the Protestant Dissenters, but did not in reality belong to them. He meant to cast no reflection on those parties. He merely wished to put every gentleman who heard him on his guard, lest he should be led to suppose that, because a dozen petitions, emanating from this heterogeneous mixture, had been presented against the Catholic claims, therefore the great body of Protestant Dissenters were opposed to them. They had, in fact, expressed no opinion. He would maintain, that not one in one hundred of the Protestant Dissenting congregations in England had given any opinion at all on this question. He believed the feeling of the Protestant Dissenters throughout the country, was, to leave the subject to be dealt with as Parliament in its wisdom should think fit. Speaking of them as a body, he believed they were perfectly desirous that justice should be done to the Roman Catholics; but they left it to the wisdom of the legislature to act as to them might appear most safe and prudent. He should be sorry if the suspicion which appeared to have entered the minds of some gentlemen near him, as to the feelings of the Protestant Dissenters, was in any degree well-founded. It would give him much pain, if the body of which he was speaking stood forward as the foes of—he would not say religious toleration, but religious liberty in its widest extent. If they came forward and called on the legislature to put its seal on this question—if they demanded that the claims of the Roman Catholics should be refused, he should be both surprised and grieved. As a body, he deemed it right to say thus much in their behalf, lest a false opinion might be entertained of the conduct of the Protestant Dissenters.

Mr. S. Rice said he held in his hand a declaration in favour of the Catholic Claims, which had emanated from a most respectable body of the Protestant Dissenters of Ireland. The Presbyterians of the north of Ireland were as ready as any set of men to admit the claims which the Roman Catholics had on the justice of that house. He said this, because an idea had gone forth, and was, indeed, embodied in the evidence given relative to the state of Ireland, that the Presbyterians of the north of Ireland had become more than ever adverse to the claims of the Roman Catholics. He had this day, in contradiction to that assertion, to lay before the house a statement (for the parties had not time to put it in the shape of a petition) from the ministers and elders of the Presbyterian profession in the county of Down and Belfast, to which they requested him to call the attention of Parliament. Those individuals said, that so far from becoming adverse to the Catholic Claims, if the Presbyterians declared themselves hostile to civil and religious liberty, they would belie the principles of the church to which they belonged. On all occasions they had declared their opinions in favour of that liberality which became them as followers of the Christian faith. In 1812, no less than 129 members of the Synod of Ulster had called on the house to do away with all civil disabilities on account of religious opinions. The individuals whose sentiments he was speaking, begged of him to state, that any person acting as moderator could express nothing more than his own opinion. If he did otherwise—if he assumed a representative capacity—he passed the line and boundary of his office, since he had a right only to act in his individual capacity. The parties stated that, as the cause of Catholic Emancipation gained ground in the north, and must continue to do so, they wished, both in justice to the Dissenters and to the Catholics, to record these their opinions. If a declaration on the subject had been necessary, they could have procured thousands of respectable signatures to it; and they stated that they never felt greater chagrin—and the same remark would apply to the great body of Protestant Dissenters—than they did on the publication of the evidence in which the Protestant Dissenters were described as entertaining hostility against the Roman Catholics. The first name signed to this paper was that of the High Sheriff of the county of Down. Here was a Presbyterian, not acting in the spirit of monopoly, but coming forward to state his own liberal feelings, and at the same time to bear his testimony to the growing principles of liberality amongst his fellow-countrymen. This was worthy of a Presbyterian of the north; and he certainly would think ill of any of that class, who, having a monopoly of toleration, endeavoured to prevent others from enjoying those benefits which they themselves possessed.

Laid on the table.

Mr. Brougham, commenting upon the manner in which some of the petitions had been got up, and, in particular, one from Grantham, which was presented on a former evening by Sir Montague Cholmeley, asserted that two of the subscribers to this latter were convicts, and two others keepers of brothels. These two, he supposed, had observed the mention of what they conceived to be their rival—the Lady of Babylon; and without knowing exactly the object of the petition, they might have thought, that by signing it, they would receive practical relief in suppressing a rival competitor.

Sir Montague Cholmeley here interrupted Mr. Brougham, and declared that he knew nothing of the two persons to whom the hon. member alluded, and he could most positively assert, that he had never entered any houses of that description (loud and continued laughter through the house). Gentlemen might laugh, but he could again assert that he knew nothing of these two persons, or of their houses, or of any houses of that sort. He believed he was warm; he should otherwise have delivered his sentiments upon the Catholics and their claims.

Mr. Scarlett rose to present a petition in favour of the bill for removing the disabilities under which the Roman Catholics laboured, which was signed by 163 individuals; and he believed that a greater mass of intelligence than was to be found amongst the petitioners could not be met with amongst those who affixed their names to many other petitions, though the number of signatures might be five times or ten times as great. It was the petition of a number of English sergeants and barristers at law. But the house must by no means conclude that the whole number of the individuals at the bar of England, who were favourable to Catholic Emancipation, was comprised in those signatures. Many individuals of high character, and of profound knowledge, who concurred in the prayer of the petition, had, nevertheless, declined signing the document, because they were averse to the bar of England petitioning the legislature as a body. There were also other circumstances which rendered the petition worthy of consideration. If there were any body of men, to whom, more than others, it was beneficial to exclude competitors, that body was the bar of England. The gentlemen, too, who signed this petition, knew perfectly well, that an avowal of those sentiments was not now, nor had been for some years, the most ready road to preferment (hear). Perhaps it would be found, that the best made, which a barrister of intelligence could take, for the purpose of securing honours, was to become an apostate from those principles of liberality and tolerance which he might have professed at any period of his life (hear, hear). He knew it was asserted, and that, too, in a high quarter, that the bar was deficient in talent. He unfortunately was growing odd amongst that body; but the bar of the present day might proudly enter into competition with the bar of former times. There were then but a few men of extensive knowledge at the bar, and that knowledge was chiefly confined to their own profession; but for general information, for extent and variety of knowledge, there never was such a body of men at the bar as those who now supported its character.

Mr. Brougham said he should be unworthy of ranking amongst that illustrious body, the members of the profession of the bar, whose importance to the constitution of the country—to the preservation of the rights of the subject—to the endurance and stability of the Government itself, was not less essential than to the due administration of the laws—if he did not join his testimony to that of his learned friend, and state his concurrence in all that he had said with respect to this petition. The petition had not been set on foot by those who were termed the leaders of the bar; but, when the matter became known, the petition was adopted by men of distinguished rank and standing. It was, however, impossible to find greater learning or integrity, amongst any body of men, than amongst those with whom it originated. No member of that house had signed it; nor any one of those Roman Catholics who were members of the legal profession. The northern circuit was a floating body, consisting of from 90 to 100 barristers. Upwards of 40, indeed nearly 50, of these gentlemen who went that circuit, signed the petition. He would venture to say, from his own knowledge, that considerably above 30 more, say four or five-and-thirty, had expressed their entire concurrence in the petition. They were known in the profession to concur most warmly in its prayer. The only scruple which prevented them from signing it was that which arose from their doubting the propriety of the bar as a body petitioning the legislature. Of the whole of the body of the northern circuit, not above half a dozen, he was sure not 12 persons, held an opinion adverse to the sentiments contained in that petition. He had no reason to believe that such an opinion was more generally entertained amongst that body of which he was a member, than by the gentlemen attached to the other circuits; and if that were the case, what an overwhelming number of professional men were in favour of the Catholic claims. Such a petition as this could not have been procured 10 or 12 years ago. Twenty years since, when the Catholic question was brought forward by Mr. Fox, and seconded by Mr. Grattan, the great majority of the members of the bar would not have concurred in such a petition; they would most probably have joined against the Roman Catholics. Let the house now look at the great change of opinion that had been effected. The circumstance that only six in the 100 of the most enlightened and best informed class of society were adverse to the Catholic claims, was a sufficient exponent of the alteration of opinion that had taken place.

The petition was then laid on the table.

Lord Nugent rose to present the petition of the Roman Catholics of England, in favour of the bill now before the house. The number of English Catholics amounted to 200,000. They came forward to give their support to the different petitions for Catholic Emancipation which had been laid on the table. He looked upon the cause of the Roman Catholics, and so did the petitioners, to be inseparable from Ireland. High as were the names of the Duke of Norfolk, and the other illustrious individuals who had signed the petition—powerful and wealthy as were the 200,000 persons who composed the Catholic body in this country, and who called upon the legislature to relieve them from civil disabilities—still, if they had only looked to their own interest, if they did not consider the interests of Ireland as intimately connected with their own—he would have been dissatisfied with the petition. But it was a general petition, which embraced the interests both of the English and of the Irish Catholics. The rt. hon. Sec. for the Home Department had said that he was willing to rest his vote upon the articles of the treaty of Limerick. But by the provisions of that treaty, no less than by the pledges which had been solemnly proffered at the time of the Union, did this country stand in the light of an unprincipled debtor towards Ireland; deferring as long as it was possible, and on the most unworthy pretexts, the fulfilment of an obligation which they were bound to observe upon every principle of moral as well as political justice. If, however, there existed no such obligation, he should esteem the claims of the Catholics not less unanswerable. It was stated in the evidence given before the Committee, that the despair which had been felt, the tone which had been assumed by the Catholics generally, and the existence of that Association which was now put down, might be dated from the period when, not this house, but Parliament, rejected the measure which was proposed to them for putting the Catholics of England and Ireland on the same footing. The Catholics never considered their cause separate from the great and universal cause of religious liberty. They were anxious that the toleration which they claimed for themselves should be extended to every other description of persons; even to those who, although like themselves they dissented from the Church of England, had so unwisely and ungenerously petitioned against them. The only real question upon which any opposition to the claims of the Catholics could be reasonably founded, was whether they admitted the interference of any foreign power with the affairs of this state. The Catholics denied the imputation. Who would believe that the Duke of Norfolk, the illustrious descendant of so many noble families, would become the liegeman of the Pope, or betray his fidelity to the Sovereign and the state? At no period of the English history had the most zealous members of the Catholic religion ever showed a disposition to prefer it to the liberties of England, still less to make it a means of restraining those liberties. The great charter was obtained by the exertions of Catholics, in opposition both to the Pope and to the King of these realms. The statutes of Mortmain and of Præmunire were passed for the avowed purpose of limiting the power which the Pope claimed to exercise. The re-establishment of the order of Jesuits had been assigned as a reason for continuing the restrictions under which the Ca-

because a dozen petitions, emanating from this heterogeneous mixture, had been presented against the Catholic claims, therefore the great body of Protestant Dissenters were opposed to them. They had, in fact, expressed no opinion. He would maintain, that not one in one hundred of the Protestant Dissenting congregations in England had given any opinion at all on this question. The only real question upon which any opposition to the claims of the Catholics could be reasonably founded, was whether they admitted the interference of any foreign power with the affairs of this state. The Catholics denied the imputation. Who would believe that the Duke of Norfolk, the illustrious descendant of so many noble families, would become the liegeman of the Pope, or betray his fidelity to the Sovereign and the state? At no period of the English history had the most zealous members of the Catholic religion ever showed a disposition to prefer the liberties of England, still less to adopt a means of restraining their great charter was obtained by the Catholics, in opposition to the King of France, Mortmain and of France, for the avowed purpose of which the Pope claimed to be re-established of the order of the assigned as a reason for restriction under which the start up, and retort with interest the sarcasm on the offender. The clergyman, however, was obliged to silence, and could not defend himself by the eloquence of any of his brethren. They were the only class of men not represented in that house: they ought, therefore, to be defended by the generosity of the house against sneers and sarcasms, which, if they meant any thing, could only mean that they ought not to come there as petitioners. He contrasted the different modes in which the petitions of the Catholic clergy and those of the Established Church were received by the house. The former were heard with kindness and attention, and were made the subject of lofty encomiums; the latter were flouted and discountenanced, and all but laughed out of the house. He thought that hon. gentlemen would perform their duty in a more fair and candid manner, by listening to the arguments which the clergy urged against these claims, than by denouncing them, without examination, as absurd and ridiculous, and by assailing them with laughter as soon as they were brought into the house.

Mr. Hume protested against the language of the hon. member who had just sat down, as utterly uncalled for by any thing which had occurred in that house. It would be preposterous indeed for men who professed liberal principles, to adopt such an illiberal mode of proceeding (hear, hear). The hon. gentleman had raised a phantom, which had no existence but in his own mind, for the sole purpose of demolishing it after it had been raised. What he (Mr. Hume) had said regarding the clergy on a former night, he was ready to say again. He had expressed his regret that the clergymen of England, who were so superior to the generality of the people, in education and rank in life, should be a century behind them in mildness and liberality of feeling. With Christian charity always in their mouths, they ought to exhibit a little more of Christian charity in their practice. Enjoying civil rights themselves, they ought not to seek to debar others from full participation in them. If there were any difference in the attention which the house bestowed on the petitions received from the Catholics and the established clergy, it was owing to this circumstance—that the former petitioned for justice, whilst the latter sought to perpetuate injustice (hear, hear).

Sir Ellis Harvey begged to observe, in corroboration of what had just fallen from the hon. member for the University of Cambridge, that when he presented the petition from the Archdeaconry of Essex, which did equal honour to the hearts and heads of those who signed it, it was received with an uproar and clamour which was more worthy of a bear-garden than of the House of Commons (hear, hear).

Mr. Spring Rice allowed that the petition was entitled to every attention; but at the same time, it ought not to be taken as conveying the unanimous opinion of the University. There were a great many of the resident members who dissented from its prayer; and among them some of the most enlightened and popular members of the Senate.

The petition was then laid on the table.

THURSDAY, MARCH 17.—Mr. Peel presented a petition from the University of Oxford, praying that those laws might not be repealed which excluded Catholics from certain offices of the State, and from sitting in Parliament.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 23.—Sir F. Burdett brought up a bill to provide for the removal of the disqualifications which at present affected his Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects.

On the motion that it be read a first time, Sir T. Leithbridge said, that he rose to enter his protest against it. He not only intended to object to the details of the measure, but also to the principle upon which it was founded. He could not allow one single stage of it to pass by him without expressing his decided opposition. Of the bill itself, he knew nothing, but at any rate, it went to alter the test acts, and so far to change the ancient constitution of the country. If this bill repealed the oaths of supremacy and abjuration, so as to render them palatable to the Roman Catholics, it must be pretty nearly the same bill which had before undergone the consideration of Parliament (hear, hear). If that were the case, though novelty could not be urged against it, the same objections which had formerly been urged, might be repeated with all the confirmation which they had received from recent transactions. He allowed that on the last debate he had heard fascinating arguments advanced by the advocates of concession. Still he had not heard sufficient to satisfy him that more could be granted to the Roman Catholics, without danger to the constitution of these realms as by law established. He had not heard several very essential points of the Popish creed properly explained; and till that was done, he could never consent to give those who professed it, any thing like unqualified Emancipation. They were told, however, that they had nothing to do with the religious tenets of the Popish creed, and that they ought only to look at the political bearings of this important question. This he denied, even at the risk of being denominated a fanatic or a bigot. He knew that a great endeavour had been recently made to throw new lights upon this subject. He regretted, however, that they had not been brought into such a focus that any member of the house might seize them in his grasp and make himself master of them. He did not know whether it was orderly for him to refer to what had passed in the committee then sitting above stairs; but he had been informed by hon. members who had paid great attention to what had taken place there, that several witnesses had made depositions of a very extraordinary nature. Four bishops, as they were called, of the Catholic church, men of great learning, piety, and unblemished character—had given evidence before the committee up stairs, which was at variance with all the notions which had been usually entertained regarding Catholicism. It might be that the Roman Catholic church had recently adopted new doctrines, and if so, much of his former objections might possibly be removed. He did not, however, expect to have that point admitted; and till it was admitted, he must continue to press his former objections.

Mr. Peel said that though he did not intend to take the sense of the house at present, he wished it to be distinctly understood that his opinions on this question were entirely unchanged—that he was not inclined to enter into any compromise with the Catholic body—that he should give to this bill the same determined opposition which he had given to every bill with the same object which had preceded it—and that he should certainly take the sense of the house on the second reading (hear, hear).

He hoped that even those gentlemen who differed from him as to the principle of this measure would, if they succeeded in carrying it through its next stage, pay great attention to the details of it when it reached the committee; more especially since it had transpired, that the person who prepared the draught of the bill was Mr. O'Connell, the leader of the Association which the house had deemed it prudent to suppress.

Mr. Tierney, as one of the committee which had been appointed to draw up this bill, begged leave to say that he never knew of any such thing (hear). Ever since the Catholic deputation had been in England, he had not had one minute's political conversation with Mr. O'Connell: on the contrary, he had carefully avoided it. He had himself assisted in drawing up this bill, and did not know, nor did he believe, that Mr. O'Connell had any share of it. Some gentlemen of the committee might have consulted Mr. O'Connell on the subject of this bill: and he, in return, might have communicated to them his sentiments in writing. Those sentiments Mr. O'Connell might have considered as the foundation of the bill, and so it might have got abroad that he had drawn it up.

The bill was then read a first time with only three dissentient voices.

LORDS, FRIDAY, MARCH 25.—The Bishop of Bath and Wells, on presenting a petition of the Archdeacon and Clergy of Taunton, in the diocese of Bath and Wells, thought it right to trouble their lordships with a few observations. It had been asked whether it was consistent with that charity which distinguished the Christian religion, for the clergy to come forward with petitions against the proposed measure in favour of the Catholics. Many aspersions had in this way been cast on the clergy, but he thought that the petitioners acted up to the true spirit and letter of Christian charity, when they came forward and endeavoured to maintain pure religion—when they endeavoured to support Protestantism and the principles of civil and religious liberty against Popish domination. He trusted their lordships would always maintain the Protestant Church Establishment in this country; and concluded by moving that the petition be read.

The Earl of Darley contended that no aspersions had been cast on the clergy. If those reverend persons conceived that they were upholding the church to which they belonged by the petitions which had been presented, it was their right and duty to address them to that house. At the same time he could not help alluding to a petition from the clergy of Ely, which he could not regard as remarkable for its charitable sentiments. He thought the right reverend prelates ought to consider it their duty to admonish their brethren against coming forward with petitions of this kind. The reverend persons who signed this petition, cherished all that exclusive spirit of domination, and all that hostility to other sects, for which they blamed the church of Rome. They censured the Catholic clergy of Ireland—men who performed their duty in a way which it would be well for the petitioners to imitate. The reverend persons were not content with the state of the law as it now stood, but wished their lordships to retrace their steps, and again impose those restrictions from which the Catholics had been relieved.

from Ely, that the church of Rome enjoined the prostration of the will and understanding of the people to the clergy, at first wondered from whom the reverend petitioners had stolen this fine phrase; but, in fact, it was taken from a charge of the Bishop of London. In another part of the petition, certain members of the Roman Catholic Church were styled "factious demagogues." Now this sort of vague charge was one which might be applied any where. It might just as well have been applied to the members of this house. A great many petitions had been presented from the clergy, which had better have been deposited with the chronicles of the church, and there left to rot. At present they came forward like an old medicine of the shops called album græcum which might be found about the corners of cathedrals. This medicine was once in high repute, like "No Popery," which was now rejected by the stomachs of the public, as much as album græcum would be if it were administered.

Lord Callhorpe acknowledged that sentiments appeared in some of the petitions which were not consistent with humanity and justice.

The Bishop of Chester presented a petition from the Dean and Chapter of Chester, against the Catholic claims. Before the petition was read, he would make a few observations on the comments which had been thrown out on the petitions presented from the clergy to their lordships. A few rash words which found their way into those petitions, were no more calculated to afford a just idea of the character of the clergy, than words occasionally employed, in their lordships' house were fit to be quoted as expressing the opinions and feelings of that assembly. He should be very far from judging of the character of their lordships' house by the speeches of some of its members, who might choose to draw metaphors from a dog-kennel. Noble lords had charged the clergy with intolerance: but he distinctly charged those noble lords with greater intolerance. They pretended not to oppose the presenting of petitions from the clergy; but nothing was better calculated to exclude them, than attacking the petitions one by one, and picking out any objectionable expressions which might appear in them. Reproaches had been thrown out against the Bishop of London for having employed that expression which had been so particularly applied in the petition. This was not the first time that the charge of the right rev. prelate had been misrepresented. That right rev. prelate recommended to all Christians, the prostration of the will and understanding before the precepts of the Gospel; but he did not recommend them, as the Roman Catholic priests did, to prostrate the will and understanding to a temporal authority, falsely presumed to be infallible. He did not know in what school the noble lord had studied his political tactics, but he would tell him that venting sarcasms against the clergy was an artifice to which the enemies of pure religion—amongst whom he did not mean to class the noble lord—had recourse in every age of Christ's church. He was satisfied that these sarcasms would not be attended with any success in that house; but it was impossible to hear them repeated night after night, and remain silent. If these personal attacks upon the bishops were parliamentary, it was time that the rules of Parliament should be changed; but if they were not parliamentary, then he called on the house to protect them from such missiles by the shield of its authority. They held their seats in that house by a tenure which was both legally and morally not less strong than that by which the noble lords opposite held theirs; and they belonged to a body of men whom their lordships would find out one day, as their ancestors had found before them, that they ought to treat with respect, and not with contumely (hear, hear). He moved that the petition do lie on the table.

Lord King said, that the reverend prelate had insinuated that he (Lord King) was not a friend to the Church of England. He was not a friend to the Church of England whilst it encouraged intolerance, pluralities, and non-residence, and all the other abuses which at present existed in it. Out of eleven thousand parishes in England, upwards of seven thousand were held by non-residents, and only somewhat under four thousand by resident clergymen. He wished that those champions who stood up for the almost apostolic purity of the Church—

The Duke of Newcastle rose to order. He was not aware that there was any question before the house regarding the purity of the Church.

Lord Holland agreed with the noble duke that this discussion was not regular. He deprecated the idea that the introduction of this measure was to be considered as an attack upon the Church of England, on the one side; whilst he wished it to be understood, that the noble lords who opposed it on the other side, were not insisting on the merits of the Church of England, but were advocating the continuance of a monopoly of power—he did not use the phrase in an invidious sense—to themselves.

The Earl of Liverpool reminded the house that this discussion had arisen from the unusual course adopted by noble lords of entering upon a debate on the particular terms in which a petition was drawn up. He was far from saying that if a petition were presented to their lordships couched in indecent language, he would not object to its being laid upon the table; but he contended, that if the terms of every petition were to be discussed in this manner, it would be extremely detrimental to the right of petitioning.

The Lord Chancellor begged to enter his protest against the practice of making observations of this nature on petitions presented by the clergy, who had a right, as men, under the constitution of this country, to petition their lordships on the subject of any measure before them. They ought to be, of course, couched in decent language; but if their lordships were to observe upon every term contained in each petition, they would be subjecting them to a trial which, not even their own debates, if dealt with in the same way, could bear; he had reason to complain of communications having been made, in which he was said to have changed his opinion upon this question. He, therefore, took this opportunity of saying, that so far from having changed his sentiments upon the subject, every successive event—all the circumstances that were taking place around him—served to confirm him in the persuasion, that every man who wished to support the constitution in church and state, would go along with him in opposing the measure.

The petition was laid on the table.

Lord King said this was another of those petitions in which the clergy took upon themselves to give advice in a matter of a purely political nature. He had been accused the other day of being out of order in commenting on a petition of this sort. Now, if the clergy chose to come forward and give their advice against granting the Catholic claims, he did not see how he was out of order in giving his advice against their petitions. Their forwardness on this occasion reminded him of a story he had heard. A French ambassador at the court of Madrid asked the Spanish minister, why his Catholic majesty was so fond of taking the advice of his confessor. The Spanish minister replied, "Surely your master does the same." "Yes," replied the French ambassador, "he does, and for that very reason our affairs are so badly managed." Whether the clergy were Catholics, Mahometans, or of any other religion, they had all the same propensity to give advice, and their advice, if followed, always produced the same mischievous result.

COMMONS, MONDAY, MARCH 23.—Mr. Spring Rice rose to present a petition from a number of gentlemen of consideration in Ireland, in favour of the Catholic claims. Many of these gentlemen, among whom there were six magistrates, and the owners of landed property to the amount of 200,000*l.* a year, had been formerly hostile to these claims. They now came forward to declare, that they thought the concession of the Catholic claims essential to the tranquillity and security of the empire. The petitioners added, that the concession of this measure would give them still greater satisfaction were it connected with two others—namely, an alteration of the existing rights of the 40*s.* freeholders, and a state provision for the Catholic clergy. He concurred with the petitioners in these opinions, and thought there never was a time at which this measure could be accomplished with more grace by the government, considering that they had lately passed a law against the Catholic Association. If he thought that any alteration in the constitution of the 40*s.* freeholders would be a violation of popular rights, he would be the last man to advocate such a step; but believing, on the contrary, that the suggested alteration would be a wise and salutary reform in the existing system, it should have his support (hear, hear).

Mr. M. A. Taylor begged to enter his protest against the alteration in the elective franchise, and the public provision for the clergy. If funds could be found for such a purpose in Ireland, let the clergy be paid out of them; but he should resist their payment in the manner proposed. He had opposed the plans of the new churches, because the people were refused the appointment of the clergymen. With respect to the alteration in the elective franchise, he, who had been a member of the society of the "friends of the people" (a laugh), and had always contended for the extension of popular suffrage, could not now acquiesce in its contraction.

Sir J. Newport was convinced that a measure like that proposed for reducing the fallacious votes of 40*s.* freeholders, in Ireland, would greatly tend to smooth the progress of the bill. He was the last man to wish to de-price even the lowest member of the community of any wholesome rights or privileges. But, knowing the state of Ireland better than it could be known by the hon. member for Durham, he would venture to say, that it would do much in allaying the apprehension of danger as to the result of granting Emancipation. The hon. member might be alarmed at paying 300,000*l.* or 300,000*l.* a year to priests: would he prefer paying 3,000,000*l.* for soldiers to keep the country quiet (hear, hear)? These were not sufficient objections for delaying the ultimate decision of a question upon which depended the power of the British government to keep in peace and order a whole people, at present discontented, and paralysed in their powers to contribute to the general welfare of the state. As to the question of the elective franchise, whenever it should come before the house, he would prove, to the satisfaction of the most incredulous, that the people called upon to exercise this right, were not, as might be supposed, required to exercise it as free agents—they were dragged to the hustings to give their votes under arbitrary dictation, and not according to their own wishes. The franchise was not an advantage to them, but a serious evil.

Lord J. Russell thought that any abuses with respect to the exercise of the elective franchise, ought to be inquired into and ascertained by a committee, before the house proceeded to any alteration of the franchise. He approved of the provision for the clergy; but if he had even objected to these two proposed appendages of the bill, yet he would support them as conditions for securing Emancipation.

Sir F. Burdett undoubtedly concurred in the sentiment of the noble lord, that if any considerable support could be acquired for his bill by admitting the two appendages proposed, he must concede them for the sake of that which he deemed of the first importance—Catholic Emancipation. But he thought that he ought to demand the clearest testimony before making those concessions: otherwise he might lose on one hand what his ill-timed complaisance might acquire for him on the other. As to the stipend to the Catholic clergy, in the view of economy, the money required for that object would be so trifling, that it would not balance the weight of a straw in the conclusions of any rational mind one way or the other. But, at all events, he was not implicated in the fate of those propositions. Catholic Emancipation was the sole measure for which he was pledged; nor would he consent to mingle less significant details with that question.

Mr. Peel would not accept of the two measures now proposed as a compromise of his opposition to the bill. Neither the payment of the Catholic clergy by the government, nor the disfranchisement of the forty-shilling freeholders, would induce him to relax in his hostility to the bill.

Mr. Thomson was hostile to the two propositions, yet if it could be proved that they were likely to become means of conciliation, he would not object to their adoption.

Mr. Brownlow, from an extensive correspondence with those who had lived in constant hostility to Emancipation, was enabled to say, that in the event of that question being carried, it would materially lessen the general alarm, if it were to be accompanied with a provision for the Catholic clergy and a qualification of the franchise. Whether the Catholic question were carried or not, it was nothing more than a becoming measure to provide for the Catholic clergy, who, in the performance of the most arduous duties, might be said almost without a figure, to be left to beg their bread. As to the question of elective franchise, it was misnamed a franchise when applied to forty-shilling freeholders—they were not freeholders—they had no free choice. A Catholic bishop had declared, that he had seen men with the appearance of mendicants going to register their votes, though there was nothing like a qualification in their leases. They were compelled to go, or they must look for the severest consequences.

LORDS, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 13.—The Bishop of Exeter said, he had several petitions to present against the Catholic claims, which were not from the clergy, but were signed by Dissenters of every denomination. The first was from the churchwarden and inhabitants of the parish of Kenton, in the county of Devon; the second, from the churchwarden and inhabitants of St. Lawrence, Exeter; and the third from the inhabitants of North Bishop, Devon; all praying that no further concessions might be granted to the Catholics. The fourth petition he had to present was the only one concerning which he expected to hear a dissentient voice, as it was from that proscribed body, the clergy. In common, however, with all his Majesty's subjects, they had a right to petition. They came before their lordships, not to offer advice; and it was one of the most essential privileges of the people of this country that the doors of parliament should be open to their petitions. The petition he had to present was from the Archdeacon and Clergy of Totness, Devon. The petition had been agreed to by all the clergy of the archdeaconry, regularly assembled, with only one dissentient voice.—The petition was then read.

Lord Holland held in his hand a petition from the Rev. John White Jones, a humble curate in the diocese of the rt. rev. prelate, who had dissented from the opinion of the meeting at which the petition from Totness had been signed. A rt. rev. prelate had described the petitioners as the proscribed clergymen of the Church of England. He did not know in what sense the rt. rev. prelate meant that phrase to be understood; but the petition he (Lord H.) had the honour to present, came from a clergyman, who might justly be called proscribed. He was curate of North Bovey, in Devonshire. His petition was the more deserving the attention of their lordships, as, in consequence of having formerly shown his zeal on the same question, he had found himself precluded from obtaining promotion in his profession; his diocesan, the rt. rev. lord's predecessor, having refused to grant him the necessary testimonials. That rt. rev. prelate had since been promoted to a higher and more lucrative diocese, but the humble curate of North Bovey remained where he was. At the meeting where the last petition was agreed to, he attended, and protested against the decision of the majority. With regard to petitioning, he (Lord H.) could not subscribe to the opinion of a learned lord (the Lord Chancellor), that it was not proper to notice the language in which such petitions might be deny the existence of danger. The objections which the Catholics had to the circulation of the Scriptures could not be forgotten, and notwithstanding the explanations which had been attempted on this point, the fact remained sufficiently proved; as also that their church was accounted infallible on all the articles of faith, and with respect to the moral virtues. The bill before the house gave to the Catholics a power of combining which they did not possess at present; and as their church was believed by them to be infallible, they might not only be induced but compelled to combine for any purpose which might seem desirable to the head of their church. Then, attempts had already been made to invade the property of the Established Church, and particularly its possessions in Ireland. The hon. member for Montrose (Mr. Hume) would find his efforts countenanced by Catholic members, who could not be expected to have any other feelings than those of hostility towards that Establishment. It was impossible to foresee what might be the success of a renewal of those attempts which had been hitherto defeated, when they should be backed by the influence to which he alluded. From a sincere belief that the bill now before the house was only the opening to a series of measures, the ultimate object of which was the subversion of those principles on which the reformation was effected, and the revolution established, he gave it his decided opposition, and he trusted that he should have the support of the house in the vote which he intended to give (cheers).

Lord Binning could not help congratulating the house on the great improvement which was perceptible in the manner of conducting the debate on this important subject. He remembered that when the Catholic claims were to be discussed, it was the custom, a few years ago, for an hon. and learned member (Dr. Duigenan) to come down to the house loaded with papers, to anathematize all the Popes and councils of former ages, and attribute to the Catholics of the present day the absurd doctrines of those ignorant times (a laugh). He was usually followed by an hon. baronet (Sir J. C. Hippisley), who read from ancient records long extracts to impugn the position of the learned gent. Fortunately, all that rubbish was now at an end. It was no longer imputed to the Catholics that it was a principle of their religion not to hold faith with heretics, or that Catholics were compelled, at the command of the Pope, to disobey their lawful princes (hear). It had always been the habit of the opponents of the Catholics to require from a Catholic bishop a disclaimer of these dangerous doctrines. Now, when the evidence of a Catholic bishop had been given, it was the mode not to believe it, and the bill was as usual opposed by the hon. member for Corke Castle (Mr. Banks) in the same cool steady manner that he would have put on had he been speaking in a committee of supply (a laugh). It had been stated by the hon. member for Derry, that the opinions contained in the evidence of Dr. Doyle, and in the letters published under the signature of J. K. L., of which Dr. Doyle was the author, were at variance. He had read the letters in question, as well as the evidence of the reverend gentleman, and he could not discover any inconsistency between them. The denial of the doctrines which had hitherto been supposed to form part of the Catholic creed did not rest with Dr. Doyle, but was also made by the Archbishop of Dublin, the Archbishop of Armagh, the Primate of Ireland, and Mr. Blake. He believed that the respectable individuals to whom he had alluded were incapable of telling a lie to the committee of the House of Commons, or of perjuring themselves before the House of Lords (hear). With regard to the disfranchisement of the forty willing freeholders, it was in evidence that they felt no attachment to the privilege in question; but, on the contrary, that they would gladly resign it. He could not conceive that their disfranchisement would ever be drawn into a precedent, because, before a similar measure could be adopted, it would be necessary that there should be a country or district placed in precisely the same circumstances as Ireland. Under these circumstances he was ready to consent to the measure which the Protestants of Ireland called for, and which the Catholics were disposed to agree to. The hon. member for Corke Castle objected to the expense which would be caused by making a provision for the Catholic clergy. He could not stop to argue the point. Economy on such an occasion was misplaced (hear). If he were convinced that it was necessary for the state to pay the Roman Catholic priesthood, he would do it without caring for the expense. Whether the expense would be one, or two, or three hundred thousand pounds, it was not worthy of a great and wealthy country to consider. The rt. hon. Secretary for Ireland said that it would be extremely hard to make the Presbyterians of Scotland, and the Dissenters, and the members of the Established Church in England, pay for the support of a church which they did not approve of. That was the very thing of which six millions of Catholics in Ireland complained. They were compelled to support a church to which they did not belong, and of which they did not approve (hear, hear). He was convinced that it was in a bill like that before the house, that a remedy for the evils of Ireland was to be found. It was necessary to begin the task of amelioration by tranquillizing the hearts and minds of the Irish people.

Mr. Wallace expressed his belief that the bill would fail of producing those effects which its supporters anticipated from it. He thought that the time for bringing forward the measure had not been wisely selected. If the bill were to be sanctioned by Parliament, it could not be considered in any other light than as a peace-offering to the Catholics for the putting down of their Association. The only condition under which concessions could safely be made to the Catholics, would be the substantial interference of Government in the appointments of their bishops.

Lord Paltot avowed himself a convert to the cause of Catholic Emancipation. The prejudices which he had formerly entertained were entirely gone.

Mr. Canning would not undertake to say, whether or not the opinions of the country were as strongly pronounced in opposition to the Catholic claims now, as they had been formerly; but of this he was certain, that among the petitions which had been presented against those claims, whatever their zeal and sincerity, there had been some which displayed an extreme ignorance—he meant to use the expression without disparagement—of the state of the existing law, and the merits of the general ques-

He felt as strongly as any man the propriety of throwing open the door of Parliament to the petitions of the people; but after bestowing the consideration that was due to public opinion, the duty of the house was to proceed upon its own judgment (hear, hear). With respect to any class of persons who imagined themselves more particularly interested on the present occasion, and placed in the advance, as it were, as guardians, in a religious point of view, of the rights of the constitution—with respect to the clergy of England he gave them not only toleration but praise, when they came forward with the fair expression of their opinions; but, even in the petitions presented by that body, he had found some portion of the quality to which he had already alluded (hear! and laughter)—some ignorance, in fact, of the real state in which the law, as affecting the Catholics, stood at present (hear, hear). The charge applied peculiarly to one petition, which opposed the measure now pending upon so entire a mistake, that it actually prayed the house not to grant to the Roman Catholics privileges and immunities which were withheld from any other class of Dissenters. Upon the words of this petition, there was nothing which, if taken in their literal meaning, could militate against the bill before the house. The Dissenters had a voice in the legislature; they had access to seats in that house, from which the Catholics were excluded. As an advocate for an established church, he would not sanction any measure, which even in name would appear hostile to the present establishment, unless it were shown that it was necessary to the removal of a practical grievance. But petitions such as this did not apply to the question the house had to discuss. It was strange that such sympathy should be felt for one class of Dissenters, and not for another. The sympathy, he thought, ought to be the other way. What was it that prevented the Catholics from taking their seats in that house? The oath against transubstantiation. But while they excluded a man from Parliament for his belief in transubstantiation, it ought not to be forgotten, that the man who believed in transubstantiation enjoyed every privilege of the constitution. He did not say there was no difference between the two opinions; but the man who could make it a ground for exclusion from political power, must have a minute perception of the niceties of ratiocination, for which he might be envied as a logician, but which was wholly useless for the purposes of common life (hear, hear). The next ground for objection was, that the Catholics held the doctrine of exclusive salvation. Why, almost all the churches were exclusive on some articles; and let not hon. members who urged this objection forget that the Church of England maintained the Athanasian Creed—a human exposition of the great mysteries of Christianity (cheers)—and maintained it with the express declaration that they who differed from it could not be saved. With this fact before them, could the Catholics with any fairness be excluded from the enjoyment of their civil rights on the ground of believing in the doctrine of exclusion? The doctrine of absolutism had also occasioned much objection. In the abstract that doctrine was absurd; but the evidence before the committee of the House of Lords went to prove, that the absolutism depended on the disposition of the party receiving it, and not on the abstract power of the person giving it. Was this an opinion confined to the Roman Catholic? Let any man read the instructions for the visitation of the sick, as directed by the Church of England, and he would find that the power of absolving might be exercised, and was resorted to, when the sick party desired it. These were points in which, essentially, there was very slight difference between the two religions. He did not mean to say there were no important distinctions between the Protestant and Catholic Creeds. But he was surprised when a question came before them touching the admissibility of sectaries, that they could quarrel with the Catholic upon such grounds as he had described, when they sat side by side with those who denied the divinity of our Saviour (hear, hear). The next objection—and it was one which he could not expect to have heard—was, that the Roman Catholics attached an overweening value to the merits of human actions. Would it not be more dangerous to a state to make good works nothing and faith every thing? He preferred the man who insisted on the necessity of good works as part of his religious creed to the man who considered himself controlled in all his actions by an inexorable fate (hear, hear). Refer to history, and see what it taught on this subject. Who were they who brought the monarch to the block? Who stripped episcopacy of the mitre, and of all its spiritual authority and temporal possessions? The Papists? No; but they who were most violently opposed to them, and who were earnest in their exertions to deprive them of all influence and authority—men, also, who professed little respect for the value of good works, but who relied on faith, and almost on that alone. The objection, then, to the Roman Catholics on the ground of the value they set upon good works, was one to which no weight could for a moment be attached. Neither did he see any valid objection in the argument drawn from the belief in the spiritual supremacy of the Pope. The question was not, whether it was acted upon by the Catholics, but whether it was acted upon in such a way as to make it dangerous to the state. He did not on this subject rest alone on the evidence of Dr. Doyle, but he must contend that the insinuations thrown out against the testimony of that reverend divine were somewhat unwarrantable. It had, he knew, been more than insinuated, that that reverend gentleman held one language before a committee of the House of Lords, and another to the public; but he would put it to the house, whether a gentleman of his character—putting aside the oath which seemed to be so little relied upon by many of those opposed to the present question—would have stated that which must, in a very short time, have become known to so many others of his creed—which must have become known to his flock, and to the Pope himself, the terror of whose name it was said was calculated to make so strong an impression—he would put it, whether, when so many of his own faith, of his reverend brethren in the ministry, were in the next room, and might be called in and give a different testimony, he would have gravely stated that which he knew was not well founded? It might then be taken that the opinion of Dr. Doyle was the opinion of the Catholics in general. That such was the opinion of other times he had no doubt, and he lately fell upon a direct illustration of it in the correspondence between Pope, the poet, and Bishop Atterbury. Pope, as every gentleman knew, was a Roman Catholic; and the bishop, in a very laudable zeal, was anxious to convert his friend to the Protestant faith, for which purpose he wrote to him, pointing out what he considered the errors of his creed, and pressing him to renounce it. Pope, in reply, expressed a hope that all churches and churchmen were right in the belief of what they taught their flocks; but if they were wrong, he trusted God would incline them to reform. He added, that he was not a Papist, that he renounced the temporal authority of the Pope, and disallowed all his pretensions to such power; but that still he was a Catholic in the strictest sense of the word. This was not more than had been said by Dr. Doyle. It bore the marks of that confidential and honest opinion which men gave in private correspondence; and if the distinction between spiritual and temporal allegiance were, as it had been called by some, an absurdity; it was an absurdity of which Pope was guilty, and with which Atterbury was satisfied. It was said as another objection to the concession of political power to the Catholics, that they were, in Ireland under the guidance of men whom they regarded with a veneration bordering on idolatry. He admitted the fact; but he laid the blame on another quarter. If they bowed down before idols, it was our persecution which had set them up. We had left them no other objects of political respect (cheers). Let us, however, lift up the veil of the constitution, show them the object which we worshipped, point out the benefits that we enjoyed, and make them partakers of those benefits; and we should wean them for ever from all idolatry and superstition (cheers). He was not so fond of change as to be easily reconciled to it, even where it was proved to be unexceptionable. There were many considerations arising from the state of public opinion, which might possibly render such alterations unwise, but that was not the case in the present instance. Opinion had now arrived at that crisis, with respect to this great national question, that if they did not anticipate change, change would over-master them (hear, hear). Was it not a grievance that millions of people should suffer disabilities merely on account of religion? Was it not a grievance that the choice of the Crown should be restricted in the selection of its advisers, and in the extension of its favours? Was it not a grievance that any people should wear a badge marking them out from the rest of their fellow subjects as objects of suspicion and distrust, damping their hopes of industry and honour, and meeting them at every turn with exclusions from which other sects had been long relieved? No man would deny that there was grievance in all this; but the removal of those marks of disgrace would, it seemed, be attended with danger to the constitution. If any such danger existed, most certainly it would not be lessened by delay. To obviate the danger, if any there were, it should be met with promptitude, and the boon which would remove it should be granted with an earnest anxiety to do justice. He did not deny that the question, as was contended by the hon. member for Derry, was attended with difficulties, but the cure was in our own hands, though the evil was not of our creation. They however, by whom it was occasioned, were placed under circumstances very different from those of the present day. When the penal laws were enacted, the country was convulsed with the disorders of a disputed succession, and the religion of the party hostile to the existing government was looked upon as the mark of their politics. As such it was proscribed, not so much to put down that particular form of worship, as to crush the political party who professed it. The Catholics were attacked by those who had felt their power when they possessed the political ascendancy, or who dreaded it if they should again become successful. It would therefore be injustice to our ancestors, to judge of their opinions of the Catholic religion by their conduct to the Catholic Jacobites of the day. They sought to weaken the power of those with whom they saw that reconciliation was impossible. They chose a cruel mode of effecting that object, but it answered its purpose. The penal code was dreadful, but it was admirably adapted to its use. It set father against son, wife against husband, servant against master; it destroyed the confidence, happiness, and virtue of society: it sowed fear in every house and reduced the population to a state of misery and degradation that placed them almost on a level with the brute. But when this cruel code had nearly exhausted its powers, when the last turn had been given to the wheel, the English Government, ashamed of its proceedings, relented and began to retract. What the Legislature did in 1778 was the first step to this merciful change: what was done since that period, and what was now proposed, were parts of a benignant system, by which it was proposed to end the season of persecution. He confessed he had often turned away with disgust at the cruel enactments, which, by a perverse ingenuity, sought out the most tender spots on which to inflict the wound with more poignant suffering to the victims. He had seen with disgust those ingenious devices of moral and political oppression; but he now hoped that he was looking at them for the last time, and that justice, though tardy, would at length effect their entire removal (cheers). Could we remain as we now were? It was impossible. We had every day proof of the decline of prejudice and intolerance amongst us. Since the commencement of this debate on Tuesday evening, a splendid instance of this had been given. The manly and candid manner in which that change was avowed, afforded a further illustration of the truth, that the times had changed. They had also proofs that this liberal policy would be met with corresponding feelings on the part of the Roman Catholics. What would be the effect, if they waited until the Catholics had increased in wealth, in intelligence, and industry, with an augmented population? Did the house not feel, that this intelligence and industry would open to the Catholics a new and wider field of action—that they would naturally be ambitious to possess that political rank which belonged to their wealth and station in society? Did not the house think they would be doing too little in raising them from that state of degradation in which our ancestors had placed them? Would it be sufficient to give only a nearer view of what they might enjoy, and yet continue to withhold it? It would have been better, far, to have allowed them to remain in the debased and degraded condition to which they had been sunk, than to have raised them partially, and then prevent their further elevation (cheers). A rt. hon. friend of his had talked of the admission of the Catholics and danger to the constitution: but there was a long chain between the premises and the conclusion, the links of which he had not penetration to see. What force was it that his rt. hon. friend apprehended? Was it physical force? there was more need of physical force to a door that was shut than to one open (cheers and laughter). It should also be remembered that it was not power which it was proposed to give the Catholics, but eligibility—not fruition, but the capacity to enjoy. The Protestant Crown, and the Protestant population of this country had prejudices—honourable prejudices enough to guard against any possible mischief with as much precaution as any one could desire. His rt. hon. friend had said that they would never be satisfied—that they would go on insisting upon more and more, until his prophecy respecting the overthrow of the constitution should be miraculously fulfilled. But could the house suppose that the Catholic gentlemen, or the Catholic labourers, or the whole mass combined, in all their gradations, could ever hope or think to seize the powers of the state? Was this a probable—was it a possible event to contemplate? Suppose five or six Catholic gentlemen were admitted into Parliament. In the first session there would be some strange looks. Those gentlemen would have some inquisitive glances to encounter. But, in the course of a session or two, they would manage to sit beside them, with as much ease, as they now sat by the Dissenters, of whom they thought more favourably only because they were Protestants, as if, to use an expression of Mr. Burke's, he was the best Protestant who protested against the greatest number of doctrines. Of one thing he was sure, that no Catholic gentleman would say of the Protestant community what he heard a Protestant gentleman say the other night against his Catholic fellow-subjects (hear, hear)! One of the objections to this bill was as to time. He would ask, would any man lay his hand to his heart and declare that the measure would not pass these ten or twenty years? It was impossible to suppose that it could be postponed so long. Then, he would put it to the house whether there were any fair reason for delay? Should they wait till times and circumstances should occur which would render it absolutely unavoidable, and when it must be conferred without calling forth the grateful acknowledgments of those to whom it was granted? He hoped the house would never submit to the degradation of listening to menace; but times might arrive, and unlooked-for chances might happen, which would render our compliance with the prayers of the Catholics imperative. Were we to defer the boon until those events occurred which might take from the gift more than half its utility to the state? This was not the time for entering into an examination of the bill, but he would say a few words on it. As to the preamble, his rt. hon. friend stated that it was nothing but words. So were all laws. All legislation did but make distinctions. How could they be expressed but by words; what security could be given which should not be adopted in words? It was objected, that the oath in the bill was too long—that it was more like a bill of indictment than an oath disavowing imputations; but it should be recollected, that when the last bill reached the other house, where there existed a very nice sensibility on all those matters, the old oath was misused; and it was complained that the new one was too short. The old one was therefore restored in this bill. Its long tail was added: yet this was no sooner done, than an hon. member found fault with it as unseemly. It might, on some grounds, be objectionable. The obnoxious part, however, of this oath was taken from the oath of 1793. It was therefore unfair in his hon. friend to attack the supporters of this measure for that which was no invention of theirs, which they would have omitted, had it been left to their discretion, and which they had only inserted to satisfy the scruples of those who saw danger in every concession that was made to the Catholics. In the first place, he considered that this security must always be measured by what was calculated to satisfy the Protestant interests of the country. A correspondence was carried on every day between the bishops of Ireland and the Court of Rome. Every thing that related to the affairs of the priesthood, and much of what related to the most important concerns of private life—he alluded to marriages and to baptisms—was regularly communicated to the Court of Rome. Such communications were in direct contravention of the existing laws; but then the penalties attached to the violation of them were so enormous, that no man of common humanity would ever wish to see them enforced. Therefore it was, that the authors of this bill, whilst they were considering how they could best cure the evils of the present system, determined to cure this collateral evil which arose out of it. If the opponents of this measure believed a correspondence with the Court of Rome to be so full of danger, he called upon them to find a remedy for that evil which was now in full existence, and a remedy which they would dare to carry into execution. The penalties inflicted upon any person carrying on such a correspondence were those of premunire. With regard to two or three of the measures which it was said were to be combined with that which now formed the subject of their discussion, he should be content to take the bill as it stood, without any of the measures which it was in the contemplation of some members to add to it. If by raising the elective franchise to a higher qualification than that on which it stood at present, he could render those who had long been avowed and inveterate enemies sincere and attached friends, he would be ready “to do a little wrong,” in order “to do a great good.” He made this declaration under the idea that a freehold qualification of forty shillings in Ireland was a very different thing from a freehold qualification of the same nominal value in England. If it could be shown, as he expected it would be shown in the committee, that in striking at this symbol of freedom, he was not violating the essence of free election, he should be ready to take his share in the obloquy, supposing any obloquy attended such a measure, of disfranchising the forty-shilling freeholders. With regard to the second measure, he would own that for some time past he had looked upon it with considerable favour; and that nothing which he had heard in the course of this debate had induced him to alter his opinion, that it was expedient for the Government to make some provision for the clergy of the Catholic church. An hon. friend of his had objected to taxing the Protestant part of the community in order to raise the funds out of which this regium donum to the Catholic clergy was to be made. Now, in reply to that objection, he would ask whether the Catholics did not pay the taxes out of which the regium donum was a portion of the Protestant Church was yearly granted? Was it not upon the ground stated by his hon. friend, a grievance that the Catholic should pay tithes to a Protestant clergyman, whose doctrines he abhorred, and from whom he never demanded religious consolation? Did he (Mr. C.) therefore say that the tithe should be withdrawn from the Protestant clergyman? No such thing. To every thing which could improve the system of collecting it—to every thing which tended to shift the burden of it from those who could not to those who could bear it, he was willing to give his consideration; but to any measure which went to invade the property of the Irish Protestant Church, and to alienate the funds which had been assigned by our ancestors for its support, he was not prepared to give even a momentary assent. He had thought it fair to state the impression on his mind with regard to the disfranchisement of the forty-shilling freeholders, and to the provision for the Catholic clergy, because many of the gentlemen who had taken a share in this discussion had occupied their support of the present bill with that of these two measures. For the sake of their support, he should be anxious, if he could, to vote in favour of those measures; but in case they should not be carried, he would not say that he would withdraw his support from the present bill. He did not pretend to wed himself for life to either of those measures; but to the great question—that question which involved the future tranquillity of Ireland and the general welfare of the whole empire—he declared now, as he had declared before, that he was wedded for ever (cheers). He had already considered how far this question affected the internal situation of Ireland. The house ought to reflect, that in proportion as we became great and powerful, and as our resources outgrew the resources of other nations, it was not impossible—nay, it was probable—that among nations, as frequently happened among individuals, an envious feeling would rise up against our pre-eminence. Other nations would look for consolation in any weakness or defect they might observe, either in our form of government, or in the condition of our empire. And where would they look more readily than to Ireland (hear, hear)? They would fasten, as if by instinct, on the state in which we kept the Catholic population of that country. They would say, “There is the weakness—there is the vulnerable point of England” (cheers); and the worst of it would be, that they would say this with great semblance of truth. Impervious as the house might think the country to attack, they were cherishing a wound so near to its most vital parts, that no great increase would be wanted to render it fatal. He advised the house to disappoint those who wished us ill, by collecting our power in that quarter, where they expected to find it divided, by closing the wound which had long remained open and bleeding, and by taking care that before we were again called upon to vindicate the national honour, it was so far healed that not even a cicatrice was left behind it. Such a state of things was as possible as it was desirable; and his earnest prayer was, that they would adopt such measures as would tend to accelerate its consummation. (Loud cheering.)

Mr. Peel began with that topic which appeared to form the chief feature in the present debate—he meant the conversion of several members who had formerly taken the same view of this question that he was now about to take. If he had changed his own opinion, he should also have been most ready to avow it; his opposition to the claims of the Catholics was decided, but unmixed, he trusted, with any feelings of ill-will or animosity. As to the conversion to which he had alluded, if the grounds of opposition had been removed by the evidence of Dr. Doyle, it must have been founded on reasons different from his (Mr. P.’s) opposition. It was true, Dr. Doyle had denied that it was a tenet of the Catholic church that the Pope had power to excommunicate princes and to depose them from their sovereignty—that faith should not be kept with heretics, and that the temporal power of the Pope was not admitted in Ireland. But this was not the first time that all these tenets had been solemnly disclaimed by the Catholic Church. The answers received by Mr. Pitt from the foreign Universities, contained an express denial of the three tenets he had just mentioned. If his hon. friend (Mr. Brownlow) had had his doubts satisfied, he had probably not opposed the measure on sufficient evidence, and certainly not on the same grounds as he (Mr. P.) opposed it. His hon. friend, however, gave his approbation conditionally; and if two other auxiliary laws did not pass, he meant to oppose the bill on the third reading. He did not attach to these measures the importance attributed to them by his hon. friend. Raising the freehold qualification was a measure of no importance; and settling a salary on Catholic priests seemed to him open to more serious objections than its mere expense. Even if he were not disposed to reject these two measures, he thought they offered no counterpoise to the dangers of the present bill. His rt. hon. friend (Mr. Canning) began by remarking on some of the petitions; and selecting one, he remarked that the petitioners were ignorant of the bill, for they complained of it as tending to give the Catholics greater privileges than were enjoyed by the Protestant Dissenters. But if ever there were an excuse for such a mistake, it might be found for these petitioners. If they had only had access to the speech of the learned Attorney-General for Ireland, they would see that he laid the claims of the Catholics on the broad grounds of abstract natural rights. According to the learned gent. it was as much an invasion of their rights as depriving them of their property. The petitioners might, therefore, easily conceive, not only that the Catholics were to be placed on an equal footing with them, but were to have every right they could claim. His rt. hon. friend had likewise noticed the petitions of the clergy against this bill, and had thought it strange that so much theological discussion should have been introduced into them. He could not participate at all in that surprise. If, according to the preamble of the bill, the doctrine, discipline, and government of the Church of England were to be permanently and inviolably maintained, it became necessary to consider what that doctrine, discipline, and government was, and where it was to be found explained. The doctrine of the Church of England was to be found in what were called the Thirty-nine Articles. In those Articles it was stated that the administration of the sacrament in a language which the vulgar could not understand, was contrary to the word of God—that the adoration of saints, the worshipping of images, and the sacrifice of the men, were not sanctioned by the Bible; and that the Pope had no jurisdiction, either temporal or spiritual, within this realm. Now, when the clergyman of the Church of England was told that the doctrine, discipline, and government of his church was "established permanently and inviolably," and yet saw that it was intended to erect a modified establishment for another church which held as articles of implicit faith those articles which the Church of England condemned as unsanctioned by the word of God, had he not reason for thinking that the time was at length come in which his duty compelled him to introduce into his petition matter which trenchanted closely upon theological discussion? He was himself somewhat surprised at the two first clauses in the preamble of the present bill. They were as follow:—"Whereas the Protestant succession to the Imperial crown of this United Kingdom and its dependencies, is, by the act for the further limitation of the crown and the better securing the liberties of the subject, established permanently and inviolably: and whereas the Protestant Episcopal Church of England and Ireland, and the doctrine, discipline, and government thereof; and likewise the Protestant Presbyterian Church of Scotland, and the doctrine, discipline, and government thereof, are, by the respective Acts of Union between England and Scotland, and between Great Britain and Ireland, therein severally established permanently and inviolably." Why were these two clauses introduced into this bill? It contained no enactment which provided for the permanent and inviolable security of the Protestant Establishment. In the first bill that was introduced by the late Mr. Grattan they were there followed by a third clause to this effect:—"And whereas it would tend to promote the interest of the same, and strengthen our free constitution, of which they are an essential part, if the civil and military disqualifications under which his Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects now laboured were removed.* That clause was omitted in the present bill; for to say that the privileges which it conferred upon the Catholics were intended to promote the interest of the Church of England, and to strengthen our free constitution, would be an absurdity too great for any man at this time of day to think of believing. From these two clauses being inserted in the preamble, he thought it was clear the framers of the bill imagined that there was in its enactments something pregnant with hidden danger to the constitution. The house would recollect, that in the feast in Macbeth, that tyrant, before he goes round the table to pay his respects to his guests, expresses an anxiety for the presence of Banquo, whom he had doomed to die. One of the commentators has remarked, that this single touch of nature showed a greater consciousness of guilt in Macbeth's mind, and excited a stronger suspicion that he intended mischief to Banquo, than a thousand laboured speeches could have done. He thought that the anxiety for the welfare of the Church of England exhibited in the preamble, and not followed up in any of the enactments of the bill, was one of those touches of nature which showed a consciousness of danger in the bosoms of the framers of the bill, and which ought to excite a lurking suspicion in the minds of the country that all was not so correct in it as at first sight it appeared to be. The constitution, he contended, was virtually altered by this bill—the Bill of Rights was repealed by it. That bill provided by an enactment as solemn as an enactment could be, that the oath taken by every person on his admission to office should be the oath of supremacy; which asserts "that no foreign prince, person, prelate, state, or potentate, hath or ought to have any jurisdiction, power, superiority, pre-eminence or authority, ecclesiastical or spiritual, within this realm." This oath—he said nothing at present about the declaration against transubstantiation, which stood on different grounds—this oath was now to be abolished. He did not deny the right of the House of Commons to alter this oath, if it so thought good; but when they told him that they wished to secure to the Church of England permanency and inviolability, and when they altered that act which provided for it most effectually, he had a right to ask what security they had to give him for the fulfilment of their promises? He was not going to deny that the maintenance of the succession to the Crown in the Protestant line, was an important security. Still it was worth while to examine what it amounted to. It amounted only to this,—that an individual who came to the throne should make the declaration against transubstantiation, and should be in communion with the Church of England. The security of surrounding him with Protestant counsellors was removed. But how was it that James the Second endeavoured to effect his purposes? "By the assistance of divers evil counsellors, judges, and ministers employed by him," said the Bill of Rights, "did he endeavour to subvert and extirpate the Protestant religion, and the laws and liberties of this kingdom." He would suppose that the individual who filled the throne, after he had taken the oath against transubstantiation, considered the ancient religion of the country to be the wisest and best. He would suppose that he took advantage of the liberal doctrine which had been that night advanced, that a man's religious opinions were not matter of his own choice, and that it would be the height of intolerance to subject him to any disqualification on that account. Now if a King or Queen of this country, with a mind liable to the influence of designing persons, after his accession, were to become a convert to the Catholic faith, and were to declare his adherence to it, the tranquillity of the country would rest on the will of a single mind. An attempt to dismiss that individual from the throne, because he had, upon conscientious principles, changed his religious faith, would be productive of serious convulsions. In the reign of James II. it had produced them; and in that of Charles II. the suspicion of such an event had given rise to the precautions which it was the object of the present bill to neglect for ever. He allowed that the danger he was now describing was merely speculative; but when the fundamental laws of the country were going to be repealed, it was right to look even at speculative danger. They had been told that they were not to look at the clouds with a telescope, and to disregard the evil at their feet. Agreed, but they were bound to be cautious; and if they saw a cloud in the sky, which at present was not larger than a man's hand, they ought to recollect that it might, ere long, overcast the heavens, and involve the whole face of nature in desolation. They were now not deciding on the formation of new institutions—it was not whether our form of Government was to be republican, where all religions were admitted equally to the participation of political power, but being a monarchy, with the Protestant religion established by law, whether we were now prepared to abandon the securities by which that Government was preserved and supported. It was to be recollected, also, that the temporalities of the Church of Rome had been transferred to the Protestant Church; so that, upon the principles of human nature, under the circumstances in which that religion stood in relation to our Establishment, he could find no security in the proposed oath. What was the practice of the constitution under analogous circumstances? The legislature disqualified revenue officers from voting for members of Parliament—it denied to the clergy the capacity of sitting in that house, on account of the influences by which it was presumed those classes would be affected. When he found such a man as Mr. Charles Butler entertaining the conviction that the Reformation had not led to the temporal prosperity of this kingdom; that it had not accelerated the revival of learning—it was impossible that he who entertained them should not consider the dispossession of temporalities as a great act of injustice; and with such impressions, he was not qualified to legislate for a state essentially Protestant. He felt the same conviction when he referred to the statements of Dr. Doyle; and he felt a total inability to reconcile the acknowledged publications of that rev. gentleman with the testimony given by him before the committees, in a letter written with calmness and deliberation. The rev. doctor gave this opinion with regard to the Catholics of England. “The Catholics,” said he “are now emerging from persecution and forming their society anew. Their sufferings are not effaced from their recollection, and cannot be so. The most heart-rending curse on the land-owners was the Church Establishment of Ireland (hear), like the scorpion, it stung, and drew the blood of the people” (hear). As to the incorporation of the Roman Catholic clergy with the state, he objected to it, not because they believed in the doctrine of transubstantiation, but because he could not reconcile himself to the operation of that civil influence which he believed to attach to their religious system: while he was ready to treat with charity and tenderness the private scruples of any man’s conscience, he could not approve of such a branch of faith as that of confession, which tolerated one man’s communication to another of his intention to commit a murder, but restrained that other from divulging the information to the intended victim. He could himself understand the distinction which had been drawn with regard to the extent of the power of absolution; but did the ignorant peasant make these nice calculations, and weigh them justly in a moral scale? Then as to the doctrine of indulgences, and their natural influence upon the temporal conduct of the people, it afforded no satisfaction to him to hear Dr. Doyle describe the scale upon which such indulgences were estimated, their extension to seven years, beyond which they could not prevail, or their shorter quarantine of forty days (a laugh); enough for him was it to know what must be their effect in the popular notion of the remission of the punishment of sin. But he was asked whether he thought the law could remain upon its present footing; that was a question which he was not at the moment prepared to determine; at the same time he begged to be understood as ready to remedy every ground of complaint as to the administration of justice. He would make all reasonable concession to the Catholic, while he would maintain the Protestant character of the Throne, of the Parliament, of the Church, and of the judicial bench. But he could not approve of exciting the hopes of the people, as they had been excited respecting this question, by appeals to abstract principles of civil right, and by attacks on the Government. That the great body of the Catholics would experience considerable dissatisfaction, should Parliament reject their claims, he by no means doubted. But that dissatisfaction would be attributable, not to him or to those hon. gentlemen who thought with him, and who had never encouraged the expectations of the Catholics, but on the contrary, had witnessed the growth of those expectations with deep regret—it would be owing to those who had excited extravagant hopes in the Catholic mind. They were told that they were not to treat with, but to legislate for the Roman Catholics, although the experience of their history for the last ten years showed them, that they had not legislated, but had actually treated with that body, and regularly conceded step by step to the Catholic, without one accompanying concession to the Protestant. The securities offered at present were so inefficient, that he would rather pass the bill on the principle of general toleration, than with any reference to these miserable securities. Of what use, for example, would be the surveillance by a permanent commission exclusively composed of Catholics, to regulate their intercourse with the Church of Rome, and to judge of the loyalty of a bishop. When Dr. Doyle was asked whether he thought the provision for the Catholic clergy ought to be inalienable, his reply was, that he thought it ought while the clergy maintained a loyal and peaceable line of conduct; and of this demeanour the board of Catholics was to be the exclusive judge. With respect to the measure for raising the qualification of freeholds, he hoped the house would not accede to it without very grave consideration. He was ready to admit that in practice the existing mode of creating these small freeholds was often full of evil—that it led to perjury, and to the creation of fictitious votes; but he should, nevertheless, be most unwilling to interfere for the purpose of disfranchising those who belonged to the lowest classes of society. The same objection which he had to the alteration of the franchise he likewise had to the other measure for the payment of the clergy. He objected to it not so much upon financial grounds, as opening a precedent for the payment by the state of other classes of religious Dissenters. When he compared the conduct at present pursued by this Government on matters of religious toleration, with that of a neighbouring country, where a law was in agitation for inflicting the penalty of death upon those who offered insult to certain mysteries of the Catholic church—when he made this comparison, the more he became convinced that the principle of Protestant predominance in government afforded a greater security than was likely to be provided by any other, for the preservation of civil and religious liberty; and to that principle he was firmly determined to adhere (hear, hear).

Mr. Brougham wished to have it clearly understood, that he voted for the old, known, and not-to-be-mistaken measure of Catholic Emancipation. As to ulterior views—as to the value of one or the other of those plans proposed for security—they were matter of detail, to be reserved for the deliberation of a committee. That these plans were of great importance—that they were hardly inferior to the question itself in importance—was not to be denied. But they were novel, difficult to judge of, and his doubts were increased by the fact, that of the gentlemen most knowing in Irish affairs, civil and ecclesiastical, those who were most skilled in ecclesiastical matters had not the least doubt that the civil measures would be highly satisfactory, and effect the lasting tranquillity of Ireland; while they felt even more certain that the ecclesiastical regulations would create and prolong dissatisfaction; and so, on the other hand, the gentlemen whose practice in civil affairs was understood to be such as to give weight to their opinions, foretold that the regulations of a civil nature which were preparing would tend to disturb the peace of the country, though they had no doubt of the good which would result from the ecclesiastical parts of the measure. He would come to the discussion with his mind ready for conviction from any arguments which could reconcile the seeming incongruities, but remembering always his general constitutional principles. Any thing which but seemed to approach disfranchisement on the one hand, must excite alarm; on the other, a large increase of the influence of the Crown, implied in the assignment of a provision for an extensive and powerful hierarchy, must equally affect him with jealousy. He was ready for the discussion of the new topics; but they had no necessary connexion with the Catholic question. His opinion upon that question was clear from all doubt. On all grounds upon which he had ever heard it argued, on all motives of expediency, the question stood where it did before. The safety of the empire depended upon the use which the Parliament might make of this, perhaps the last opportunity it would have, for granting as a matter of grace that which would otherwise be extorted from them in the hour of peril and adversity.

When the house divided, the numbers were—
For the original motion, 269—For the amendment, 241.—Majority for the second reading, 27.

LORDS, MONDAY, APRIL 25.—The Duke of Fork said, that he had been requested to present to their lordships the petition of the Dean and Canons of Windoor, praying that no further concessions should be made to the Roman Catholics. He considered it unnecessary, in bringing before their lordships the petition of so learned and respectable a body, to assure them it was worded so as to ensure its reception; but before he moved that it should be read, he must be permitted to say a few words. Sensible as he was of his want of habit and ability to take a part in their lordships' debates, it was not without the greatest reluctance that he ventured to trespass upon their time and attention; but he felt that there were occasions when every man owed to his country and to his station, to declare his sentiments; and no opportunity could, in his opinion, offer, which required more imperiously the frank avowal of them than the present, when their lordships were called upon to make a total change in the fundamental principle of the constitution, and, in his view of the question, to strike at the very root of its existence. Twenty-eight years had elapsed since this question had been first agitated, under the most awful circumstances, while this country was engaged in a most arduous and expensive, though just and glorious war; the agitation of it had been the cause of a most serious and alarming illness to an illustrious personage now no more, whose exalted character and virtues, and whose parental affection for his people, would render his memory ever dear to his country; it had also produced the temporary retirement from his late Majesty's councils of one of the most able, enlightened, and most honest statesmen of whom this country could boast. Upon this question they were now called to decide; and from the first moment of its agitation to the present, he had not for one instant hesitated, or felt a doubt, as to the propriety of the line of conduct he had adopted in reference to it. He must call their lordships' attention to the great change of language and sentiments which had taken place since the subject was first introduced, among the advocates for Catholic Emancipation. At first the most zealous of these had cautiously and yet strenuously endeavoured to impress upon the minds of the people, that Catholic Emancipation ought not to be granted without establishing strong and effectual barriers against any encroachment on the Protestant ascendancy. But how changed was now their language! Their lordships were now required to surrender every principle of the constitution, and to deliver us up, bound hand and foot, to the mercy and generosity of the Roman Catholics, without any assurance even that they would be satisfied with such fearful concessions. He had, upon a former occasion, taken the liberty of stating his sentiments fully on the subject, and had endeavoured to explain to their lordships that no person was more decidedly inclined to toleration than his late Majesty, but that it must be admitted there was a great difference between toleration, participation, and emancipation. He would not now enter into this discussion, convinced as he was that if the bill should again be brought under their consideration, its merits would be much more ably discussed by others of their lordships. There were, however, one or two points which appeared to him to have been kept out of view in the different debates that had occurred in various places, and which seemed to him of such vital importance that he could not help touching upon them. The first was, the situation in which the Church of England would be placed should Catholic Emancipation pass. If he were mistaken, he should doubtless be set right, but he had always understood that the Established Church of England stood in a very different situation from any other religious persuasion in the world—different even from that of the sectarians in this country. The Established Church was subject to its own Government, and did not admit the interference of the civil authorities. It was placed under the authority of the King as the head of it, and under the control of Parliament; so much so, that the Church was not only not represented as a body in the lower House of Parliament, but no clergyman was admitted to a seat in it. Surely, their lordships could not wish to place the Established Church of England upon a worse footing than any other church within these realms; nor allow the Roman Catholics, who not only refused to submit to our rules, but who denied any authority of the civil power over their church, to legislate for the Established Church, which must be the case if they should be admitted to seats in either house of Parliament. The other point to which he had to advert was one he felt to be of a more delicate nature. He must, therefore, begin by stating to their lordships that he spoke only his own individual sentiments, as he must not be supposed to utter in that house the sentiments of any other person. He was sensible that by what he was about to say, he should subject himself to the scoffs and jeers of some, and to the animadversions of others; but from speaking conscientiously his own feelings and sentiments he would by no apprehension whatever be appalled or deterred. He wished to ask whether their lordships had considered the situation in which they might place the King, or whether they recollected the oath which His Majesty had taken at the altar to his people, upon his coronation. He begged to read the words of that oath:—"I will, to the utmost of my power, maintain the laws of God, the true profession of the Gospel, and the Protestant reformed religion established by law; and I will preserve unto the bishops and clergy of this realm, and to the churches committed to their charge, all such rights and privileges as by law do or shall appertain to them or any of them."—Their lordships must remember that our's was a Protestant King, who knew no mental reservation, and whose situation was different from any other person in this country; that he and every other individual in this country could be released from his oath by the authority of Parliament; but the King could not. The oath, as he had always understood, was a solemn obligation entered into by the person who took it, from which no act of his own could release him; but the King was the third part of the state, without whose voluntary consent no act of the legislature could be valid, and he could not relieve himself from the obligation of an oath. He feared that he had already trespassed too long upon their lordships, and he thanked them for the patience with which they had heard him. If he had expressed himself too warmly, especially in the latter part of what he had said, he must appeal to their liberality. He felt the subject most forcibly, and it affected him yet more deeply when he remembered that to its agitation must be ascribed that severe illness, and ten years of misery, which had clouded the existence of his illustrious and beloved father. He should therefore conclude with amuring their lordships that he had uttered his honest and conscientious sentiments, founded upon principles which he had imbibed from his earliest youth; to the justice of which he had subscribed, after serious consideration, when he attained more mature years; and that those were the principles to which he would adhere, and which he would maintain and act up to to the latest moment of his existence, whatever might be his situation of life.—So help him God!

The petition was read, and laid on the table.

Elective Franchise.

COMMONS, TUESDAY, APRIL 26.—Mr. Littleton, in rising to move the second reading of a bill brought in on Friday last, for regulating the elective franchise in Ireland, said, that the present mode of exercising that franchise was fraught with great evil, as it regarded the property of the country, and the morality of the people. He thought that any measure which tended to check the mode by which vast numbers of votes were procured from the most ignorant class of Irish peasantry, for the greater part Roman Catholics, would receive the approbation of the Protestant community, at the moment when that community was called upon to extend important political rights to the higher orders of the Catholic body. It had been said that his object was disfranchisement, and not regulation. But the house would presently see, that provision would be made to preserve in the most unqualified manner all vested interests at present in existence. For this purpose, a clause had been framed, which provided that nothing in this act should extend to affect any person who had registered a freehold, or who should register a freehold, before the passing of this act. After the passing of the act, there would be a cessation of the practice of multiplying those votes arising from freeholds, determinable on lives; and a creation of a different description of votes, which would be of the utmost importance to Ireland. There was nothing whatever in the bill which pointed at disfranchisement, the object being to elevate the character of the Irish freeholder as nearly as possible to a level with that of the English. At present they had no resemblance, the votes of the Irish freeholders being frauds on the law and the constitution; by their great numbers, they kept down the real freeholders of the country. The freeholders to whom this bill applied, were not, like the landholders of the country, the strength and honour of the nation—they were, on the contrary, its weakness and its discredit; for they ruined the very property which reared them. By the term "freeholder," in England, was understood, one who was in the actual and absolute possession of freehold property to the amount of forty shillings or upwards. There was another description of persons who also had a right to vote—he alluded to those who had an annuity, or rent-charge to the same amount. Such persons ought, he conceived, in justice to be deemed freeholders. But the Irish landholder, who in that country only was considered a freeholder, possessed no landed property whatever. He dragged out a miserable existence by labouring on the soil, and his right to vote was perhaps dependent on some other life. He not unfrequently held that right from a sub-lessee; he did not possess forty shillings a year in actual property; he might stipulate to pay a rent to that amount, and in default of that payment he was liable to be distrained upon, and whatever property he could call his own might be sold; he was obliged to attend at the session to register his freehold and swear that he was actually worth forty shillings a year; when he had committed that perjury, he was compelled to follow the herd to the hustings, and to vote for that person in whose favour his landlord interested himself, and of whom, perhaps, if he had the ability to judge for himself, and were left to take his own course, he would entirely disapprove. Gentlemen who were acquainted with county elections in England, knew that no greater complaint could be made against a candidate than that he had not personally solicited the votes of the freeholders. This was undoubtedly, at times very inconvenient to the candidate; but the jealousy with which the freeholder viewed any omission of the practice, proved that he understood, and rightly appre-

which, the value of the great privilege which he enjoyed; and which, therefore, he would not exercise lightly, nor in the support of a man by whom he conceived he had been slighted. But woe to him who visited and canvassed the electors of Ireland. He must be prepared to fight at least one duel, as the reward of his temerity. He understood it was the rule in the courts of law in Ireland—(a member called out “the courts of honour,” which caused much laughter)—he understood it was the rule in the courts of honour in Ireland, that whoever ventured to bring over to his interest the voters on the estate of a gentleman who wished to have his opponent returned, must justify his conduct at the pistol’s mouth. It was said that his best friend, the member for Galway, who was perfectly conversant in these matters, considered the offence given by such an act to be of so positive a nature, that he could hardly decide whether the person so conducting himself was not bound to receive his adversary’s fire without returning it (a laugh). No man but a priest could trespass on the province of a landlord; but whenever the landlord and the priest were brought into competition, the latter always drove the former out of the field. In the evidence before the committee, Mr. Blake had thus described the Irish 40s. freeholders:—“In general they pay what is originally a rack rent for the land, they then build mud huts upon it, and if they make out of the land a profit of forty shillings a year, a profit produced by the sweat of their brow, they reconcile to themselves to swear that they have an interest in it to the extent of forty shillings a year, whereas the gain is produced, not through an interest in the land, but through their labour.” Generally speaking, the forty shilling freeholders exercised no free choice at elections. Mr. O’Connell stated, that “in many places, the 40s. freeholder was considered as part of the live stock of the estate.” And when asked, “Are you of opinion that there is any great difficulty in making registries of freeholders without the business being very accurately performed according to law?”—he answered, “The greatest facility; the clerk of the peace can appoint his deputy, any man can be his deputy for the moment, and it is the easiest thing in the world to register freeholds upon the present system, without either freehold or valid tenure to constitute a freeholder. He had known numerous instances, where, if a peasant was made to swear that he had a freehold of forty shillings, he would have perjured himself in the grossest way; and in those instances a friendly magistrate or two may very easily get into the room: an adjournment of the sessions for the purpose of registry is the easiest thing in the world, because the Act of Parliament gives validity to the registry, notwithstanding any irregularity in the adjournment of the sessions: therefore two magistrates can come together very easily, get the deputy of the clerk of the peace to attend, and they can register upon unstamped paper if they please. They can register with the life described in such a way, that that life will be either dead or living, as they please, at the next election; John O’Driscoll or Timothy Sullivan, or any thing of that kind. Frauds with respect to the registry of freeholds are very considerable, but still it is a very great advantage to the Irish peasant upon the whole, to have the power of voting given to him by a forty shilling freehold.” It could not be doubted that the act of 1793 created a great additional interest in that house in favour of the Roman Catholics, and forwarded the claims of that body. Looking at that fact, he did not disagree with Mr. O’Connell in the conclusion to which he had come—namely, that under the existing state of the law, it was advantageous to the Irish peasant to possess this privilege. But Mr. Shiel said, when speaking of raising the qualification of freeholders, “so far from its being an injury, it would be a benefit to the lower orders that the qualifications should be raised, and that the mass of the peasantry should not be invested every five or six years with a mere semblance of political authority, which does not naturally belong to them, and which is quite unreal. The peasantry are driven in droves of freeholders to the hustings: they must obey the command of their landlord; it is only in cases of peculiar emergency, and where their passions are powerfully excited, that a revolt against the power of the landlord can take place.” Mr. Hugh Wallace’s examination was to the same effect. “Do you know in what manner some of the proprietors in Ireland are in the habit of controlling the votes of their tenants?—I know two modes by which they harass the tenants who do not vote as they wish them to do. One is, preventing them from having bog ground, (the right of cutting, in the bogs of the landlord, firing for the tenant,) which, in general, is not granted by the leases, but is an easement that they are permitted to enjoy by the landlords: the other is, the compelling them, upon estates where it has always been allowed that half a year’s rent should be in the tenant’s hands, to pay up that to the day it becomes due. So that if the forty shilling freeholder votes according to his own judgment, he is immediately obliged to pay up what is called the back half year’s rent, and is deprived of firing for the next half year. Generally speaking, those 40s. freeholders exercise no freedom of election whatever.” The evidence of the hon. member for Kilkenny (Mr. Dennis Browne), was exceedingly important. “If the object is a free and fair election; if the object is, that a man should represent the fair sense of the county, undoubtedly the forty shilling freehold system is entirely against that. The present election laws are all for the encouragement of fictitious votes, because they give no power of examining at all; any man that is registered must vote; as to going to a petition afterwards, that is quite out of the question; we can hardly stand the expense of an election, much less of a petition.” Now the measure which was at present before the house was intended entirely to remove those fictitious votes; and he was surprised that any gentleman should oppose such a measure. Mr. Brown was asked, “Are not the small freeholders so much under the influence and in the power of the landlords, that they dare not act against them?—I think they are; because they owe us generally double what they have to pay us.” The house might here see the demoralizing effects of this system: if one of these freeholders, at the general election, dared to vote against his landlord, the punishment of his temerity would be an ejectionment from his residence. What further proof was necessary of the demoralization which must be produced by such a system, than the fact, that landlords did not only pursue this course, but that they pursued it with impunity? Where was the English county member who would venture to speak of his constituents, as Irish county members did not scruple to do? Where was the English county member who would venture to act towards his tenants and voters, as the Irish county members did not hesitate to act: if he once hazarded such a course, he would pay for his temerity. Mr. Blake was asked, "Do not you think a considerable outcry would be raised in Ireland, if it were proposed to raise the qualification of forty shilling freeholders?" His answer was, "If the forty shilling freeholders were persons of independent property, exercising through their property any influence, I think it would produce a very serious outcry; but the present forty shilling freeholders are not persons likely to feel it." This was indisputably the fact. The Irish forty shilling freeholder had nothing to lose. Such a loss as that of voting, would, in fact, be a real gain. He would lose a painful and disgusting obligation, of being obliged to establish a right by perjury. But if the bill of the hon. baronet passed—and he did not desire that the measure he now proposed should be carried without the other—then would the Irish Catholic enjoy the gratifying feeling that he was placed on an equality with his Protestant brother. To the nobility and gentry of Ireland the act which he now endeavoured to introduce would be of inappreciable value, for it was a measure which would bind them to abstain from cutting up their estates and incomes, by raising those immense armies of fictitious freeholders. They would be obliged to depend, as the nobility and gentry of England did, on the force of public opinion. They would have no influence beyond that which was attached, and would always be attached to the possession of extensive property. Another feature of demoralization arising out of this system, which he could not pass over in silence, was the growing indifference of the lower classes of Ireland to the sanctity of oaths. This was produced by the multiplication of oaths, which were, in consequence, looked upon without awe, and frequently violated. Mr. O'Connell in his evidence, said, "the frequency of oaths has had a most demoralizing effect on the peasantry of Ireland. This is principally evident in the minor courts of justice in that country. To have a conscience is bad. The man who has one can do his friend no good; but a witness who is free from such tie is invaluable. The peasantry employ their children, at a very early age, to act as their witnesses, and the consequence may easily be imagined." What hope was there of amelioration in a country where landlords were constantly encouraging the disregard of a sacred form? Before he entered more particularly into the provisions of this bill, he would state, that there was no novelty in its principle. Formerly, in this country, freeholders of every description were allowed to vote. But, by the statute of Henry VI., the right of voting was restricted to those who had forty shillings a-year or upwards, of real property. According to the value of money at present, as compared with the value in the reign of Henry VI., it might be argued that the qualification ought to be raised. But there were very few freeholders in this country who did not possess a more extensive property than that which would barely qualify them to vote; and when he considered their independence, and intelligence, they appeared so admirably qualified for the discharge of their duties, that the propriety of altering the qualification had never entered into his mind. But the qualification of freeholders in Ireland had frequently been modified. When in 1793 the elective franchise was granted to the Roman Catholics of Ireland, it was foretold by every man of sense in the Irish Parliament, that frauds of every description would be resorted to. This was soon verified; and the act of 1795 was passed, which made occupancy the condition of voting. The evil, however, not only continued, but increased. A law was in consequence enacted, which provided that no forty shilling freeholder should be allowed to vote, unless his freehold were registered for one clear year prior to the day of election, and it also provided that the registration should be renewed every seven years. Here, then, a clear distinction was made between the forty shilling freeholder and the forty pound or fifty pound freeholder. But this was not all. By an act of Parliament passed in the month of June last, known as Mr. Browne's act, joint-tenants were prevented from voting. The preamble set forth that certain joint-tenants were in the habit of voting for members of Parliament, to the material prejudice of the improvement of the people, the right thus assumed being a colourable one only; and the bill declared that no joint-tenants, as described in the preamble, should be thereafter allowed to vote. Here, then, was a prospective disfranchisement of a large body of people, and especially of Roman Catholics. That bill was agreed to by a large body of those who considered it as a step towards procuring Catholic Emancipation. He did not know how the parties who were friendly to the bill of last year, could consistently oppose the present. The whole question, it appeared to him, resolved itself into the amount to which the qualification should extend; for the principle, he had shown, had already been recognized. What the qualification should be, it was in the breast of the house to determine. Three sums had been spoken of—five pounds a year, ten pounds a year, or 20 pounds a year. If the qualification were as low as five pounds a year, it would only increase the evil (hear, hear). He was sure there were but few landlords who created freeholders under a rack rent of forty shillings a year, that could not, with equal facility, get his tenant to swear that he had an interest in the land of 5*l.* a year, although he only derived that sum from his labour. If the amount of the qualification should be raised to twenty pounds, he feared that it would have the effect of reducing the electors to too small a number for the fair expression of the public opinion. His own wish, therefore, was in favour of the qualification being limited to ten pounds, and this he believed would be sufficient to guard against perjury. He would now come to the advantages which this regulation was likely to produce to the country. In the first place it would operate as a bounty for creating that valuable class of men, a yeomanry, the absence of which in Ireland had, it was admitted universally, been the cause of many of the evils under which that country laboured. In the second place it would tend to strengthen and confirm the Protestant interest, and the Protestant establishment in that country. If it were true, as was generally believed, that the population of Ireland was Catholic, while the possession of property was in the hands of the Protestants, any measure which tended to strengthen the latter class, must surely be approved of. In support of this view of the subject, he would quote the opinions which had been given in evidence on the Committee, by the hon. member for Louth (Mr. Foster) and by Mr. Blake. It would be perhaps impossible to find persons better qualified than those gentlemen to give opinions on this subject, or opinions which were more satisfactory. This question was put to the hon. member for Louth: "What is your opinion of the effect of the operation of the elective franchise, in respect to forty-shilling freeholders, since the act of 1793?—It tends to any thing but their own freedom, or the assertion of their own privileges; it has had the operation of adding very considerably to the number of the existing population in Ireland, and still more to their misery. A more mistaken view of the subject could not be, than to suppose there is any freedom of choice practically existing on the part of those persons; it is a clear addition of weight to the aristocracy, and not to the democracy, in elections. It tends to set aside any real value or importance that the substantial freeholders of fifty pounds, or twenty pounds, might otherwise have; it bears them down by a herd of people, each of whose votes is of as much consequence as their own, and who are brought in to vote, without any option on their part. The only doubt that ever arises is, whether they are to give their votes according to the orders of their landlord or of their priest: the tenant in neither case exercises any other choice than to determine which he will encounter—the punishment he may expect from his landlord in time, or that which he is told awaits him in eternity. There is no end to the perjury in qualifying for the franchise." "Do you not think that a Protestant member of parliament, depending entirely for his election on Roman Catholic constituents, would vote very much as a Roman Catholic member of parliament elected by the same persons?—I think he would, and that he does, though not with the same sincerity." "Do you think, that that portion of the Irish Protestants, whom you have stated to be adverse to the claims of the Roman Catholics, would be more disposed to entertain the consideration of those claims, if they thought any modification of the right of voting might be a part of the arrangement?—I think a great many of them would be very much influenced by that consideration, and decided by it." "What would be, in your opinion, the inconvenience of depriving the forty-shilling freeholders in those parts of the country of the right of voting?—I think the consequence would be to diminish the influence of the aristocracy in elections, and to give to the substantial yeomanry of the north a new and important influence. I dare say the forty-shilling Protestant freeholders in Ulster might feel a little mortified at the passing of the law; but I beg to say, that even with respect to the Protestant freeholder, I do not think it would be any real loss to him, for I do not consider that even the Protestant freeholders of Ulster exercise their own judgment. They, too, are in the power of their landlords." "What do you apprehend would be the effect of the alteration of the elective franchise in the other three provinces of Ireland?—I think one immediate effect of it would be to present to many of the members who now sit for the south of Ireland, the option of losing their elections, or of resisting the Roman Catholic claims. I think some of the present members for the south of Ireland hold their seats by virtue of the forty-shilling franchise." "Supposing the Catholics to be emancipated, and the elective franchise to be raised to 20*l*., would there not be fewer persons in parliament for Ireland, depending on Catholic constituents, than there are now?—Probably not half a dozen representatives for Ireland, depending on Roman Catholics; but it may be material to observe that every thing I have said supposes the legislature shall not create any franchise intermediate between 40*s*. and 20*l*.. If the franchise were raised to 5*l*., I am persuaded very many of those unfortunate persons who have sworn to a franchise of 40*s*. would swear to one of 5*l*.. I do not think they would outrage appearances so far as to swear to one of 20*l*." Upon this answer, then, he (Mr. Littleton) thought he was fully justified in fixing the qualification at 10*l*.. The evidence of Mr. Blake on the same subject, was to the same effect, and he had added, "I think a state provision for the Roman Catholic clergy, if the Roman Catholic body were taken into the bosom of the state, and received as good and faithful subjects, would be considered a great boon, and would give great satisfaction both to the clergy and laity." After the evidence which he had quoted, as well as from the deep and anxious consideration he had given to this subject, he could not doubt that the main and immediate tendency of this measure would be to take from the Catholic population an influence in elections which was neither useful to their interests nor safely exercised, and to extend that which was more properly vested in the higher orders, strengthening at the same time the Protestant establishment in that country. He had been pressed by more than one hon. member in that house to abandon the measure which was now under discussion, and to content himself rather with the appointment of a committee. He had, however, declined to do this for several reasons. In the first place it was upon the evidence contained in the report of Parliamentary Committees that this measure was founded. Whatever difference of opinion might prevail as to the nature of the remedy to be proposed, there was none as to the existence of the evil, which was admitted in its fullest extent. To attempt to reach this evil through the slow means of another committee, was in vain; and such was the spirit of evasion in Ireland, that he was convinced any measure short of that legislative enactment which he hoped would now be adopted by the house, would only add tenfold to the perjury and the other evils with which the present system abounded. There was no man who did not feel that this question had now arrived at a point where it was impossible for it to remain stationary (hear, hear). If the public opinion were really to direct the proceedings of that house, who could deny that it was now loudly expressed in favour of the question? Who could observe the heirs apparent to some of the peerages of the realm differing from their fathers, and renouncing the old prejudices which had hitherto seemed inseparably connected with their family names, and yet doubt that the time had arrived when this question must be carried? The Catholic clergy, and the laity, were now willing to make sacrifices much greater than they had ever before offered or contemplated. Of this disposition they could give no greater proofs than by their concurrence in the measure before the house. There was no concession which they would not make in return for the boon which this bill was to confer on them; and when it should be carried into effect, they were willing to pass an act of oblivion on all that had taken place, and to hold out the hand of reconciliation (cheers). He felt that he should be wanting in candour, if he did not state, that amongst his constituents there were many persons for whose opinion on every other matter he had the highest respect, with whom on this it was his fate to differ; but he must add that in that part of the country to which he alluded, the question was rather regarded as one of religious antipathy than of political regulation. He was, however, satisfied that the same causes which had produced so great a change in the opinions of parliament, would have a similar effect out of doors, and he had no doubt that in a very short time all persons would be united in their conviction of the expediency of this measure. For his own part, he should act upon this opinion with unabated zeal; and he was perfectly convinced, that until parliament should consent to do what was just toward the Catholic people of Ireland, they could never hope to establish that peace and union which were necessary to the well-being of the nation (loud cheers).

Mr. L. Foster said, that he had no hesitation in repeating, that the existing state of the elective franchise in Ireland was a great evil. But it by no means followed that he was prepared to go the same lengths with the hon. gent., or to adopt the measure which he had proposed. If the hon. gent. was prepared to apply his remedy to every description of fictitious freeholds in Ireland, he was ready to go along with him (hear, hear). But if the measure which he proposed were calculated, like the present, to place matters upon a footing more objectionable and more unconstitutional than they were now, and to give place to greater immorality than even at present prevailed, he felt compelled to withhold his assent. The rock upon which the hon. gentleman's scheme would be wrecked, seemed to be this—he carefully avoided meddling with the fictitious freeholds when they assumed the garb of fees simple, but he attacked them with a bold hand indeed when they were only terms for lives. That would have the effect of doing away nine-tenths of the voters. Every freeholder in fee under 20*l.* was obliged formerly to produce the instrument under which he held, and to swear that he held the estate personally. But by an act passed in the first year of his present Majesty's reign, he might swear that he was entitled to a forty-shilling freehold, without producing his title-deeds. The consequence was, that upon a number of commons in Ireland persons built hovels, swore for those hovels, and voted for them. Their number was constantly increasing. They did not take the trouble of registering themselves, but were registered by some neighbouring gentleman, for they were generally of the poorest class, and were scarcely amenable to the law. They had no rights, but this tortious possession, and they were obviously the most likely persons to be exposed to such modes of influence as that house would wish to discountenance. With respect to this class of voters, he would propose that no person hereafter should be allowed to register any franchise under 10*l.* unless he were rated to the county rates for two acres of land (hear, hear). A provision of this kind would not exclude any honest vote, but would exclude only that class to which he was alluding. The freeholders in market towns, were persons of a better order than the mere peasantry; they were not open to perjury; and, therefore, their votes ought to be protected.

Mr. Brougham was unfeignedly sorry that this question had been interposed between the discussions on the other bill. As a sincere and fervent friend to Catholic Emancipation, he had great reason to complain that he and those who thought with him on that important subject should be called, whether they would or not, to the discussion of this collateral question, which had no necessary or natural connexion with that of Emancipation; but which was brought in as if it were part and parcel of the bill of his hon. friend the member for Westminster, and made to proceed pari passu with it. It had been read the first time immediately after that bill had been read the second time; and it was now to be read a second time just before that bill was to go into a committee; and was to come out of that committee just at the time the other would be reported. It also contained a clause to provide that it should not take effect unless the house passed that other bill. This he considered an unprecedented solecism in legislation. The house was in effect manifesting a distrust of its own intentions, and taking security against its own acts. He hoped that so venerable a body as the parliament of England would not set the example of saying, we are in such a state of ignorance as to what we are doing, that we can take no step in this matter without saying this shall go for nothing unless we do a certain other thing. He was a sincere and an enthusiastic friend of the Catholic cause. From the first moment at which he had come to a solemn conviction on that subject—from the moment at which he could make his vote in that house available in support of his conviction, he had steadily and conscientiously advocated the question. Now that he had entertained sanguine hopes of its success—and God knew that if ever its success seemed particularly necessary, it was at this time—at this moment he found himself placed in the cruel situation of being called upon to decide another question, upon minutes of evidence which furnished contradictory information, and which therefore left him in total ignorance of its real merits—a question which, upon the face of it, whatever appearance it might assume when it should be sifted out, sounded in disfranchisement. Upon this question he was told he must now decide, or he would be impeding the success of that measure, which he believed was of vital and absolute necessity to the safety of the empire. This was the first ground of his complaint. If he were inclined to be dogmatical, he should say that he disapproved of the measure. For aught he knew it might be a very sound one; it might deserve all the encomiums of the hon. member for Stafford; it might deserve the attention of the house; but it was novel in its nature, and came upon them with such rapidity and urgency, that the house had no opportunity of inquiring into its real merits. Did not all this prove to the house the necessity of passing? They were called upon to adopt a measure which the hon. member by whom it was introduced told them was founded upon the evidence of the hon. member for Louth. That hon. member got up in his place and said, "I am wholly against the measure. My evidence means no such thing as you imagine. Either I will agree to no bill at all, or I will have one that shall go much further. I will have not only the tenants of leases for lives disfranchised, but the tenants in fee simple also. The elective franchise is, in Ireland as in England, too large already; we find the numerous voters at elections troublesome." Was this not enough to induce the house to pause (hear, hear)? They were told by a class of men, who had carried their dogmatical notions almost as far, and with a spirit similar to the religious persecutions of other times—he meant the political economists, who had held up a valued friend of his, Mr. Malthus, to public ridicule, only because he differed from Mr. Ricardo on a mere metaphysical, not a practical point—that they ought to pass this measure for the purpose of checking that redundant population which he was ready to admit was a great evil in Ireland. When, however, he looked into the evidence, he saw nothing to support this dogma of the political economists. It was the same with respect to the subdivision of property, on which great stress was laid by the same sect; and thus the reasoning, however ingenious and satisfactory to the persons who advanced it, was altogether worthless, because it was in no respect borne out by the facts. Another sect said, "The Catholics, greatly to their own credit, have agreed, clergy and laity, to give up this question of the elective franchise, and, in return for this valuable concession, they expect at your hands the measure of Emancipation, although they will be greatly injured by the sacrifice they have made." Now he did not understand the "although." One man said the Catholics were injured by this concession, and another that the Protestants were injured. But now for the main body of the sentence. How did it appear that the Catholics had made any such concession? It was at least fit to know in what terms they made it, in order to ascertain its validity. Where were the "granting words," as the lawyers called them? They would be found in the statement of his learned friend, Mr. O'Connell, their attorney, properly authorised. He was asked, "Do you conceive that the system of 40s. freeholders, connected as it now is with the law between landlord and tenant, is such as to ensure fair representation?" And he answered, "It is impossible to say that; it has its advantages and disadvantages; it gives to the owners of good estates great influence: that I believe is a great deal in the spirit of the modern practice in Parliamentary representation: it opens the door, however, for considerable frauds; and though I am quite convinced of the frauds, I see great difficulties in altering it. I should be glad, though it is a very crude opinion, if the qualification were de." But in the next page, he said, "In my humble judgment it would not be at all right to meddle with them (the 40s. freeholders). I have not expressed any opinion favourable to raising the franchise at all." Was this concession—was it not the reverse? He was asked again whether he thought "that the species of improvement in Ireland, which there is fair reason to believe exists, has a tendency to place the social system in Ireland more upon a footing of similarity to that of England in that respect, and therefore to correct the evil of 40s. freeholders?" and his reply was "I am entirely of that opinion; I think the progressive improvement in Ireland is such as is calculated to do away a great deal of the inconvenience of the present system, and to render it quite unnecessary, if it ever were necessary, to make any alteration." It would not become Parliament to rush upon the course proposed by the hon. mover; the question should be made the subject of deliberate inquiry. A great deal had been said about the evils of an enslaved peasantry, such as the forty shilling freeholders on leaseholds for life were said to be, and a picture had been presented to the house which was certainly calculated to arrest attention. With much diffidence he ventured to suggest, that the real cause of the evil was not to be found in that circumstance. His reason for saying so was this—that having listened with the most anxious, and he hoped he might say accurate, attention to the speech of the hon. mover, he recognized hardly a feature of the picture which he had drawn of the herds or droves of peasantry being brought up under the lash, it might almost be said, of their masters, which did not apply to other places quite as strongly as to Ireland—in a less degree, no doubt, because the Irish freeholders were somewhat more numerous, and somewhat more dependent on their landlords, than the same description of persons to whom he alluded elsewhere. What would the hon. member for Staffordshire think of the picture which he could paint, without borrowing one false tint or exaggerating a single line of the conduct of great landholders in England? He would suppose that a landlord was desirous of maintaining his interest in a county. He would say to his tenants—be (Mr. B.) would not make use of the names O'Driscoll and O'Shaughnessy, they would only do for Ireland (a laugh), but the tenants should be called Thompson and Jackson; the landlord then would say to Thompson and Jackson—"You shall have a renewal of the leases of the farms on which your ancestors have lived undisturbed for generations on one condition, which is, that you shall qualify yourselves to vote for a knight of the shire by getting a forty shilling freehold." Of course Thompson and Jackson found it necessary to consent to this arrangement. The freehold was a mere cover, but the tenants kept it for the sake of their farms, just as the Irish freeholder kept his bog (a laugh). The counterparts of the O'Driscolls and O'Shaughnessys in England were obliged to do just what their landlords pleased, unless they had the good fortune to have a lease on parchment, unhackled with any condition: and though they were not, as in Ireland, driven up in herds to the poll, yet it would not be easy to find a single instance in which a landlord's dictation was not implicitly obeyed. The cause of this was the natural influence of property, of which he did not complain (hear). This influence existed in England as well as in Ireland, and must exist every where. There was a city in England represented by two of his hon. friends, for which freeholders voted as well as freemen. Certain landlords in the neighbourhood, who had an interest opposed to that of the freemen, granted leaseholds for

lives exactly after the Irish fashion. Let not members, then, run away with the idea that the evil which was complained of was peculiar to Ireland. Much had been said on the subject of perjury. Men, it was stated, came up in droves to vote, as forty shilling freeholders, who were only leaseholders for lives. How, it was asked, could those men afford to purchase freeholds? Why, the landlord gave his tenant a freehold, without consideration of course, but then he received fifty shillings rent for the land. Under those circumstances the tenant took upon himself to swear that the freehold was his own. He knew that the same thing was done in England. One word more with respect to perjury. The commission of perjury was stated to be one of the greatest evils of the present system, and the putting an end to it was one of the greatest advantages held forth as likely to result from the passing of the bill. No man could entertain greater horror of the debasing system of false swearing than he did; but let it not be supposed that the practice was confined to the Irish peasantry, whom it was proposed to disfranchise in order to prevent it. He would say nothing of the Irish grand juries and their presentments—that was forbidden ground (a laugh); but he knew what took place nearer home—not on the part of electors, but of the elected—not in the county of Tipperary, but on the ten or twelve square feet of ground on which he was standing (a laugh): Did it become those whom he was addressing, to declare that they could not contemplate without abhorrence that a man should swear he possessed certain qualifications, which, in fact, he did not possess—to hold up their hands and bless God that in this country people could not be found, as in Ireland, to take the dreadful and sacrilegious oath that they were worth forty shillings a year—to rush down with a bill to save the souls of the Irish peasants (a laugh)? He would not stop to inquire whether the Irish would feel obliged for the attention which the house manifested towards the safety of their souls. They must be convinced that Parliament was extremely anxious with respect to their spiritual concerns, however their temporal matters might suffer under its management; though it might perhaps be suspected, that they would rather desire Parliament should be more careful of their purses, and leave their souls to take care of themselves (laughter). But no; the cry was disfranchise the Irish freeholders, and put a stop to perjury. Let the house take care that they did not disfranchise themselves. He was credibly informed, that certain members of that house—of a former Parliament—of course it could not be of the present that he was speaking (a laugh)—did sacrilegiously make oath in the Lord Steward's office one day, and at the table of the house on another, that they were worth 300*l.* a year in lands and tenements, when some of them were not worth a shilling, and others had no land at all (laughter). Suppose that the Irish freeholders should bring such a charge against the house. He should be without an answer to it. He might, it was true, look big and say, "Do you know what you are doing, in imputing systematic perjury to the members of this house? It is a breach of privilege, and I will send you to Newgate." To Newgate they must go, for he could have no other means of getting rid of the charge (hear, and a laugh). It could not be denied, that it was the practice of senators to do that for doing which the Irish freeholders were now to be disfranchised. The fathers of hon. members had done so before them, and they their worthy sons, swore perhaps more glibly that they were worth 300*l.* a year in land; nay, they went further—they did what the Irish freeholders could not do, because he apprehended they did not know how to write—they gave in a schedule specifying very minutely the particular county and parish in which their lands and tenements were to be found (a laugh). It did not, then, become the house to be particularly nice on the subject of perjury. It was all very well and proper to express a becoming horror of the crime, but when they came to disfranchise people on account of it, they should beware lest they disfranchised themselves (hear, hear). But the practice in question was not confined to members of that house. He would allude to a profession, than which none was more honourable—he meant that of arms. He had no doubt that the first gallant officer who might speak on the question, would express his contempt of the Irish freeholders for their false swearing. The members of the house who were not connected with the army entertained a more religious feeling on the subject, and talked of the impious nature of perjury; but officers of the army, being men of honour, would in all probability express their surprise and indignation, that any being could be found so degraded as to swear that he was worth forty shillings in land, when in fact he was not. These very officers, however, when the question was about the buying of a commission—did not swear to be sure—that was out of their line (a laugh), but—always declared upon their honour, that they had given no more than the regulation price, though they knew all the time that they had given double. An honourable friend near him informed him that this practice was now discontinued, which he was glad to hear. Hitherto he had only spoken of laymen; but it grieved him inexpressibly to be compelled to state that the Church itself was not without a stain (laughter). It grieved him much to say this (a laugh), and particularly because it would be the means of taking much preaching out of the mouths of those persons whom his honourable friend (Mr. Tierney) once described as people with an odd dress in another house (a laugh). Those reverend persons were in the habit of talking of perjury as a crime not to be heard of without abomination—they declared that truth, sincerity, and frankness were the essence of religion. If, then, perjury were criminal when committed by laymen, it must be ten times more odious when practised by churchmen: and yet what did these reverend persons do? He would suppose that a reverend gentleman was about to be inducted into a bishoprick of about 4000*l.* a year. He declared in the name of God, that he felt inwardly moved—(a laugh)—yes, that he felt inwardly moved at that moment by the Holy Ghost, to take upon himself the office of bishop and the administration thereof, and for no other reason (hear, and a laugh). How all this could go on was a mystery which he professed himself unable to understand; he supposed it was calculated for the end which the parties had in view. He could not, however, help thinking that the members of that house who took one oath, and the bishops and clergy out of doors who took another, were the last persons in the world who should be so exquisitely squeamish with regard to the conduct of the Irish Catholic freeholders, whom they had all along treated as if they were the only mortals under heaven who had ever been guilty of perjury. He would say nothing with regard to custom-house oaths, because they went to support the revenue (a laugh). A great and flourishing revenue was doubtless a great blessing, and God forbid that he should do any thing to injure it. These, however, were the grounds of some of the doubts which he entertained with respect to the measure before the house, in a moral and religious point of view. He would now revert to his grand objection to the bill as a political measure. It was said that the bill was to smooth the way for Catholic emancipation. If any thing could induce him, —he could not say to overcome his objections to the bill, for he was in a state of ignorance respecting it—but if any thing could induce him to vote for the measure in the dark—the great boon which was held out would be the most powerful bribe that could be offered him. He could not but respect the high authority by which the measure was recommended. It was supported by the Attorney-General for Ireland, who had, who could have, no other object in view than the benefit of Ireland. Hardly inferior to him in authority was the honourable member for Westminster, who possessed no more information on the subject than the rest of the house, but who was inclined to support the bill because he was led to believe that it would tend towards the attainment of the object which, to his own immortal honour, he had so ably and earnestly struggled for—the happiness of Ireland (hear, hear). But there was another authority to which he bowed with great submission. He stated this in the presence of the two hon. members, because he knew that they would be the first persons to render the respect which was due to that revered authority—he meant the rt. hon. baronet who sat near him (Sir J. Newport). That rt. hon. bart. was one of the most disinterested statesmen, whether in the house or out of the house, whether in regard to the interests of the empire generally, or of those of his own, to him dear and beloved, country; and he trusted that his country, grateful for his exertions, not only now, but when he should be taken from them would enrol his name with that of Grattan (hear, hear). When he found the authority of this distinguished individual given unflinchingly and unqualifiedly in favour of the bill before the house, he felt staggered, and almost inclined to say, that he would follow his opinion blindfold. But he was called upon to take a great step in the dark. He had no evidence to show that the measure would be effectual for the object which it was professed to have in view. He had no evidence to prove, that that object was a legitimate one, and he had any thing rather than evidence that it would conciliate the people of Ireland. He had, on the contrary, strong reason to believe that it would split them into schisms, if not alienate them from the question of Catholic Emancipation. Mr. Shiel, in his evidence before the committee, expressed his opinion that the proposed disfranchisement of the freeholders would be submitted to, if Mr. O'Connell were to use his influence to that end. Was that a ground for Parliament to legislate upon (cheers)? He thought highly of Mr. O'Connell, and believed that his influence in Ireland was the best pledge of conciliation; but he was of opinion that Mr. O'Connell was the last person who would wish for the passing of the bill, on condition of his afterwards proceeding amongst his countrymen to make it popular. There was no doubt that Catholic Emancipation would be productive of incalculable benefit to Ireland, but its good effects would not be immediately felt by the peasantry. Mr. O'Connell, however, would have to go to his countrymen and say, "We have carried a measure which opens to the higher Catholics, the Bench, the House of Commons, and the House of Lords, and all the price which we have paid for these concessions is the abandonment of your elective rights" (hear, hear). This was the sort of argument which Mr. Shiel expected Mr. O'Connell to use to his countrymen, and what was more extraordinary, expected him to use it with success. Mr. O'Connell, however, would use no such argument: his evidence was against the measure. There was not a more wholesome and safe principle of legislation than that every great measure of public polity should be considered and adopted or rejected on its own merits, and not on the merits of another (hear, hear). What was the consequence of the left-handed, complicated, confused mode of legislation which it was proposed to pursue on the present occasion? He might call it the cabinet-mode of legislation by compromise, but he wished to avoid giving offence. The house might decide upon a whole set of measures, and not adopt the right one after all. The bill was held forth as a bribe to induce those who were opposed to the Catholic question to vote for it. In this way it was impossible that the bill could be decided upon its own merits. But if it should, on consideration, be found improper, let it be rejected, even though by that circumstance the Catholic question should lose the support of the three votes which had been promised in consideration of the passing of the bill. If the proposers of any measure were to offer to one member the command of a ship, and to another that of a regiment, to induce them to support it, he should consider that a bad mode of legislation, but not so objectionable as that of bribing members to support one measure by passing of another. Our ancestors, it should be remembered, had always been most scrupulous in meddling with the elective franchise; particularly when it was proposed to extend that privilege, as he had no doubt their descendants would be, if such a proposition were now made. If, for instance, he were to propose that copyholders should be allowed to vote, he was sure he should not be able to get many members to give half a vote for his proposition, who were nevertheless disposed to run helter-skelter to vote for the bill before the house, as if it were one of the most plain and reasonable measures imaginable. Still more cautious, however, had the house been in adopting any measure the object of which was to narrow the elective franchise. He would remind the house of the conduct pursued with respect to Gramscound, a little borough having not more than about thirty voters. Corruption on the part of the electors had been clearly proved in that case; yet committees were appointed, evidence lives exactly after the Irish fashion. Let not members, then, run away with the idea that the evil which was complained of was peculiar to Ireland. Much had been said on the subject of perjury. heard, and the bill for disfranchising the borough did not pass through the house in less than two sessions. The bill for disfranchising Helston was before the house for three sessions, and was finally rejected. Yet the house was now called upon, without any inquiry whatever, to disfranchise a whole class of voters. What had our ancestors done still farther back, and in a time of greater authority in constitutional matters? The measure approximating nearest to the one before the house was the Splitting Act, of which Lord Somers was the author. In the first volume of his Traacts Lord Somers had left a note containing his opinion with regard to the Splitting Act, and that opinion certainly was favourable to such a measure as the one before the house. But was that act, the Splitting Act, brought in tacked to another question, as a sort of make-weight? No, it was introduced as a part of the legislation of a whole session on the same subject. In the session of the 7th and 8th of King William, the attention of Parliament was directed throughout to the question of parliamentary reform. It was the standing topic of the period. The Treating Act was passed in a few weeks after the Splitting Act. Another bill for regulating elections was discussed stage by stage with the Splitting Act; the bill, however, was not passed into an act, because the King refused to sanction it. That bill contained a clause, which proposed that the practice of voting by ballot should be universally adopted in England. The divisions on the measures to which he had alluded were never carried in houses of less than from 300 to 400 members. This was the sort of legislation which it became the house to follow. Any measure which tended to restrain the liberty of the franchise of the people ought to be subjected to the most careful scrutiny. He trusted that the house would not rest satisfied with being told that the bill had been considered in a committee. That would be any thing but an answer to his call for investigation. That committee was appointed to investigate every subject connected with Ireland; but he wanted the bill to be made the subject of a special investigation. He would defy any member to prove that any question had been proposed in the committee, except in one direction, as to the merits of the bill. The first witness, on whose evidence the bill was said to be founded, stated that another and a better remedy might be found. Under these circumstances was he asking for too much when he demanded inquiry? No two witnesses had agreed on the subject in the committee; and he would venture to say that no two gentlemen from Ireland in that house would be found to give the same description of the fact, or the same opinion as to the remedy. If the Catholic question were carried by itself, it would be received by the people of Ireland as a pledge of conciliation; but if it were coupled with the bill before the house, it would be open to misconstruction. These were the doubts and forebodings which he could not help feeling on the subject. It was said that by agreeing to the present bill in the dark, the Catholic question would be carried. He did not believe that. He thought that those persons who said so were reckoning without their hosts; at all events, he was afraid that they were reckoning without their Lords (a laugh). It was not for him to allude to what passed in another House of Parliament, except as a matter of history;

but he would say, that he had heard passages in another place which gave him an alarm, not only for the good government, but the safety of the constitution of this country, and for the stability of the monarchy as by law established (loud cries of hear), and settled at the Revolution of 1688. The passages to which he alluded had given him so deep and serious an alarm, that he protested before God he could not believe his ears when the news was brought to him that morning. It was impossible, even now, to believe what was stated. The papers were filled with libels that must be false. No man living could believe that a prince of that house which sat on the throne under the revolutionary settlement of 1688, should promulgate to the world, that happen what would, when he came to fill another station —

Mr. Plunkett rose to order, and Mr. Brigham sat down amidst tremendous cheering, which lasted for some minutes. Silence at length being restored,

Mr. Plunkett expressed his regret that he had not taken an earlier opportunity of calling the learned gent. to order; and putting a stop to the discussion into which he was now evidently about to enter. The reason why he had not risen in the first instance was, that the learned gent. stated, that in alluding to the proceedings in another place he could only do so historically; but when he found him adverting to what was stated in the course of that day in the public papers, and designating the person to whom he alluded by a description which could not be mistaken, he felt himself bound, for the preservation of the decency of the proceedings of the house—for the sake of the illustrious person alluded to—and besides, for the sake of that great cause in which, even now, he could not help thinking that the hon. and learned gent. was deeply interested—to prevent him going farther in the heat of the moment into a discussion which he was sure his deliberate judgment would hereafter condemn.

The Speaker said, if the inference drawn by the rt. hon. gent. who had last addressed them was correct—if his anticipation of what was coming from the learned member was right, there could be no question that the learned member would be out of order. It was impossible for him to define what was the order of the house more strictly than the learned member had done on taking up the subject which had occasioned the present interruption. It was his business to expect, after the learned member had so strictly defined the order of the house, that he would not depart from what he had laid down. On the whole, he must repeat, that if the anticipation of the right hon. gent. was correct, unquestionably the further proceeding in the course objected to, would be most disorderly.

Mr. Brigham doubted not that the rt. hon. gent. meant nothing but kindness to him, and also to the Catholic question. At the same time it seemed to him, that after what had fallen from the chair, he was entitled to say that the right hon. gent. had proceeded somewhat prematurely. He had interrupted him before the proper period had arrived. No member had a right to interrupt another because he himself expected that that other member was going to be disorderly. In the parliament to which the rt. hon. gent. formerly belonged, such a course might have been pursued (a laugh), but it was the privilege of a member of an English parliament to go on free from all interruption, until he said something disorderly (hear, hear). If he said any thing disorderly, he said it at his peril. He spoke for the privileges of the house; but he also spoke for the consistency, credit, and character of the house. Why, this was like the perjury question. Scarcely a debate took place in which some allusion was not made to, under the simy shelter of the phrase, "another place which it is not allowed me to name." The rt. hon. member, not long ago, alluded to the bishops directly. Was not this base-spirited conduct in the House of Commons? If the members of that house habitually adverted to proceedings in the House of Peers—if he himself had heard the words of the Lord Chancellor canvassed in it not twenty-four hours after the noble lord had uttered them—if the Lord Chancellor himself had afterwards, in the House of Lords, repeated the same words, and coupled that repetition with a reply to the observations which they had called up—if all this had been done, was it not an unworthy course which was now attempted to be taken? Was it not base for the House of Commons to say, "You may attack the bishops—the woolsack—the Lords, collectively or individually, if you will; but if you only glance at the heir presumptive of the Crown, privilege shall rise up against you, even before the words which are to constitute offence can be uttered, a rt. hon. member—himself the most disorderly—shall complain that you are out of order, infringing upon precedent and rule, and this, not because any thing irregular has been said, but—quia timet—merely because he apprehends—(great cheering).

Mr. Wodehouse rose again to order, and called upon the learned gent. to explain what he meant by the words, quia timet (excessive laughter and cheering).

Mr. Peel put it to the learned gent. himself, whether, apart from the question how far he was or was not entitled to allude indirectly to the subject to which he had referred, it was advisable, in a debate on an important question, to pursue a course of observations not relevant to it and likely to occasion a warmth of feeling incompatible with deliberate discussion.

Mr. Brougham could not disguise from himself that the fact to which he had alluded formed a most important feature in the question before the house. The cry had been, "Carry this bill—carry the disfranchisement of the forty-shilling freeholders—carry this measure, not upon its own merits, but because it will carry with it the question of Catholic Emancipation." This might have done well twenty-four hours ago—twenty-four hours back gentlemen might have expected to carry Catholic Emancipation with the help of the bill now under discussion; but what gentleman at the present moment would say that he had any hope of so carrying it (hear, hear)? The very last plea in favour of the bill before the house—the only plea that ever could have been urged for it—was gone. What pledge had he now, that even if he abandoned his duty as a senator, if he consented to legislate without investigation, to vote in the dark, where the rights and interests of thousands were concerned—what pledge had he, that he should ever receive any consideration, for thus voting without conviction, and betraying the important trust reposed in him (hear, hear)? Would not the ominous news of the day in which he was speaking, ring through all England, and all Ireland, as the knell of despair in the ears of the Catholics (hear, hear)? Ought not the knowledge of that news to operate in the house? He affirmed that it ought; and the conclusion which he drew from it was this—fair honest warning was given to the Catholics and to the country—they had reasonable and candid notice: want of conscientious and plain frankness in the avowal of an intention was the last charge that he meant to bring against any man (hear, hear); he would not go nearer than that (a laugh); but though this frankness was honest and conscientious, still the Catholics had not less a very avowed obstinacy to deal with; for no monarch who ever sat upon the English throne had ever been prepared for such resistance to his people as was now not only meditated, but openly avowed against them. He (Mr. B.), therefore, gave them this warning; he appealed to Ireland and to Irish members; he did not believe that any thing would carry the great question except a powerful house. Instead of a majority of twenty-seven members, to save the empire from convulsion, he believed nothing could save Ireland and England from new troubles, but a large increase of the majority (hear, hear). Now was the time—this reign was the time (loud cheering). Yet a little while, and it would be too late, the time would be gone, and gone for ever: "Yet a little slumbering—a little sleep—a little folding of the hands to sleep," as they had been doing session after session, and parliament after parliament, for the last twenty years, and they would find intolerance, and despotism come upon them like an armed man, and the opportunity of pacifying Ireland, and of saving England, would depart from their grasp for ever (loud cheers). If he were a lover of discord—(a laugh from some members on the ministerial benches: Mr. Brougham paused a few moments, and then continued): He was not a lover of discord, and those perhaps who considered him so were only not lovers of discord, because they preferred to what they call discord and commotion, the solitude which absolute, unthinking obedience paid to unmitigated despotism. He respected all men's consciences. God forbid that he should not give to their honest differences of opinion that toleration which he challenged for himself. He had said that a want of honesty and frankness was the last charge which he would bring against any man either within these walls or out of doors; but he had lived long enough to know that men who had most of that frankness, if they were not also enlightened men, were often the most perverse and pertinacious antagonists, and that all hope of reclaiming them from their errors, so help them God, was impossible (laughter and cheers). It became them, then, "to set their house in order betimes," and to recollect, that if they carried up the bill, on a former occasion, with a majority of nineteen, and it failed in the House of Peers, then there was ten thousand fold the necessity for taking this last opportunity of bringing the question to a conclusion, because an event might happen—God knew how soon or how late, but God forbid that it should be soon (loud cheers)—when they would have no longer the option. When, even if the bill should be carried—not by a majority of nineteen or twenty-seven, but by an unanimous vote of both houses of Parliament, and the voice of the whole country—even if the country streamed with blood, the measure could not be effected except by an inseparable breach with the Crown. Let the house then reject the adjunct, and so put aside that which was calculated only to lead to dissension among the friends of the measure, and to triumph among its enemies. Let them avail themselves, before it was too late, of the opportunity of carrying a measure which might restore Ireland to peace and prosperity, and save England from the perils of a convulsion (continued cheering.)

Sir J. Newport denied that there existed any foundation for the complaint against the manner in which the evidence had been taken before the committee. The witnesses had been candidly examined, with every opportunity afforded for their stating all that they knew upon the subject; and every one agreed as to the miserable condition in which the people who were misnamed freeholders were kept by the existing system. The measure now proposed did not touch the smallest existing right; and to appoint distinct committees to examine into every matter of detail would be endless. He trusted he should have credit for every disposition to carry the main question upon its own merits; but if he found it impossible to accomplish that, he was content to succeed by combining it with other objects.

Mr. Plunkett felt great pain in rising to oppose nearly every thing which had fallen from one of the oldest, and certainly most highly-gifted supporters of the Catholic cause. But he felt that the propriety of his having called that learned gent. to order was confirmed by all that he had uttered since; nor could he help fancying that the learned gent. had interpreted something too favourably for himself the delicacy which had prevented any direct charge of irregularity from being conveyed in what had fallen from the chair. He was fully aware that though it was not strictly regular to allude to what passed in the other house of Parliament, it would be absurd to watch over particular instances of deviation from strict regularity, provided they remained within reasonable and proper limits. But he would call to the recollection of any body who heard his learned friend, whether this was not an occasion on which mischief was about to be done, and on which he was warranted in an interference, which, on another occasion, might have appeared punctilious and pedantic. He did not pretend to be blind to the events of the times, and in one feeling he agreed with the learned member—that there never had been a period when it so fully behoved every honest man in Parliament, and in the nation, to think steadily upon the means of passing the measure of Catholic Emancipation, and of passing it without the delay of a single hour (hear, hear). But he must say to the learned member, that, in his view, the line which he was taking seemed calculated to defeat that object. The learned member had truly said, that if ever there were a period when private feeling ought to be banished, and when unanimity was most desirable, it was the present; but he would confidently appeal to every gentleman who had heard the learned member's speech, whether it had not been peculiarly calculated to prevent that very union which he was so desirous of effecting. He was somewhat surprised when the member for Louth (Mr. Foster) came forward with arguments, which he thought proper to urge in direct contradiction to his own evidence, under the solemn obligation of an oath. He could not, of course, be supposed to throw the slightest imputation on the hon. member, nor even insinuate that that additional sanction would be more binding on him than his own sense of honour; but it certainly did sound strange to hear his hon. friend put forward arguments completely in the teeth of every thing he had recommended to the committee of the House of Commons (cheers).

The hon. member's complaint against the measure was, that it did not go far enough, but that it should be extended to the disqualification of all bolders in fee; but did the hon. member mean that we should carry our principle to the length of disfranchising a body of men like the yeomanry of England (hear, hear)? And what was the ground upon which the hon. member supported his opinion? Why, forsooth, that certain vagrants had settled in certain commons in Ireland; who, by acts of rapine and disseisin, had obtained a title to certain lands. If this were so distressing an event to the hon. member, let him bring in a bill to disfranchise them. He admitted there was a great existing evil, which this measure, as far as it went, was well adapted to remedy; but because a parcel of travelling tinkers had migrated to the bogs of Drumskele, in the county of Louth (loud laughter), he turned round upon us and said, that, unless we so changed our measure, as to render it impossible for any rational man to adopt it, he would resist it with all his might (hear, hear). But, if the speech of the hon. member surprised him, the house might judge of his consternation when he heard his learned friend (Mr. Brougham) adopt the argument; nay, more, misrepresent it, and carry it to a length which the hon. author himself never contemplated (hear, hear). Of course he did not mean for one moment to assert that his learned friend would be capable of wilfully misrepresenting any thing, either here or elsewhere; but, such was the wonderful power of his talent and eloquence, that, whatever argument he adopted, received a force and extent of which its originator was wholly unconscious (a laugh); and when his learned friend felt himself in that cruel and grievous situation which he had so feelingly depicted—impelled by a sense of duty to do that which might be detrimental to a measure to which he was attached; he (Mr. P.) lamented most heartily, that instead of applying all those powers of ridicule in which he was unrivalled, to demolish the argument of the hon. member for Louth, he should have exercised his transcendent abilities to embellish and improve it (hear, hear). That the learned gent. was an ardent friend to Catholic concession, did not rest upon mere assertion, he had given proofs of it too strong for any man to doubt his sincerity (loud cheers). The extent of his services could not be over-rated (continued cheers); but his extreme rapidity of conception and wonderful facility of utterance, had, by unremitting exercise, become a weakness, which had led him into statements, which, in the sober reflection of his cooler moments, his own excellent judgment would disavow (hear, hear). He would appeal to the whole house, whether the learned gent., in his zeal to defeat the measure in discusdom—a measure of which he set out by stating his entire ignorance—had not drawn upon every topic to awaken prejudices which might defeat the measure they all had at heart. His learned friend said, the object of the measure was to put down perjury, and what right had we to interfere in such a question, when every man in the house perjured himself? And then, in one of his flights, he took a range amongst the army, clergy, and Parliament; but what had all this to do with the question? Even admitting that the qualification for sitting in that house did lead to perjury, and supposing the army and church not exempt from the stain, were they in no instance to cure the evil when they had it in their power? His learned friend had all through his speech assumed as facts what he was bound to prove. He had nicknamed the measure a disfranchisement, and had urged that it would excite the resentment of the Catholics, when he forgot that it did not disfranchise a single individual; did not take away a right possessed by any man in existence. What was there in it, therefore, to justify resentment on the part of the Irish people, or to warrant that very glowing appeal which the learned gent., in his desire for tranquillization, had made to them? Again, the learned member said in setting out, “I do not know what this measure is. My feeling is kind towards it. I do not mean to offer it any opposition:”—Whereas, every thing that the hon. member had done bore as much the aspect of opposition to the measure, and evinced as little of kind feeling towards it, as any course of conduct easily could do. He seemed to apprehend that the Catholics of Ireland would be more alive to constitutional jealousies than to their own immediate interests: and one thing particularly the learned gent. could not endure: let the measure be never so good, he could not bear the connecting it with any other measure; and on no account would he couple it with Catholic Emancipation, because it seemed like giving a consideration for the latter—like a species of bribery: but was not this an overstrained delicacy? Was it not being a knight-errant for the honour of argument and logic? And would not the refusal, on such an objection, to arrive at unanimity, where unanimity was wanted, tell better in a novel, to be called for instance, “The Delicate Embarrassment,” than in the business of political life? He thought the measure absolutely a good one; but it was not upon that view alone that he voted for it; for even if he had considered it up to a certain degree injurious, so that it was not cruel or unjust, he should have been contented to support it for the sake of the measure which was to go along with it. The house would judge between him and the learned member: but there was a point upon which he went a step further in opposition to the learned gent. The learned member complained that the measure for disfranchising the freeholders was coupled with the concession of Catholic Emancipation—a measure with which it had no natural connexion. As it seemed to him (Mr. P.) they had an obvious connexion. The doors of Parliament were to be open to Roman Catholics, and it was demanded, in return, that the rush of an immense Roman Catholic mob should be provided against. Certainly, he would not vote for the measure before the house, standing alone, because alone it was not wanted, and until the Catholics were in fair possession of their rights, he would never consent that the slightest portion of their strength, of whatever description, should be taken from them. The learned gent. thought differently on this point. He complained of being placed in a cruel situation. Certainly, he (Mr. P.) might say that he had never seen any gentleman seem more at ease under cruel circumstances; more able to throw himself pleasantly out of the real question, or draw into it all sorts of entertaining things which were quite foreign to its nature. He would now come to the measure itself. Since the act of 1793—that preposterous act which had begun at the wrong end, and let the rabble into the elective franchise, while it excluded and shut out the gentry—ever since the passing of that act, the country gentlemen of Ireland had deliberately set about trying how many freeholders they could make, for the express purpose of trafficking with them. The valuable property was not the freehold, but the freeholder; the latter was so entirely a man of straw, that if a prosecution for perjury happened to be instituted against him, the freeholder disappeared altogether. In fact, it was the landlord's will and desire, not the man's own, that he should have the power of voting. After having the miserable forty-shilling leasehold made over to him which was not worth forty pence, the wretched being was actually compelled to swear to his freehold at the command of his master, even although any moral or religious scruples of his own might disincline him from doing so. Let the house look at the way in which the elective franchise was exercised in a variety of instances in Ireland by the forty-shilling freeholders. The landlord who had a vast number of them on his estate, when an election approached, sent his agent amongst them. He would not condescend to go himself to solicit their suffrages, but sent his agent to bring, as a matter of course, his four or five hundred into the market. This was done in ordinary cases; but if there should happen to be a contest for the county, then a competition might arise—and it was no improbable circumstance—between the Catholic priest and the Protestant landlord; not as to which should more contribute to the comforts, or improve the consideration of the peasant in a moral or political sense, but as to which should make the most of him. On one side was the landlord, threatening to exert all his power against the poor freeholder if he did not obey; and on the other was the priest, using the powerful influence of religion to induce him to vote for that party by which he thought his own interest would be more promoted. What was the consequence? The peasant voted according to what he was told would be most favourable to his religion; and when the heat of the contest was over, he returned to an incensed landlord, whose first step was to distrain him for the half-year's arrear of rent, and thus not unfrequently to cause his utter ruin—a ruin, too, which was the more dangerous in its effects, because the man was taught to believe that he was punished for what he did for the sake of his religion. Was it at all unnatural that such a system should generate that heat and political animosity between landlord and tenant, which ended in a spirit of discontent and insubordination on the part of the latter? Let the contest end as it might, the forty-shilling freeholder was in no sense a gainer. Vote how he might, his condition was not improved; but if he voted against his landlord, it was sure to be rendered worse. This statement was borne out by the most incontrovertible evidence before the committee. What, then, would be the injury to the freeholder by depriving him of that franchise which he held only for the purpose of voting according to the command of others? Looking at the proportion of 40s. voters, and those of a higher class, he found that the former were as eighteen or twenty to one of the 20l. and 50l. voters. It was thus that the really independent voters were overlaid by a host of voters who had no stake in the country, and who, in general, only represented the opinions of the landlord on whose property they were allowed to obtain a miserable subsistence. But it was to the abolition of a franchise so abused, that the hon. member for Corke Castle (Mr. Banks) had objected. Fired with a constitutional zeal for the privileges of the people (cheers and laughter),—he attributed to the hon. member that zeal in the sense in which it was understood in the house, and no other—(hear, hear), it was against this system the hon. member stood opposed, and in his Ruymode feelings would rather expire on the floor than consent to such a violation of a constitutional principle (hear, hear). He admired the spirit of the ancient barons, thus exemplified in the person of the hon. member; but he did hope to reconcile him to this measure when he informed him that it was not intended to abrogate the rights of a class of men such as generally possessed the elective franchise in this country. There might, he admitted, be some places in England where votes were created in the same manner and for the same purposes as those to which he had been alluding. He was not acquainted with the nature of the towns here, but he was addressing himself to the member for Corke Castle (cheers and laughter), who perhaps knew of places where votes were so created (hear, hear). He did hope to reconcile the hon. member to this measure, when he informed him that it was not intended by it to destroy vested interests. It would operate gradually, and in the course of time a body of sturdy and independent yeomanry would supply the places of those in whose persons the elective franchise was now so much abused. It was the fair inference from the evidence before the committees of both houses, that the measure would give general satisfaction in Ireland. And this appeared even in the testimony of Mr. O'Connell, who approved of the bill if connected with the measure of Emancipation. The member for Waterford had also expressed himself its advocate; and if his learned friend (Mr. Brougham) had consulted the members for Ireland around him, to whose opinions in other respects he was accustomed to listen with attention; if he had for a moment laid asleep his imagination, dispensed with his rhetoric, and trusted to his own mature judgment, he would have drawn a different conclusion from that which he stated to the house. The learned gent. was in ignorance of the subject. He must have known the opinions of those by whom he was surrounded, and that these opinions were favourable to this bill, and yet he had asked where was the bold man who would predict that this measure would give general satisfaction in Ireland. He met the interrogatory of his learned friend; and though he did not profess himself as the

votary of that extreme political courage, which was often more an indication of rashness than firmness, yet, with his conviction of the propriety of the measure—with his knowledge of the general impressions that existed in Ireland as to its necessity, he was that bold man (continued cheers). Coupled with the substantial measure of relief, it would not only conciliate the Catholics, but give increased security to the Protestants of Ireland. And here he complained of his learned friend that in the whole of his excurative speech, he had altogether thrown out of his view what that security demanded. To obtain the great measure of relief to the Roman Catholics of Ireland, has been the object of his (Mr. P.'s) greatest anxiety. He felt that a day should not be lost before the house carried its vote into effect (hear, hear). But strongly as he felt its necessity, he was still persuaded, that if it were carried into effect, leaving an existing distrust in the minds of the Protestants of Ireland, it would be a curse instead of a blessing (hear, hear). Let it be recollected, that in the progress of this great cause, every foot of it had been reclaimed ground (hear, hear). It had made its way gradually—by the triumph of enlightened views and irresistible argument. But since it was first introduced to the consideration of the Legislature, there never was a moment when the result of such continued exertions was more likely to be frustrated—when the cup was more likely to be dashed from the lip on the brink of enjoyment, than at the moment he addressed them—by any indiscretion on the part of any hon. member. No man who felt for the prosperity of Ireland, and the security of the empire, could forget the important benefits which, in the exercise of his powerful talents, his learned friend had given to those great objects. But it was impossible not to see, with regret, that he was labouring this night under an effort which was calculated, though not intended, to defeat the great object for which he had heretofore so powerfully struggled, and by so doing to dash the blessing from Ireland the very moment that she anticipated its fulfilment (hear, hear). There were many other topics connected with this great question, which pressed themselves on his consideration, but he felt that neither his own strength, nor his feelings of respect to the attention with which he had been honoured, would permit him to intrude. He left, therefore, this question on its own importance, to the enlightened decision of the house (loud cheering).

Mr. Banks said it was true that he had opposed the present measure, though it was then in a different shape from that in which it now appeared; and notwithstanding the alteration, he still opposed it, because he considered it a harsh, unnecessary, and unconstitutional infringement of the privileges of the people. He concluded by moving as an amendment that the bill be read a second time that day six months.

Mr. Peel said, that after the excitement raised by what had fallen from the learned gent. opposite, and his learned friend, he regretted he could not hope to attract the attention of the house, as he intended to confine himself to the merits of the bill before them, without reference to any other question. He was ready to admit that there did exist great abuses in the present mode of exercising the elective franchise in Ireland—in the mode of creating scitless freeholds, and swearing to freeholds which did not exist; and he was prepared to consider any measure for the purpose of applying a remedy to the evil. But, he doubted whether the measure proposed would have any such effect, or rather he was convinced, that as a remedy, it would be most injudiciously and unjustly applied. He concurred in what had been said by the learned gent. (Mr. Brougham), that it would be most precipitate to make such a change without having full information on so important a subject. He did not mean to assert, that if inquiry were gone into, and it could be proved the passing of this bill would strengthen the Protestant interest in Ireland, he would still continue opposed to it; but under any circumstances he should have great hesitation in supporting a measure which would alter the elective franchise. On this principle he had opposed all the motions for reform which had been submitted in that house. He had opposed the bill for altering the present system of the elective franchise in Scotland, or increasing the number of voters; and he had now great doubts of the justice or expediency of any measure for diminishing the number of voters in Ireland. He had before him an account of the number of 40s. 20l. and 30l. freeholders registered in Ireland within the last eight years. It appeared, that since the year 1818 the number of 40s. freeholds registered in the county of Tyrone was 13,000, and the number of freeholds of 20l. and upwards, within the same time, was only 273. He thought it a hard thing, that this immense number should be deprived of the elective franchise without any investigation. His hon. friend (Mr. Littleton) had said that he would not raise the qualification from 40s. to 5l. because it would increase the evil. Was not that in itself an argument for inquiry? It was contended that the object of the bill was to assimilate the practice in Ireland to that in England. The bill could do no such thing. It went only to oblige the freeholder to swear to 10l. instead of 40s.; but if so much abuse already existed by persons swearing to 40s. freeholds which they did not possess, what security did this bill afford against parties swearing to a higher amount? What guarantee did it afford against perjury in the one case more than in the other? It was said that the voter would be obliged to take the oath mentioned in the schedule of the bill; but on looking at the schedule, he found not a word was said about any such oath. But had the oath been framed it would not alter the case. He would now examine how far the measure would affect the Protestant interest in Ireland. Mr. O'Connell stated in his evidence, that this bill would have the effect of lessening the power of the aristocracy, and of increasing the influence of the Roman Catholics. Did this show that the Protestant interest would be benefited by it? In looking at the returns to which he had before alluded, he found that the greatest number of 40s. freeholds, the extent of which had been ascribed as cause of the great discontent and disturbances, was in the north. In Kilkenny there were registered, since 1793, 3760 40s. freeholds, and they sent two members to Parliament, who supported the Catholic question. In the county Fermanagh, he found the number of 40s. freeholds registered in the same period to be 26,900, and that county sent two members to Parliament who invariably voted against the Catholics. When he compared those facts, he must have something stronger than the arguments, he had that night heard, to make him believe that the 40s. freeholders were a cause of distress or disturbance, or that the disfranchising them would be an advantage to the Protestant interest. If these freeholders were for the greater part Catholics, it would only show that they acted under the influence of property—an influence which had its weight in this country as well as in Ireland. But if they were Protestants, the house ought to pause and inquire, before they disfranchised them. In the county of Waterford, in which existed, for a time, the greatest distress and dissatisfaction, the number of 40s. freeholders registered since 1793, was 7000. In the county of Antrim, which consisted for the greater part of Protestants, the number registered in the same time was 29,500. If these were Catholics, and consented to return members opposing the Catholic question, there could be no danger to the Protestant Establishment in allowing them to retain the elective franchise; but if they were Protestants, what boon was held out to them for the privilege of which they were thus deprived (cheers)? It was said that this bill, concurrently with the Catholic Relief bill, would raise the Catholic from the state of degradation in which he was now placed. Admitting that argument for what it was worth, it might be an answer to the Catholic for the loss of his franchise; but what answer would it be to the Protestant for the sacrifice of his constitutional privilege, which he had never abused? In the eight counties of Ulster, the most flourishing part of Ireland, he was informed, that the number of 40s. freeholds registered within the last eight years was 190,000 while in 14 counties in the south of Ireland, where so much distress and disturbance had existed, the number did not exceed 168,000. Were not these grave subjects for consideration, before the house proceeded any farther with a measure which was to disfranchise so extensive a portion of the people of Ireland? He would now beg the house to consider what the effects of this measure would be. Was it desirable to hold out a bonus to the multiplication of 10l. freeholds? Would it give Ireland such a yeomanry as its friends would wish to see established in it? It appeared to him that the abolition of the 40s. cottiers would not produce any beneficial political effect, and that the multiplication of 10l. freeholders would only increase the number of miserable farmers. When they were introducing a great political innovation, they ought not to argue from the state of things existing at present, but from the state of things which would exist when the change had taken place. Would not the same ill effects be produced by the fee-simple tenure as by the 40s. tenure? Was there anything in the present bill to prevent a man from erecting a number of houses, and from conveying them in fee-simple to the freeholders? Was there any thing to prevent him from saying to them, "I will give you a house on a certain tenure, but I will attach to it a quantity of land or of bog, which you shall hold on an uncertain tenure, so that whenever an election comes, I may have a hold upon you for your vote?" This bill was not calculated to strengthen the Protestant interest, to assimilate the freehold tenures in Ireland to the freehold tenures in England, or to remedy any of the evils which Mr. O'Connell had described as arising out of the present system of 40s. freeholds. The bill, it ought to be recollected, was contingent upon the great bill which was to emancipate the Catholics. It was only to take effect under the new circumstances which were to arise in consequence of the passing of that bill, when there was to be an oblivion of all discords in Ireland, and when all classes of his Majesty's subjects were to be united together in peace and amity. If such a result should arise from that measure, the necessity of disfranchising the 40s. freeholders would be gone for ever; and if it should not, this bill would be no security for the Protestant interest, inasmuch as its effects would not be immediate, but prospective. He was unwilling to deprive the lower classes of Ireland of a privilege which, when it was first granted to them, Mr. Burke described as of inestimable value; and above all, he was reluctant to begin his career as a Parliamentary reformer by disfranchising, almost without examination, a portion of the electors of that kingdom. Under these circumstances, he should oppose the bill, being convinced that members were not at present in possession of information which would justify them in giving it their support.

Sir H. Parnell was convinced that no further inquiry was necessary, as there was sufficient evidence before the house to establish the existence of the evil which this bill was intended to cure. There had been several public meetings in that country since notice of it had been given, and at none of them had a single hand been held up against the measure.

Mr. Brownlow had never met with any person who objected to this bill out of doors, who was not actuated by private motives rather than by the public good. He would give the house a case in point to show how the system worked. A gentleman, of large landed property in Ireland, and a man possessed of every virtue save that of residing on his estates in that country, was called upon by the Government to discharge the duty of High Sheriff, in the county in which his property was situated. He endeavoured to get rid of the duty imposed upon him, but not finding it possible, said, "By God, if I am obliged to go to Ireland by the Government, I will make myself an M. P. to vex them." The consequence was, that he took with him to Ireland 2,600 leases, and when he got there, parcelled out his estate into 2,600 subdivisions, so minute, that to live upon one of them would be complete beggary. He now said, "I will walk into Parliament without asking the vote of a single man in the independent county in which I have the honour to reside." The cause of evils like this was the low qualification for the elective franchise—the remedy would be the raising the qualification, and the consequent increase of the independence of the voter. The house would feel no regret at the abandonment of the present system in Ireland, if they could once behold a procession of these wretched 40s. freeholders, as they had been described by those who knew them best, driven on and drilled by a task-master to pronounce the name of their master's nominee, occupying on their route the stalls of kindred cattle dislodged for their accommodation. Were this degrading and odious system once seen generally, its incompatibility with the freedom of election would be so notorious that every voice would be raised against it.

Mr. C. H. Hutchinson could not consent to make such a change in the elective franchise for Ireland as would impose a sweeping disfranchisement of this nature, upon a mere vote, without the ceremony at least of a previous inquiry. If the precedent were set in Ireland, where was it to stop? Did the people of England apprehend nothing from the result? (Here the hon. member was interrupted with loud symptoms of impatience). He insisted upon his right to be heard, or else he would say that that was a disgraced assembly (loud cries of order). He would not be silenced by clamour; and repeated, that the interruption would not affect him, although it would disgrace those who resorted to such a mode of stifling argument. What, after all, did this bill call for? A remedy which the gentry of Ireland had already in their hands—namely, to abandon the practice of corruption among their tenants, to correct their own disgraceful conduct in creating these 40s. nominal freeholders, and then there would be no ground for such a measure as this (hear, hear). Let that portion of the gentry of Ireland who spread corruption among the people begin by reforming themselves, and then they need not appear before Parliament with such a bill as this, which admitted their own disgrace while it proscribed the most humble part of their own dependents. They first made the poor man their tool, and then they called upon Parliament to make him their victim (hear, hear). But after all, was there more corruption in the elective franchise in Ireland than in England? On behalf of the poor Irish he denied that there was.

Mr. Goulburn said that this bill merely gave a remote security against an immediate danger (hear, hear). He begged not to be considered as generally approving of the system of the 40s. freeholders in Ireland, or as considering that it ought not to be remedied; but they should first consider the extent of the evil, and then the efficacy of the remedy. As to the cause of the evil, there had been a discrepancy of opinion in the committee up stairs, and Gen. Burke had, in his examination, distinctly denied that the 40s. freeholders were the cause of it. The same evidence also showed the importance attached by the freeholders to their elective franchise, as qualifying them to make "a Parliament man." He therefore entreated the house not to interfere with that sense of popular power, without a previous inquiry, the necessity of which was apparent from the conflicting opinions given by several of the hon. members who had preceded him in the debate.

Lord Milnes was as ready as any body to deprecate a good deal of the system of 40s. freeholds in Ireland. It was one of the misfortunes of that unhappy country, that her property was cast into great masses, which were in the hands of a peculiar oligarchy. This bill was a blow aimed at that oligarchy, which, though he confessed himself a part of it, he was anxious to see reduced. But he was by no means certain that the class which followed in the train of that oligarchy, and who were made the instruments of its power, would approve of such a measure as this. At the same time he was anxious to try the great problem of raising an order of yeomanry in Ireland and so far to lend his aid to this bill—coupled, however, with the distinct understanding that it was to be the price of the Catholic claims, and to stand or fall with the Catholic relief bill. Upon these distinct conditions, he should support the bill in its present stage.

Mr. Grattan could not support a measure which went to disfranchise the people of 32 counties, on account of corrupt practices in a few of them. If it were just to convert the 40s. qualifications into 10l. qualifications, it might by and by be considered just to convert the 10l. into 20l., and so on till all the counties of Ireland were brought into the condition of close boroughs. Let the gentry of Ireland begin the work of reform among themselves, and not introduce this monstrous precedent of popular disqualification.

Sir Francis Burdett: With respect to the measure more immediately before the house, some of his hon. friends near him had opposed it, as being the friends of reform, but he was at a loss to see the connexion between the one question and the other. Sufficient for him was it on this occasion to show, that there was here a conjunction of circumstances in the affairs of Ireland, which were never likely to occur any where else, and which called for the submission to a certain sacrifice to secure the possession of an invaluable boon. The Protestants of Ireland were now generally ready, with a liberality of feeling which did them honour, to amalgamate with their Catholic fellow-countrymen, and to concede much of the prejudices in which they had been so long nursed up. He would not speak of the present as a measure for meeting all the grievances attendant on the exercise of the elective franchise in Ireland; but those who had a lower opinion of it ought to consent to go into a committee. It appeared to him that it was taking up a heavy responsibility, for him or any other member to go against the declared sense of gentlemen who had honourably consented to waive their own interests in favour of a common measure for the common benefit of Ireland. Such public conduct, however fair in speculation, could not be tolerated by any practicable men who preferred real advantages for their country to the support of abstract theories of the constitution. It was asked what was to be got by this measure? He would answer, not as a Catholic advocate, because his intentions reached to both parties—to the general interests of Ireland, distinct from any party—though if he could see any thing incompatible in the interests of Protestants and Catholics, he must, from feelings of natural alliance, side with the former; but seeing an opportunity for combining and uniting them, which was the first of its kind in the history of Ireland, he was ready to embrace the happy moment when prejudices were softened, and when dangers had disappeared; under these circumstances, he could not feel satisfied in rejecting the opportunity of relieving 6,000,000 of people from a state of oppression, in which they were justly dissatisfied; nor could he honestly persist in acting with gentlemen who were prepared to waive the opportunity of bringing about such great practical benefits, because of uncertain and vague conceptions of political excellence which they entertained with regard to other measures (cheers). Suppose all objections urged in detail to be sound, still they ought to try if they could not be reconciled in the committee. The importance attached to the question of elective franchise must be fallacious if the comparison which had been made by the gentlemen of Ireland, between the 40s. freeholder and the West Indian negro to the advantage of the latter, were in any way correct. He did not take upon himself to say that it was. But those freeholds had been continually represented as one of the greatest evils of the country. Be that as it might, they had obtained a boon if they could exchange them for general emancipation, which would settle the country in peace. He rejoiced in the conciliatory effects which had been produced between the people of the two religions by the examinations before the committee, and concluded by an earnest entreaty to all friends of Emancipation, to forget their differences upon the question before the house, for the sake of succeeding in that object.

Mr. Denman wished to justify his adherence to those principles which, with pain and surprise he had witnessed it, the hon. bart. now disowned, though they had for many years supported them together. He could not be persuaded to look upon this in the light of a trifling sacrifice to obtain a more valuable blessing. It appeared to him that the inference attempted to be drawn was, that if the Catholic disabilities could be removed, it mattered not under what system Ireland should be governed. He would make no such concession. The question did not belong to Catholic more than Protestant, nor to Ireland more than to England. It belonged to them all, and they ought to view it with equal alarm. He was not to be told that they could form no precedent for invading the franchise of England, because he knew on what slight pretences things of this sort were raised into precedents. Why did not this subject commence with a discussion in a committee? He rejected the idea of this and the Emancipation bill being measures inseparably united. He complained of the insufficiency of the returns to show how many votes there would be left, and how many disfranchised under any one of the three rates proposed for the standard of qualification—five pounds, ten pounds, or twenty pounds. They were all in turn opposed with equal vehemence by those who supported any one of them. There was nothing clearly made out to satisfy him. The standard of forty shillings might be bad, but the evidence did not establish what was good. His learned friend, Mr. Blake, preferred twenty pounds. On being asked his reasons, he said that he understood that property was the constitutional basis of representation, and therefore the more it was condensed the better, and the fewer the numbers the more constitutional. In what book or in what authority was this found? He had always understood the constitutional basis to be the payment of direct taxes to the state. Had the bill stood by itself, would any man have been able to give the house a reason why it should pass? As to the idea of effecting a bargain of emancipation by it, to whom was the benefit of the contract to accrue? It was no bargain as between Protestant and Catholic; it was no bargain as between high and low Catholics. It had been supported by aggregate and county Catholic meetings; but there was no statement of the number of forty shilling freeholders who voted for the destruction, if they voted at all, of their own rights and liberties. He denounced the measure as one of those expedients devised by enemies to thwart the general question. It was of a piece with the veto, with the question of long oaths, and other means of cajolery. What did the veto do in 1809, besides securing the Chancellorship of Oxford for Lord Grenville? If he could admit the danger threatened, he could not admit the safety of the measures proposed. They were any thing but securities. And was this a time to yield them, when the fortress of bigotry was stormed, and the picked men of the garrison were ready to surrender? The scales and slims had confessedly fallen from the eyes of many adversaries of Emancipation. Could less have happened, supposing those gentlemen to be sincere, if this bill had never been heard of?

Mr. Abercrombie expressed his firm conviction that in supporting this measure, he was stripping an oligarchy of a power that they ought not to possess. He should vote for it under the impression that by so doing, he should deprive various classes of the Irish gentry of the means of jobbing—a system which was most disgraceful to them, and most ruinous to the country. It was a system that must ruin the independence of general elections, and therefore he should support the measure. But above all he would support it, because if that system continued, it would ultimately exclude altogether persons of the middling classes of society from all share in elections. He appealed to all those who were best acquainted with Ireland and Irish affairs, whether the forty shilling freeholder was not the raw material out of which the Irish gentleman manufactured all his jobs. They who had not been in the southern parts of Ireland could have no conception of the miserable dependence in which these forty shilling freeholders existed, on the estates of their landlords. Their whole existence, indeed, was attached to the wretched acre which they held; and it might easily be supposed that they were the mere tools of the owner of the land. Should this bill pass, it was his conviction that it would be the greatest boon to Ireland which the United Parliament could confer upon her (hear, hear).

Mr. Lambton did not believe that the forty shilling freeholders were really that description of persons they had been represented to be. He believed them to be much better than they were made out; and though by this bill they themselves were not to be disfranchised, yet their children would be; and following that principle which had ever guided his public conduct, he never would consent to any measure having for its object a limitation of the elective franchise of the people (cheers). He had no confidence in the quarter from which this measure came. He was not alluding to his hon. friend, the member for Staffordshire, but he distrusted the parties who, he feared, might have influenced, and who now most strongly supported the measure.

Mr. Littleton was only anxious to declare that his hon. friend was quite mistaken in supposing that he had acted in this matter otherwise than as a volunteer; no individual having advised with him on the subject, or influenced him in determining to introduce this measure, although he had availed himself of the best information he could obtain in its preparation.

Catholic Clergy.

FRIDAY, APRIL 29.—Lord F. Leveson Gower rose for the purpose of moving a resolution, that it was expedient to make a provision for the maintenance of the secular Catholic clergy of Ireland. The measure which he was about to propose appeared to him to be inseparably connected with the welfare and good government of Ireland. It had been advocated by men whose authority still possessed the weight it deserved, although their exertions were now lost to their country for ever. The names of Pitt, of Castlereagh, and of Cornwallis were found among the first of those who had recommended a provision for the Roman Catholic clergy. He had great pleasure in finding that the opinions which he entertained on this subject were backed by a learned gentleman (Mr. L. Foster), whose laborious research into all matters connected with the affairs of Ireland was every where duly appreciated, and by Mr. Grattan in the debate of 1812. The objects which he proposed to obtain by these resolutions, were to connect the whole body of the secular Catholic clergy with the state, to effect an improvement in the condition of the Catholic peasantry, and to provide for the security of the Protestant church (hear). It was not his intention to propose any increase in the body of parochial clergy; and in point of emolument he should leave them nearly as they were. When the sources from which the income of the clergy was derived were considered, he was sure that it could not be doubted that it would be highly expedient to substitute a fixed and periodical stipend for those uncertain sources. It might be objected that one effect of this would be to cut off the connexion of the clergy with their flocks. In order to meet this objection, he would remind the house, that in the evidence of a distinguished prelate of that body, it was stated that one fourth of the incomes of the priests was derived from the offerings of their parishioners on certain solemn festivals in the church. These it was his intention still to leave untouched, that a lively remembrance might be kept up in the minds of the parishioners of the spiritual services of their pastors, and that they might upon such solemn occasions testify by their contributions to his support in this world, the sense they entertained of the value of the priest, who pointed out to them the road to salvation in the next. The evidence of Mr. O'Connell showed that the ranks of the clergy were filled from the lower orders of the people. He would not insult, by the expression of any aristocratical feeling, so meritorious a body, because such a disposition must be contrary to the first principles of Christianity, but it must surely be a matter of reasonable regret that any circumstances should occur to prevent a portion of the higher classes of the community from forming a part of the Catholic clergy. The necessity of a competent provision was also strikingly enforced by another consideration. Was it fit that in times of danger and popular tumult, the clergy should be so entirely dependent upon the people, that any attempt to discharge their duty to the Government must be followed by the loss of their means of subsistence? When the storm was up and the vessel was a wreck, should they be lashed to its shattered remnants and exposed to all the fury of the tempest? If it were supposed that in the plan which he proposed, he had any intention to undermine the faith of the Catholic clergy, he utterly denied and disavowed it (hear, hear). Much as he wished that no difference existed between the faith of the church of England and the Catholics, he would take no such means to unite them. He would appeal from theory to practice; the Presbyterian clergy in the north of Ireland, than whom there was not a more respectable body, were stipendiary, but upon them no undue influence had ever been exerted by the Government. If the cry of economy should be raised—a cry so successful in exciting the passions of a commercial country like this, but which was often disgraceful to the individual, and a curse to the nation—he trusted the house would not echo it, that the nation would not keep it up, and that the charm would lose its power, let the magician be who he might (cheers). He found that the number of Catholic priests in Ireland was about 1,000, and that of the coadjutors or curates nearly the same, making the whole estimate of parish priests about 2,000. He proposed to divide these into three classes, in the same way that the Presbyterian clergy were divided, and to allot to 900 of them an annual stipend of 200*l.* each; to 800, a stipend of 120*l.*; and to 1,000, one of 40*l.* To the four archbishops, 1500*l.* per annum; to 23 bishops, 1,000*l.*; and to 300 deans, 300*l.* each. The noble lord concluded by moving, "That it is the opinion of this house that a provision should be by law established for the maintenance of the secular Roman Catholic clergy, exercising their functions in Ireland."

Col. Bagwell seconded the motion. He professed the most profound respect and the warmest veneration for the Reformed Church of England; but, Protestant as he was, he could not forget that to the Church of Rome we were indebted for the transmission of the Holy Scriptures and the elements of true religion, through ages of ignorance and darkness.

Mr. L. Foster objected to the measure proposed by the noble lord, on the ground that it would increase the power of the Catholic church without making it more dependent on the Government than at present. It was the principle of the Catholic church to increase its influence, and to put down all competition. It was said that when Catholics should be admitted to Parliament they would lose their distinctive character. He did not believe that. He was of opinion that it would always be their object to advance the power of the Catholic church. On this point he might direct the attention of the house to the conduct of those members who represented the West India interests. On subjects in which their interests were not involved, they could not be recognized as a body of men possessing a community of feeling; but the moment any question arose which affected their West India interests or prejudices—let it relate to the coffee of Egypt, the sugar of Bengal, the cotton of Macao, or the brandy of France—they formed a compact phalanx, and acted as one man. He would never consent to a stipend being paid by Government to the Catholic priests, unless it were to the exact amount of that which they now received from the peasantry, but which they should then be called upon to abandon.

Mr. Hume thought that this measure was in no way connected with the question of Catholic Emancipation; and the evidence was conflicting as to the probability of its conciliating the Catholics. He could not consent to the payment of the Catholic priests unless the English Dissenting ministers should also receive payment. The noble lord had given no information as to the manner in which his measure was to be carried into effect. It did not appear whether an annual sum was to be voted, or whether a large grant was to be made at once; nor was it stated from what fund the money was to come, nor who was to have the distribution of it (coughing). Without information on these points, he could not consent to such an innovation as that proposed. The Protestant Dissenters in Ireland amounted to between 7 and 800,000, and their ministers to between 3 and 400. The whole provision which Parliament made for them was 13,844*l.* When this was the manner in which the Dissenting ministers were treated, it was too much to call upon Parliament to give so large a sum as 280,000*l.* for the Catholic church. The hon. member concluded his speech by moving the following amendment—"That a select committee be appointed to inquire, whether the Catholic Priesthood, and all Dissenting Ministers from the established Church of England and Ireland, and the Catholic Priesthood and Dissenting Ministers from the established Church in Scotland, should be paid annual stipends; and to consider and report to this house what sums, if any, should be paid to each set, and from what funds and under what particular stipulations the said payments should be made."

Mr. W. Banks thought that money must absolutely be burning in gentlemen's pockets, that they were so ready to grant 250,000*l.* a year to people who rather desired not to receive it. And in what a situation did such a boon to the Catholics place all other Dissenters from the Established Church! The Protestants of the kingdom would be paying two classes of clergy—to wit, the Catholic and the established; but the Dissenter would have to pay three sets—the Established, the Catholic, and his own. He should look upon the success of the present measure as an incident after which the established Church of England could hope to exist no longer.

Mr. T. P. Courtenay, though a friend to Catholic Emancipation, objected to the present measure, as tending to undermine the Established Church. It was his humble opinion, which he had been some years in forming and other years in determining to act upon (laugh); which he offered to the house with great deference, but still with the confidence of sincere conviction, that the time was come when we ought to alter our own articles (hear). If hon. gentlemen would take the trouble to read over the Thirty-nine Articles—(loud laughter, and cries of hear!)—He regretted the levity which the house had exhibited on this occasion, and as he was likely to be the means of having so serious a subject treated with ridicule, he should close his observations (cries of go on! and hear). When the house treated as ludicrous and chimerical the bare possibility of reading the Thirty-nine Articles of our Religion, was not this of itself a strong confirmation of the proposition he had advanced (hear, hear)? He would almost venture to say, that a very great majority of those he was now addressing never had read the articles of their religion (a laugh, and cries of hear). Of this he was quite certain, that the most religious parents, who were desirous of bringing up their sons in the most exemplary manner, were not in the habit of inculcating religion through the articles of the church. The greater part of them related to things not at all necessary for any one to believe (loud cheers).

Lord G. Cavendish supported the measure, because it would tend to increase the respectability of the Catholic teachers, and thereby aid the course of education, and of moral improvement in Ireland. Being convinced that it was only to the progress of instruction that we could look for a reformation in the habits of the Irish people, he would vote for the grant to the priesthood; but he trusted it would be accompanied with the great measure of Emancipation.

Mr. Peel imagined all parties would agree in treating the present measure as quite distinct from the proposition for removing Catholic disabilities; and rather regretted than any attempt had been made to connect the two questions together. It was proposed, without (as he thought) any explanation, for the house broadly to declare that it was expedient to provide by law for the future maintenance of the secular Catholic clergy. We were to pay 250,000*l.* a year to the Catholic priests, and to have no power in the nomination of them—they were to receive that large amount of money from the Government, but to be in all respects independent of it. He did not say that it was desirable that the Crown should have so much additional patronage; all he wanted was, to show what would really be the effect of the measure. Looking at such a grant only constitutionally, apart from any theological consideration, it was at least one upon which it behoved the house to pause for information. It was said that the Presbyterian body in the north of Ireland stood exactly in the same situation in which it was now proposed to place Catholics; but he denied the parity of the cases. The Moderator of the Synod of Ulster distinctly stated in his letter, the manner of the connexion between the Presbytery of the north of Ireland and the Government; and his statement amounted to this—that there was scarcely any difference between the Presbyterian doctrines and those of the Established Church. Certainly, if the bill before the house did pass, he should agree with the hon. member who had lately spoken, that the thirty-nine articles ought to be got rid of; for, after passing such a measure, no man could ever again be called to subscribe to them (hear, hear). The hon. gentlemen opposite smiled; he understood what was meant—it was intended to allude to what he had already done with respect to the college of Maynooth. But the cases were widely different. We objected to the education of the Irish Catholic priests abroad, and therefore we founded a seminary for them at home. But this was not like providing 1,000*l.* a year for every Catholic bishop; 1500*l.* for archbishops; and an income for every clergyman, of whatever degree. He doubted, too, how far it would be possible for the house to make such an arrangement without communication with the Pope; Government might probably think some alteration in the Bishop's oath advisable; and Dr. Doyle, who was of opinion that this might be done, thought that if we were to pay the Catholic bishops of Ireland 1,000*l.* a year, it was too much that the Pope should have the nomination of them. At least, there ought to be some stipulation that he should institute the person recommended to him from Ireland. We had made no provision for the Episcopalian clergy of Scotland, who were of the same religion as the Church of England; and not having done so, he could not see why we should commence our provision for any other church by giving a stipend to the Catholic clergy. If this bill passed, the Dissenters would see the Protestant Established Church provided for by tithes, and the Catholic clergy by taxes, to both of which the Dissenters would be obliged to contribute; while, at the same time, no provision was made for them. It would be contrary to the spirit of the revolution to select any religion distinct from the Protestant Church, for a permanent provision and establishment. Considering the want of sufficient information, it would be premature to press the measure, and he had no doubt that if so pressed, hon. members would have occasion to repeat their precipitancy.

Mr. C. W. Wynne thought that one of the great recommendations of Catholic Emancipation was, that it was to be accompanied by this measure. His hon. friend had asked why the two measures should be connected? He answered, the connexion was most politic, and had been supported by Mr. Pitt, the late Marquis of Londonderry, and others. He thought that man must be an idiot who could imagine that Ireland would be fully tranquillized by Catholic Emancipation, unless it were accompanied by such arrangements as the present. The great objection which had been made to the bill was, that it ought not to be extended to the Catholics, unless also to the dissenting clergy. But the cases of the two were different. The Catholics were smarting under the influence of penal laws, which even when repealed would leave an impression that could not be removed all at once, and it was most important that there should be some link to connect the future teachers of that people to the state (hear, hear).

Mr. E. Martin said, that this measure was not, as seemed to have been supposed by some, called for by the Catholic clergy, who would lose by it a great portion of the influence which they now held over their flocks in Ireland, and if they consented to any measure which would have that effect, it was because they felt it would forward the general measure of Emancipation. The Catholic priesthood at present received more from their flocks, than they would be likely to get by any pecuniary arrangement of the nature of that now proposed. He would support the measure, because he wished to take from the Protestants that which he considered so just a reproach to them. The Protestants at present, in their vestries, assessed the Catholics, without allowing them a vote on the occasion, for the payment of their church rates and other matters; if this measure were carried, though the Catholics would be assessed for the support of the Protestant church, the Protestants would also be taxed for the payment of the Catholic clergy (hear, hear).

Mr. Spring Rice said that he would support the bill—first, because the Catholic clergy of Ireland were more powerful than the clergy of any other communion, except those of the Established Church, and therefore it became more desirable to place them in an amicable relation with the state; and, secondly, because the population of that persuasion were the poorest in the empire, and consequently the least able to afford a contribution to their own pastors, being obliged by law to support the religion of the state (hear, hear). He did not concur in the opinion—"better no religion than the Roman Catholic;" on the contrary, though he did not admire it, because it was Catholic, he respected it because it was Christian (hear, hear); and therefore it was, that he wished it the power of communicating religious and moral instruction to those who were attached to that form of faith. He knew parts of Ireland the population of which were actually banished from Christianity, because, from their absolute poverty, they were incapable of paying the very poor stipend to a religious pastor of their own communion. As a friend to freedom, he should ever deprecate too close a connexion between the government and the Catholic clergy; but at the same time, he was most solicitous to have such a relation between that clergy and the state, as would lead them to look to the latter with reverence and affection. In the regium donum, under which the clergy of the Presbyterians of the North of Ireland were remunerated, he saw a full exemplification of the facility of such a relation being preserved without danger. He would appeal to the Irish members of that house, whether in their capacity of magistrates and administrators of the law, they had not uniformly experienced the most active and zealous co-operation from the Catholic Clergy in their respective counties? To remunerate such men by a fair and constitutional grant, must be productive of the highest benefit.

Mr. Goulburn opposed the motion, because he thought the house was altogether without proper information on the subject. He saw every thing in this resolution that was calculated to excite dissension and dissatisfaction among the clergy whom it was intended to benefit. He believed, that just in proportion as the house increased their emoluments, would it diminish the confidence which their flocks at present reposed in them. If they agreed to make this grant to the Catholic clergy, they were bound, in point of principle, to make a similar grant to the clergymen of every other sect which dissented from the Established Church. An hon. friend of his had said, that he would make this grant to the Catholic clergy because he considered them dangerous to the state, and that he would withhold it from the Dissenters because he knew them to be harmless. Was not this holding out to the Dissenters an encouragement to be seditious? Was it not saying to them, "You are now quiet and submissive, and therefore not worth remunerating; but become turbulent and disaffected, and we will immediately provide for you" (hear, hear)? Such a defence of the present resolution was utterly untenable: the expense of such a system would be found serious, when there were added to it the sums necessary to provide for the clergy of the Dissenters. So far from harmony being promoted between the Protestant and the Catholic Church, a great jealousy of each other would be excited among them, when they found themselves mutually placed under the protection and support of the state.

Mr. Calcraft remarked that it was extraordinary, that the two ministers, who from the situation which one of them had filled, and which the other was now filling, ought to have the most information on every subject connected with Ireland, were the most forward in stopping the improvement of that country, on the ground that the house had not sufficient information. On a proposition of this nature, where the union of the empire and the happiness of the people were so materially concerned, it was trifling to talk of the expenditure which would be incurred by acceding to it. The sum necessary to defray it might be saved by reducing several improper grants; and nobody would object to apply any saving so made to such a useful object.

Mr. Cressney said, that he would have no objection to see the Catholic clergymen properly remunerated; but would never consent to pay that remuneration out of the taxes of the Protestants of England (hear). He thought that the Catholic clergymen might easily be paid out of the funds of Ireland itself. Why should great families be allowed to send their relations and their tutors out to Ireland, and to quarter them upon the rich livings of that country? He never would consent to make any provision for the Catholic clergy of Ireland, unless it were made from the property of the Established Church (hear, hear).

Mr. Brougham felt no difficulty from want of information upon this subject, because it was not encompassed by any of that obscurity in which the measure relative to the forty shilling freeholders appeared to be involved. The facts relating to it lay in a narrow compass, and had often been presented to the consideration of Parliament. The principles on which it must be decided were familiar to them all: for he might say, that often as the Catholic question had been discussed, from the time when Mr. Fox first brought it forward twenty years ago, down to the present moment, there had never been one occasion in which it had been discussed without the necessity of a provision for the Catholic clergy being urged, without such a provision being admitted to be germane to the grand question, and almost inseparable from it. The generality of the words, in which this motion was couched, formed one of the grounds on which he supported it. His hon. friend who had spoken last, might have voted for it consistently with the principles by which he appeared to be animated; for it prescribed no manner of proceeding, it pointed out no funds from which this remuneration was taken, it only recognized the principle that it was expedient that the state should, in some way or other, make provision for the Catholic clergy. With respect to the possible increase to the influence of the Crown from this measure, he must now say that all his alarm had ceased (hear, hear). He considered the granting to the Crown the power of direct nomination, or a vote on the appointment of priests, either directly or indirectly, to be measures which planted in each parish of Ireland a hired officer of the government; and he repeated, that if those measures had formed part of the present proposition, he should have been among the first to hold up his hand against them. They were not to be found in it; and he therefore felt himself justified in giving it his support: respecting the alleged necessity of providing for the ministers of other sects, if we provided or those of the Catholics, he contended that there was neither consistency nor sound principle to bear out such necessity. In point of consistency, this grant would not give to the Catholics a greater sum, if regard were paid to their numbers, than was now given to the Presbyterians by the regium donum. It was necessary to support the grant, because the clergy were the natural instructors of the people. We had adopted at home the principle which acknowledged the propriety of educating the people. Let us proceed onwards in the performance of our duty and adopt the same principle with regard to the people of Ireland. He must, before he sat down, protest against one position which had been set up in the course of the debate. Nothing could be more dangerous to the great question of Catholic Emancipation than to admit that we gave this provision to the Catholic clergy as a security. If we gave it as a security, we must admit that danger existed. He denied the danger; he denied the security. He considered this resolution, to be entirely foreign to the great question of Catholic Emancipation. Grant that to the people of Ireland, and it would allay all dissensions and disturbances—it would give us their hearts, and in giving us their hearts, it would secure our dominion over them, so that a world in arms should not be able to wrest it from us (hear, hear).

Mr. Pakenham concurred in thinking that it was not dealing fairly with the Catholic question to consider this measure as a security against danger likely to accrue from conceding Catholic Emancipation. The hon. member for Aberdeen had said that he was sensible of the injustice and impolicy of leaving 6,000,000 of people without an adequate provision for their religious instruction. He thought that this instruction ought to be paid for, but all that he objected to was the mode of paying. Now he (Mr. P.) conceived that the proposed mode of paying them was one of the best that could be conceived; the provision made for the Catholic church by the Protestant community, would, in taking away one of the Catholic's most plausible objections to the Protestant Church, act as a buttress to support the establishment.

The house then divided—For the motion, 206—Against it 102—Majority for it, 43.

Catholic Claims.

FRIDAY, MAY 6.—The order of the day for the house resolving itself into a committee of the whole house on the Catholic Relief bill having been moved,

Gen. Gascoyne said, that he could not avoid viewing this bill in conjunction with two other measures now before the house. They all appeared to be component parts of the same system. With respect to the first of these bills, which was intended to contract the number of voters in Ireland, if the principle were once conceded, he knew not where it would end. It appeared to him to be a most dangerous precedent. Then came the bill for the support of the Catholic clergy. When application of this kind was made for the appropriation of the public money, it was, as a matter of form, necessary to procure the royal sanction. They had not, however, been apprised of any such assent having been given, and if not, there would be an end of one of the wings of the Catholic bill; one flank company would have retreated without firing a shot. He was convinced that 7-10ths of the population of this country were hostile to the bill now under consideration. The demise of that house must take place in a very short time. He did not make this remark because he was at all afraid of a dissolution (hear, and laughter): he had no apprehensions on the subject, but it was attended with a great deal of trouble, and that trouble he and all men were desirous of avoiding. Would not a new Parliament be likely to call upon ministers to show that they were borne out in what they had done? In his opinion, if there were any appearance of this measure being carried through the Lords, it would become the duty of His Majesty's Ministers to advise a dissolution of Parliament forthwith. Nothing he conceived, could be more unpopular in this country than the introduction of a bill for the purpose of granting support to the priests. From every thing he heard and saw, he was thoroughly satisfied that if the house permitted the bill for the support of the priests to pass, it would be attended with very serious consequences. The conduct of the Attorney-General for Ireland, on this occasion, surprised him much. He had called on the house, very properly, to suppress the favourite Association of the Catholics. But it was most extraordinary that he should, almost in the same breath, when he moved the third reading of that bill, the object of which was to put down the organ of the Catholic body, introduce another, admitting to the highest privileges in the state the very persons whose conduct had excited so much apprehension. How could his learned friend reconcile this? He wished to know to what extent it was intended they should go? If the people of England were reconciled to this bill for emancipating the Catholics—if their feelings could be ascertained, and those feelings were favourable to it, then the measure might be passed with safety. But, as they knew not what the real feelings of the people were, he called on the house to pause. If they did not, he feared they would have some reason to rue their hasty proceeding. It was not, however, his intention to oppose the motion for going into a committee.

Sir T. Lethbridge said that this bill went to repeal the oath of supremacy which every member of that house had taken. He did not doubt that the terms of that oath were in the recollection of every person who heard him; but he would nevertheless request that the clerk might be ordered to read it over (the clerk here read the oath of supremacy). If, then, it should turn out that the bill before the house would lead them to violate the oath which had been just read, he need not say what would be its effect on all hon. members who looked at this subject in the same way as he did. There were two points of view in which the question might be contemplated. The first was, that every member who was returned to that house as a representative of the people of England, entered it upon the condition, implied if not expressed, that he would preserve the British constitution in Church and State, as it had been handed down to our forefathers. This condition no man was at liberty to get rid of. The persons by whom these hon. members had been returned were well aware of the nature and effect of this oath, and were neither so ignorant nor so careless about it as they had been represented to be, but were sensibly alive to the course which was now proposed to the legislature of the country. The other point from which he viewed the subject, was, that by a direct enactment, the house would recognize the authority of a foreign potentate. It was proposed to form a board of Catholic bishops, who were beforehand engaged by a solemn oath to obey in all respects the authority of the Church of Rome. This was an objection which by no argument could the house get over. Arguments might be used against it with so much ingenuity, that he should find it difficult, perhaps impossible, to answer them; but he denied that any man could controvert the fact which he advanced. There was in the very outset of this bill a curious anomaly: it talked of the preservation of the Protestant establishment, and yet, in the subsequent parts of it, proceeded to provide for the return of Roman Catholic members for Ireland. Now, in the Union with Scotland, there was a clause directly against the return of any such member. This was a point which the house could in no way get over. The preamble asserted that the declarations in the oath of supremacy, related only to matters of spiritual and religious belief, and not to the allegiance of his Majesty's subjects. The truth of this statement could not be proved. If it could, why were Catholic members not now sitting there? Why was it necessary to legislate for them at all? Did they not profess—and he gave them credit for the zeal and sincerity with which they did so—their faith in the supremacy of the church of Rome, and did they not vow to continue that faith to their death? Their allegiance, then, was divided. But the allegiance of the subjects of these realms ought to be entire, and was due to the sovereign on the throne, who was acknowledged to be the supreme authority in all matters, spiritual as well as temporal. What was the objection of the Catholics to the oath of supremacy? It was only for one word, to which they could not agree. And did the oath proposed by the bill before the house—which he did not quarrel with because it was rightly worded—obviate this objection? Had any of those persons whose evidence had been taken as conclusive authority in the committees, been asked if they would take this oath? He believed that no honourable and conscientious Catholic could be found to take it. He had read through the evidence of Dr. Doyle, and very heavy work he had found it (a laugh). That rev. prelate had been asked if he had taken an oath of obedience to the Pope of Rome, and he answered that he had. He was then asked if he recollected the contents of that oath, and he answered that he did not. It appeared to him rather extraordinary that a person of his high character in the church to which he belonged should not know this. He had, however, procured a copy of an oath, which he believed was taken by the Catholic clergy. The persons taking it swore to pay entire obedience to their Lord the Pope, and to assist him in the recovery of the papedom and the royalties belonging to it against all men—to support his authority to the utmost of their power, and as far as was possible to make other persons do so, and to receive as conclusive the decisions of the holy canons, and of the Council of Trent. How was it possible that persons who had taken this oath could, with a safe conscience, substitute for it another, which in every word and every sentiment was opposed to it? This consideration, if it were the only one, was, in his opinion, so important, that it ought to influence the house against going into the committee. With regard to the commission of Catholic bishops; in all the previous bills of a similar nature security had been provided, by the introduction of Protestant councillors among these bishops; but here there was to be no control over them—not even by the power of the sovereign himself. Was this constitutional? Was it safe or expedient that this power should be vested in the hands of Catholic bishops, who had already taken an oath of unlimited obedience to the Pope? Was this like the wise and cautious proceedings of our forefathers, who, after they had established the civil and religious freedom of the nation, provided a sufficient security for their future preservation? It was said by those who were favourable to this measure, by way of inducing others to adopt their view of the subject, that the Catholics of the present day were different from those of other times, and that they had been so much altered that they might now be safely admitted to a full share in the advantages of the constitution. If a careful examination were made into the character of the Catholics of Ireland, of Spain, and of France, at the present day, he believed the house would come, as he had done, to quite a contrary conclusion. Although the evidence before the committees had been carefully worded, and very ably given, let any dispassionate man look at it, and say if the bearing of that evidence was not all one way. If it were not, he (Sir T. Lethbridge) had read it ignorantly, and with prejudice, and had come to an erroneous conclusion. Lest he should be said to misrepresent, he would refer to some parts of that given by Dr. Doyle. With respect to the right of the Pope to nominate to benefices, he said it had been enjoyed since the time of the Stuarts, and that it could not now be taken from his Holiness. This was saying a good deal: but he goes further, and said that any interference of a Protestant Monarch would not be admitted by the Catholic church. There was also a passage in a letter by Dr. Doyle to the Secretary of the Kildare Catholic Rent Association, which had been written coolly and deliberately. He said, "the spirit of the Catholics had not yielded under oppression, but like the ruins of their ancient greatness, which overhung that town (Kildare), retained their venerable and majestic appearance, and reminded the beholder that it had once been great and free. Although now it was enslaved by the tyranny of a worthless and base faction, it could spare from its competence, or even its wretchedness, a part of what escaped the hand of the despoiler."

This was the cool expression of the feelings of the right reverend doctor. In the recent instance of a petition which had been prepared at Wetherby, a Roman Catholic gentleman of great wealth and importance had alluded to the profanation of the churches and abbeys, once Catholic, and which were now devoted to the Protestant worship. Could it be doubted, that if this gentleman should be returned to Parliament, he would propose or promote any measure which should restore things to their ancient state? The hon. member then quoted a passage from the preface to the Roman Catholic version of the New Testament, written, as we understood, by the reverend Dr. Troy in 1816, where the burning of all heretical books, particularly the English Bible, was particularly enjoined, and where the prayers of the Protestants were said to be no better than the howlings of wolves, and not heard in Heaven. This was enough, he thought, to show the house that the Catholics of 1825 were not in spirit wholly different from those of 1725; he would say with an hon. member who was crossing the floor (here Sir J. Sebright happened to be going out of the house, and loud and reiterated cheers followed this allusion), that he was ashamed to see the House of Commons discussing the Catholic question in these times (cheers). He (Sir T. Lethbridge) was astonished at their doing so; and he wondered, that in these times any ministers would dare—he did not mean this in a personal sense—to bring forward a measure, the object of which was to abrogate the securities which had been provided for the preservation of the constitution (hear, hear). He felt that he had said more than he ought (a laugh), and he thanked the house for their indulgence. He felt it to be a duty to protest against the vicious principle of the bill, and the violation of the solemn oath which it would occasion. Oaths were of the utmost importance in general. He had taken an oath to perform his duty; and he never would take an oath which he afterwards intended to alter or violate. He could say, in spirit with the late beloved Monarch, who preceded the present, that “he was ready to descend from the throne, he was ready to descend to the cottage, he was ready to lay his block upon the Acad—(here loud cheers and cries of hear, hear! interrupted the hon. member for a considerable time. After silence had been restored, he proceeded, receiving much attention from the house).—“He was ready to descend from the throne—he was ready to descend to the cottage—he was ready to lay his head upon the block, but he was not prepared to violate the oaths he had taken.” So he (Sir T. Lethbridge) would say; he was not prepared to violate the oath of supremacy he had taken, before this house and all the country.

Mr. Peel said, it was hardly necessary for him to state that he acquiesced in the proposition that the Speaker should leave the chair, only because he would have another opportunity of taking the sense of the house on the question. His objections to the bill now under consideration, were strengthened by the vote to which the house had come on a former night, and by which they were pledged to make a provision for the Roman Catholic church (hear).

Mr. Butler Clarke said it was impossible that Ireland could remain in its present state. Under present circumstances nobody would invest capital in Ireland; nobody would live in it who could avoid it. If the bill before the house were passed, he was convinced that Government might withdraw every soldier from Ireland. Ireland would then be kept quiet with the assistance of the Catholics themselves.

Col. Trench was of opinion, that the unhappy situation of Ireland had resulted from the system of misgovernment which had long prevailed in that country. That system had, however, been altered; the good seed was sown, but it could not be expected that the crop should be reaped directly. Capital to a large amount had, he knew, been carried into that country; that capital would produce industry, and industry would produce tranquillity. He opposed Catholic Emancipation, because in Ireland the immense mass of the people was in an ignorant and degraded state, and were entirely under the influence of the priesthood, whom he believed to be directed, in their turn, by political feelings. The Catholics would not be content with what Parliament would give them; they would never be content until they obtained possession of supreme power (hear). He had no objection to admit the Catholics to the privilege of a silk gown, about which so much had been said, but he would exclude them from the sacred circle of the Protestant constitution.

The house then resolved itself into a committee of the whole house, Mr. Macdonald in the chair.

The bill having been read a first and second time,

The Speaker said, nothing which he had heard or read had relieved his mind from the serious apprehensions with which it was filled with regard to this great, and, as he thought, most dangerous measure (hear, hear). However painful it might be to him to differ from the majority of the house—to differ from those on whose opinions he in almost every case placed the greatest reliance; and above all, notwithstanding he felt that the course he was now pursuing was a great evil, and to be justified only by the necessity of the case, still feeling that a question of this kind admitted of no compromise, so long as he retained his conscientious objections to the question of emancipation, he should be ashamed of himself if he did not declare them. He had been anxious not to remain silent with regard to the present bill, the only public measure with which he had interfered since he had had the honour to fill the chair (hear, hear).

Sir H. Parnell took that opportunity of observing that the hon. member for Somersetshire (Sir T. Lethbridge), in reading the oath taken by Roman Catholic bishops, had omitted a very important passage; in which they stated that their relations with the Pope could in no way shake their obedience to the King and Royal Family; what appeared to be the objectionable parts of the oath, had been explained to be harmless by high Catholic authorities. The words salvo meo ordine were introduced to separate the spiritual obedience which the Catholics owed to the Pope, from that which they owed to their Sovereign.

On the motion of an hon. member, that the form of the Catholic oath should be amended by substituting the words “present Protestant Church Establishment,” for “present Church Establishment,”

Mr. Phinkett objected to the alteration, on the ground that casuists might call it an admission that there was some other established church, besides the Protestant, existing in England. The oath already called for a disavowal by the Catholics of doctrines which no man in his senses could suspect them of entertaining. But in the year 1821, the Catholic advocates had been taunted by their adversaries for not employing the full and formal oath provided in the year 1793; and, in order to satisfy as far as possible all scruples, that oath of 1793 was now returned to.

Mr. Peel concurred in thinking the addition of the word "Protestant" superfluous; and still further as to the needlessness of many of the disavowals called for by the oath. He could not think it necessary to call upon the Catholic, at this time of day, to swear that he would not destroy or murder any person under the plea of that person's being a heretic.

Mr. Brougham said, that the oath was required to be taken only by those who were called to exercise some public function. Some hon. members objected to the oath as an insufficient security, while an absolving power was retained by the Pope. But what other security had they at present besides that oath (hear, hear)? What was there to hinder his learned friend, Mr. O'Connell, from coming into the house at the present day but an oath? There were many parts of Ireland—he would not name them, lest he should give alarm to some of the Irish members—at all events there were places in England, where, if Mr. O'Connell presented himself as a candidate, his election would be certain. What was it that prevented him, but an oath (hear, hear)? "Oh, but," said the opponents of this bill, "the Pope may absolve him from that oath." "No," replied Mr. O'Connell, "I do not believe that he or any other authority has that power, and therefore I will stay out of Parliament, because I cannot conscientiously take it" (cheers). To doubt the obligation of these oaths on Catholics was one of the most marvellous instances of human inconsistency: Why, the thing was quite plain, and he did not despair of making it understood even by the hon. member for Bristol (Mr. Bright), who had somehow or other got his head filled with all sorts of extraordinary prejudices on this subject (cheers). The hon. member, however, and his consort the member for Surrey (Mr. H. Sumner), who sailed together on this question, turned round and said this was not sufficiently strong as a security. Why, in the name of Heaven, or he would say, as perhaps something of greater weight with those who were now so much alarmed for the security of the Protestant establishment, in the name of Dr. Daigeman himself (cheers and laughter), what security could they have greater than that which they already possessed? What, he would repeat, prevented the Catholic from coming into Parliament without the intervention of any bill, but his respect for the sanctity of an oath, and his consequent unwillingness to take one from which he knew he could not be absolved (hear, hear)? For his own part, he was not anxious for any oath, because he did not believe any such security necessary; but he consented to an oath being embodied in the bill, because he knew that he had to conciliate prejudices.

The clause was then agreed to.

To the next clause, providing that no Catholic should be eligible to be Lord Lieutenant or Lord Deputy in Ireland,

Mr. Robertson proposed as an amendment the following words:—"Or of being returned as member to serve in parliament for any of the Universities in that part of Great Britain called England and Scotland."

The amendment was negatived without a division.

The Chairman having put the clause containing the regulations touching the appointment of bishops and deans of the Roman Catholic church in Ireland,

Mr. Brougham, after reading the following words of the clause, "And whereas it is expedient that such precautions should be taken, in respect of persons in holy orders professing the Roman Catholic religion, who may at any time hereafter be elected, nominated, or appointed to the exercise or discharge of episcopal duties or functions in the Roman Catholic church in Ireland, or to the duties or functions of a dean in the said church, as that no such person shall at any time hereafter assume the exercise or discharge of any such duties or functions within the United Kingdom, or any part thereof, whose loyalty and peaceable conduct shall not have been previously ascertained, as hereinafter provided," wished to add to them these words—"And whereas, it is fit and requisite to regulate the intercourse between the subjects of this realm and the see of Rome, be it therefore enacted, that it shall and may be lawful for his Majesty, his heirs and successors, by two several commissions, to be issued under the great seal of Ireland, to nominate and appoint such persons in holy orders professing the Roman Catholic religion, and exercising episcopal duties or functions in Ireland, as his Majesty, his heirs, and successors shall think fit to be commissioners under the act for the two purposes before-mentioned, and that the person first named in the said commissions should be the president thereof." As he had before stated the grounds on which he recommended these securities, he should not now repeat them. The objection to this provision was, that by agreeing to it the house would legalize the spiritual authority of the Pope. He asserted that the house would do no such thing; it would merely regulate the existence of that which had existed for many years, in spite of its enactments. That the Pope exercised spiritual authority in this country could not be denied. For instance, if the Pope were to ordain him a priest (a laugh), and the King were to appoint him to the bishopric of Durham (a laugh)—one of the most lucrative appointments, by the bye, in his gifts, and the best trade of all now going (laughter)—he would be entitled to become a bishop per saltum, and would not require ordination from any person qualified to confer it in the English church.

Mr. Peel said, that Bishop Horsley drew a distinction between the different authorities exercised by the Pope of Rome, which well deserved the attention of the house. He admitted the Pope was bishop of Rome, and that he had liberty to confer degrees within his own jurisdiction; but he denied that the Pope had any liberty to do so in this country. The proposed provision he (Mr. P.) esteemed worse than nugatory. No objection which he felt to the removal of the Catholic disabilities would be removed by the existence of such securities. If any gent. would get up and say that these securities would be effectual securities to the Protestant Church in Ireland, he would waive the objection which he now felt to them; but he objected to them on the ground that they imposed on the Crown an obligation to appoint two permanent commissions, composed exclusively of ecclesiastics. Besides, they provided that if the bull, dispensation, or other document received from Rome were of an innocent nature, it should be sent to the parties to whom it was directed, but did not provide for what was to be done in case it should appear to be of a dangerous description. There was no penalty attached to any bishop who should exercise episcopal functions without having received such a certificate as was mentioned in the present clause. Add to this, no commissioner would like to impeach a man of disloyalty who had not been convicted of some disloyal act. There was nothing more vague than the ideas attached to the words loyal and disloyal; and he would therefore wish to know what construction the learned gent. intended to put upon them?

Mr. Plunkett would have no objection to throwing these securities overboard, if by so doing he could ensure the company of his rt. hon. friend to the conclusion of his voyage; but as he could not flatter himself with such a hope, and as he knew that the abandonment of these securities would deprive him of the support of several of the crew with whom he was then embarked, he felt bound to keep them at all hazards. For his own part, he thought these securities effectual and essential to the success of the bill. It was known that Catholics lived under the spiritual control of their priests—were influenced by it to a certain degree in their political conduct, and were, by means of their priests, in constant connexion with the Court of Rome. He held it to be no inconsiderable security, that when the people were so much under the influence of their priesthood, that priesthood should be brought into connexion with the state, and should give to it full assurance of its peaceful and loyal behaviour. The objection that loyalty was a vague term might have had some weight, supposing they had been framing an act of Parliament to punish a want of loyalty. In that case it might have been necessary to define clearly the meaning of loyalty in order to ascertain the extent of crime which was concealed under a want of it; but in the present case, no such niceness of language was required. He admitted that the securities of the present bill were not the same with those of the bill which he had introduced in 1821. By the bill of 1821, the commission was to consist of certain prelates, certain laymen, and certain ministers of the Crown. By the present bill, no laymen, nor ministers of the Crown, would be admitted into it, but it would consist exclusively of Roman Catholic prelates. He considered the security of the present bill to be equally good with the securities of the bill of 1821. He should not have suggested any change in those securities, if it had not been his duty to furnish the committee with such measures as would be thankfully received by the Catholic population; and he was informed, on good authority, that to a commission of this nature no part of it would object. He took it for granted that the Roman Catholic prelates were good subjects—were honest men whose oaths could be relied on; if that were admitted, was it not a great security that the Crown should be allowed to select individuals from their body, by whose certificate it could be assured that every person enrolled amongst their number was a loyal subject, and not only that he was a loyal subject, but that his nomination had been domestic and had not proceeded from the Pope, or from any foreign power. Domestic nomination had been considered, from the commencement of these discussions, as a security equal to a direct vesto on the part of the Crown. The people of Ireland were ready to grant domestic nomination without a murmur, whereas the vesto could not have been given to the Crown without great difficulty, and perhaps not without entering into an express concordat with the Pope. Even if the question of Catholic Emancipation could not be carried, he should consider an arrangement of this nature to be highly essential to the security of the empire, and to the tranquillity of Ireland.

The clause was then agreed to.

Upon the clause for regulating the reception of bulls from the Church of Rome,

Sir Francis Ommalley complained that the homage paid to these bulls ought not to be encouraged—it was contrary to the second commandment, which prohibited idolatry (a laugh).

Mr. Brougham assured the hon. gent. that he might retire to, or rather continue his night's rest (a laugh), without any fears upon that head—for these bulls were not the animals with horns, that were sometimes calculated to scare a man, but quiet and inoffensive bulls upon paper (a laugh), which were merely received by the Catholics with some pious tokens of adoration and respect.

This clause being agreed to, the house resumed.

Elective Franchise.

MONDAY, MAY 9.—Mr. Littleton moved, that the house do resolve itself into a committee on the bill for regulating the Elective franchise in Ireland. The question having been put,

Mr. Grattan entered his protest against the bill, as one of the most unjust and unconstitutional measures ever brought under the consideration of Parliament. He was astonished that the House of Commons should appear disposed to pass the bill without information, when the gentlemen connected with Ireland themselves entertained the most opposite opinions with regard to it. If the house distrusted the Catholics, why did they propose to grant them emancipation? It was said that the people of Ireland did not value their privilege. That, however, was not true; and if it were, they would not deserve emancipation. By passing the bill, the house would involve themselves in a system of legislation which would lead to the most fatal consequences.

Mr. F. Fitzgerald said, that so far from compromising any existing popular rights, the present measure went to confirm them, inasmuch as no new votes could now be created. He wished, however, to make the bill a measure of general reform; and he objected, therefore, to that clause which exempted one class of voters, the forty shilling fee-simple freeholders, from its operation.

Mr. Leath Foster said, that if the bill passed in its present shape, they would only pass from one scheme of fraudulent voting to another. Landlords would merely give the tenant disfranchised by the present bill a fee-simple in the wretched cottage which he inhabited, and so constitute him, afresh, to all intents and purposes, an efficient voter; the slight pecuniary loss sustained by the giving up of the cottage being made up by an additional rent-charge laid upon the land.

Mr. Dawson said, that the three bills respecting Catholic Emancipation, the elective franchise, and the Catholic priesthood, were so blended together, that it appeared to him that he could not vote for one of them without voting for them all. He was upon principle decidedly opposed to the bill for the relief of the Catholics; and as the bill then before the house was merely introduced to promote the success of the former bill, he should give his vote against it, though he considered it in itself a wise measure. He would raise the qualification to 20l., which would prevent the system of fraud and perjury now existing, and would introduce into Ireland what was much wanted—namely, a substantial yeomanry, to stand between the highest and the lowest classes of the community, in defence of British liberty.

Mr. Hume, in objecting to this bill, begged to state, that it did not in the slightest extent alter the principles of that support which he had ever felt disposed and determined to afford to the great measure of Roman Catholic Emancipation. But had the substance of this measure been introduced as a clause into the bill for the Emancipation of the Roman Catholics, he would rather have voted against that great bill itself, while it possessed any such contents, than support such an invasion of the rights and privileges of so large a class of the people, as this bill for the abolition of the forty shilling freeholder's franchise went to effect (hear). There was no evidence before Parliament of a satire to be relied on—that could at all justify or bear out the recital of the abuses which were said to render this bill necessary. Every question which was addressed to the witnesses examined before the committee was put in this manner—"Would you have any objection to such a measure, provided we gave you such another?"—making Emancipation, as it were, the alternative. This was altogether unfair, and he should move for the appointment of a committee, to inquire into the real state of the elective franchise in Ireland (hear). In the case of Grampound, for example, where it was a question to disfranchise only between 50 and 60 electors, it should be remembered what reluctance the house had shown to begin any measure of this kind, and the remedy provided was to extend the franchise to thousands who had not enjoyed it before (hear, hear). Was it fair to visit the forty shilling freeholders of Ireland with a measure of this kind, and not to extend the same limitation to the forty shilling freeholders of England? If there were any one principle which more than another ought to be kept in view by those who were friendly to the reform of Parliament, it was the further extension of the elective franchise; and upon that principle he now called on all the advocates of Parliamentary reform to oppose this obnoxious bill (hear). It was impossible to foresee to what an extent the principle of such a measure might be carried. Was Parliament to deprive, upon charges by no means satisfactorily or to a sufficient extent established, the many of this elective right, in order to vest it in the few? Want of political virtue was by no means peculiar to the poor; on the contrary the rich were much more prone to sacrifice the interests of the public: the poor exhibited much more independence than it was usual to give them credit for. Before they advanced a step further in the present business, let the house obtain the information which it was necessary to possess on the matters recited in the bill; and if it should be found that the abuses charged did exist, let Parliament endeavour to correct them, and instead of abolishing the franchise of the forty shilling freeholders, teach them to exercise it with more honour to themselves and advantage for Ireland. They ought not to blame the people of Ireland for being under the influence of their landlords, but to punish the landlords for exerting that influence in the shape of terror to procure an unwilling vote. The same influence was universally exercised in England and in the same way. He begged in conclusion to move "That a select committee be appointed to inquire what faults and abuses exist in the exercise of the elective franchise in Ireland; and to ascertain whether any and what measures can be adopted with a view to correct the same" (hear, hear).

Col. Johnson seconded this amendment. He had been stationed for a long time in Ireland, and witnessed many elections in that country; but he did not remember to have witnessed such abuses as were supposed to exist in the exercise of the elective franchise by the Irish forty shilling freeholders. The measure before the house was a wanton violation of popular rights, for all the evils which it pretended to remedy might be obviated by taking the votes by ballot.

Mr. Martin (of Galway) observed it had been said that on the present occasion Irish members particularly were to be listened to; but they were the very last men in the world who ought to be listened to (a laugh). He himself was the last man who ought to be listened to (a laugh) on this subject. All Irish members were here incredible witnesses. He could easily understand that at a recent meeting of 30 or 40 Irish members, the bill should be a favourite bill; for as it went to disfranchise so many freeholders, the effect would be that gentlemen, instead of having to canvass a whole county, containing some thousands of electors, would have to canvass 10 or 20 freeholders. He compared the bill to the nostrum of a French quack, who professed to cure the tooth-ache. His patient took the medicine till every tooth dropped out of his head, the sound as well as the decayed teeth. There followed a process in the Tribunal de Cassation, and the matter was gravely pleaded. The judge was of opinion that the patient had been robbed and deluded. The quack defended himself by the terms of his contract. He had undertaken, he said, to cure the tooth-ache, and that he had done. The preservation of the teeth was no part of the bargain. This was the policy of the bill. He supported the bill, but it was with reluctance: it was for the sake of obtaining Emancipation. He had persuaded himself of the propriety of doing a little wrong, for the purpose of obtaining a great good.

Mr. S. Rice said, it appeared to him, that when the deficiency of evidence was complained of, the contents of the minutes were strangely overlooked. He approved of this bill, because he was a friend to Parliamentary reform. It would effectually enlarge the number of real constituents. There was no analogy between Ireland and England as to this subject. The law was the same: the practice was different. The bill would cure the evils of numbers and poverty. Not that he objected to those qualities in a sound body of constituents; but only where they made parties exercising the franchise more wretched and dependent than they would be if they had no such privilege. From the evidence of Judge Day, Mr. O'Connell, Mr. O'Connor, Colonel Currie, and General Burke, it appeared that the raising of the qualification to 10l. would not abolish one good vote. It would also tend to make the gentry reside in Ireland: they would not then be able, as now, to command votes at pleasure; instead of driving men up to the hustings, they must solicit them. This would make them attentive to the wants and wishes of the people, and would create something like public opinion in Ireland. It would be a different consideration if the bill touched the votes of fee-simple. Had this bill gone to affect them in any degree, he would not have supported it. It only went to leaseholds of a very questionable nature.

Mr. M'Naghten opposed the bill altogether, as it went to disfranchise innocent men and posterity, and left the rogues who had committed the fault unpunished. The freeholders in the north of Ireland were sufficiently independent.

Lord Milton intended to support the bill, less on the ground of its own value than from its connexion with the greater and ulterior measure. Its merits had, he thought, been a good deal exaggerated, but the independence of forty shilling freeholders had been perhaps not less over-rated. The hon. member for Orford, for instance, had borne witness to the freedom of voters in the north of Ireland; and yet, the circumstances under which that hon. gent. spoke, formed a curious commentary upon his assertion. The hon. member (Mr. M'Naghten) had, until lately, himself represented a considerable county in the north of Ireland; at present, he appeared sitting for a small borough on the eastern coast of England; and how was this change to be accounted for? Simply by an instance of the independence of the electors of Ireland. The hon. member sat for the county of Antrim, until a certain member of a certain illustrious family (Lord Yarmouth) came of age. That noble personage then received the support of the uncontrolled freeholders of Antrim, and the honourable member was transferred to a borough, the property of the family of that noble personage—to wit, the borough of Orford (hear, hear, and laughter). What he (Lord Milton) desired was to prevent these transfers in future.

Mr. M'Naghten said that the noble lord was in entire ignorance of all the facts relating to the matter to which he had addressed himself (laughter). He (Mr. M'N.) had ceased to be member for the county of Antrim in 1812, from motives which were understood by himself (hear, and laughter), but which were very different from those which the noble lord meant to insinuate (great laughter).

The house then divided, when the numbers were—For the amendment, 53—Against it, 168—Majority, 115.

Mr. Lambton declared that if the bill before the house, and the bill in favour of the Catholics, were to be considered as necessarily connected, his mind was made up that he should vote against the latter.

Mr. Hobhouse entreated his hon. friend (Mr. Lambton), to reconsider what he had just said. He thought that as his hon. friend had made his opinions known on the disfranchisement bill, he might still continue his support to the great measure of Catholic Emancipation. It would be only playing into the hands of the antagonists of the Roman Catholic question to vote against that measure, because it was coupled in appearance with one not so agreeable to his feelings.

Mr. Hume declared that he would rather vote against the measure of Catholic Emancipation than support it, coupled with the bill for disfranchisement.

Mr. Brougham: The hon. member for Durham could not feel more deeply than he did the objections which applied to the measure now before the house. But he conjured his hon. friend, and those who coincided with him in opinion, by the political friendship which subsisted between them—by the love they bore to their country—he called on them by their sense of public and private duty—not to pursue the course which they had stated their intention of adopting. He hoped to be listened to by them while he told them the reason why they should not adopt the line of conduct which they proposed. If they did not vote for the Catholic question, it must necessarily follow that they did not act under the influence of their own opinions—that they were not free agents (hear). It would appear that they did not declare themselves for or against the measure, because they were in their own minds convinced that they ought to vote for or against it. No; it would be seen that they voted for the bill on one day, because they approved of its principle, and opposed it on another, because a measure was introduced that was not connected with it—because the house had sanctioned that measure, and adopted an opinion contrary to theirs (hear). If he were, on account of the freeholders' bill, to vote against the Catholic Emancipation bill, he should be voting against his own conviction, on one question, for no other reason but because on another question the house differed from him in opinion (hear). He called on those hon. members who declared that they would adopt another line of conduct to re-consider their opinion. He did not wish them to say a single word to-night; but he conjured them by to-morrow night to turn the subject in their minds—to consult their feelings—to awaken their better judgment; if they did so, he felt the most confident hopes that his appeal would be attended with success (hear, hear).

Mr. Lambton said, the last clause of the bill now before the house was so intimately connected with the Emancipation bill, that they appeared to him to be one and the same thing. They could not, it was provided, pass the one without the other (hear, hear). Now, as he would much rather that the forty shilling freeholders should retain the right of voting, without the Catholic Relief bill being passed, than that they should be disfranchised, in order that Catholic Emancipation should be carried, he could not give his vote to the latter measure, proceeding as it did in conjunction with that which struck him as being exceedingly unjust. Not even the threatened displeasure of any of those with whom he had long been in the habit of acting, could induce him to abandon his opinion. He said this with pain; for no man could give up long established friendships without feelings of pain. His learned friend said, he could throw out of his consideration the connexion of the disfranchisement bill with the Catholic Emancipation bill (hear, hear). His learned friend might do so, but he (Mr. Lambton) certainly could not. The last clause was too intimately connected with the Catholic Relief bill, to enable him to view the two measures otherwise than in conjunction. In his opinion, the disfranchisement of the freeholders would effect a much greater evil than the granting of Catholic Emancipation would produce ben fit; and if the former measure were persisted in, he should feel himself bound to oppose the latter. Those opinions he advanced without meaning any thing disrespectful to his learned friend, and to those opinions he would firmly and inviolably adhere. He did not, and could not retract. He was not to be browbeaten in this way out of his well considered opinions. He was the last man to submit to any thing of the kind. He acted, in adopting those opinions, from a conviction that they were for the good of his country, and, so help him God—if he might use an expression which had perhaps been too much objected to—he would continue to adhere to them, although the consequence should be the rupture of the dearest political friendship he ever enjoyed.

Mr. Brougham denied that he had the slightest intention to brow-beat his hon. friend. There were, he believed, 300 members present, and if any one member—(and that was a large and extensive challenge)—would get up and say, there was any thing, even in the tone of what he had said, that indicated a wish to brow-beat his hon. friend, he would be content to suffer under his own condemnation. Nay, if his hon. friend, on reconsideration, was of opinion that there was any thing in the tone of his respectful remonstrance which manifested a desire to brow-beat him, then he would readily say that he had been guilty of a great offence against good-breeding. He was not conscious, at any time, of attempting to brow-beat any person; and certainly he was never in his life less inclined to do so than on the present occasion.

The bill then went through the committee.

Catholic Claims.

TUESDAY, MAY 10.—Mr. Dolerty having presented a petition from the Protestants of Galway, in favour of the Catholic claims,

Mr. Bunterworth said he had sent a circular letter to different parts of Ireland on this subject (hear), and he had received answers which led him to believe that the Protestants of Ireland were not so strongly in favour of this measure as had been represented. He did not receive his information from gentlemen who had seats in that house, and who might be under peculiar obligations to their constituents (hear, hear). He got his information from the clergy, and from gentlemen of very respectable character, who were well acquainted with the state of the country.

Mr. Maurice Fitzgerald wished to inform the hon. member, that if any person opened a shop in this country for the receipt of tales of bigotry and hypocrisy (loud cheers from all parts of the house).—if he opened a shop for the collection of motives, such as those which the hon. member was so ready to attribute to others, he would find that that shop would command abundant communications (hear, and laughter.) The hon. member had insinuated that gentlemen of Ireland who had seats in that house were not competent witnesses on this question, because they might be under peculiar obligations to their constituents. He would boldly say, that he for one owed very great obligations to his constituents. He had represented them for 30 years, and he had, during that period, conscientiously voted in favour of the Catholic claims (hear). His constituents were full of as genuine and sincere Protestant Christianity as the hon. member was, and yet they advocated the cause of the Roman Catholics (hear). They were incapable of being either intimidated or cajoled. They well knew the source from which those calumnious statements reached that house, and they despised it (hear). Those mischievous assertions were levelled at the peace and quiet of Ireland, and were sent abroad for the worst and basest purposes (hear). He trusted the house would indignantly throw aside such calumnious insinuations, which were calculated to produce the worst consequences, and which originated in the basest feelings (hear, hear).

The petition was then ordered to be printed.

On the question that the Catholic Relief bill be read a third time,

Mr. Curwen declared his opinion to be in favour of the measure. He knew that in the populous county with which he was connected a very large majority of the inhabitants was friendly to that measure. He believed that it would be rather advantageous to the Established Church that the Catholics should be allowed to enjoy the privileges which they sought for. There never was a moment when the Established Church had less reason for apprehension, for it was now more popular than it had been at any former period in his recollection, owing to the zealous manner in which its ministers discharged their duties. He was certain, that if any of the "No-Popery" chalkers were to make their appearance in the district where he resided, they would be hooted out of it. The Irish were exceedingly sensible to kindness, and a little concession would produce great effect in the way of conciliation.

Sir H. Inglis said, that the ground on which it was attempted to pass the bill before the house, was, that the Roman Catholic religion had changed its character—that it no longer retained the same intolerant and persecuting spirit which distinguished it in former days. This argument had no foundation in fact, for the church of Rome was not only unchanged but unchangeable. He would first direct the attention of the house to the intolerance which that church exhibited with respect to literature. Had it not prohibited the productions of all the master-minds which had appeared since the reformation (hear, hear)? First of all were the works of the great Bacon. The date of their prohibition was 1669 (hear). The prohibition was renewed in 1819 (hear). Locke's Essay on Human Understanding was another proscribed work; so also was the Paradise Lost of Milton; and Alberoni's work on the Newtonian philosophy (hear, hear). Was the spirit which dictated the prohibition of these books one of the facts on which the supporters of the bill before the house relied, as proving a change in the feelings of the Catholic church? The book of Grotius, De Jure Belli, and Puffendorf, were likewise placed under proscription. In the course of the debate on this question, reference had been made to Fenelon and Pascal; and an hon. member had asked whether that church could be bad to which such men belonged? His reply was, that the works of those eminent men were also set down in the prohibited list (hear, hear). How it could be contended that men represented the Catholic church, when that very church proscribed their works, he was at a loss to conceive. Again, not only were all Bibles printed in the vernacular tongue of the south of Europe prohibited, but the New Testament was also given up to the Inquisition (hear). It was said with respect to these books, ne quisquam audeat, aut legere, aut emere. The measure before the house could not, therefore, be supported on the ground that a change had taken place in the spirit of the church of Rome. The late Pope was one of the most Protestant Popes, if he might be allowed the phrase, that Europe ever saw. Yet what had been the conduct of that man who owed his personal gratitude to the British nation for the restoration of the works of art to his capital? He was so imbued with the spirit of the Romish religion, that when the English residents at Rome applied to him for leave to have a chapel in which they might attend their own mode of worship, he refused to allow it (hear, hear). The place in which Protestants were permitted to cast their dead had no wall or fence to protect it. When the late Pope was a prisoner in France, Napoleon asked him to tolerate all religions: his answer was contained in a circular letter to the cardinals, and was to this effect:—"We have rejected the proposition as contrary to the tenets of the Catholic religion, the tranquillity of states, and the happiness of life" (hear, hear). The same Pope, in an encyclical letter to the bishops, said, in reference to a proposed union of the Catholic with the Protestant religion, "As well might we unite Christ with Belial." Were these facts any evidence that the Church of Rome had changed with the change that had taken place in the intellectual character of the age? It was true that the physical power of the Church of Rome was less than formerly, but its disposition to exercise spiritual and intellectual tyranny was as strong as ever. We had bound the strong man; but his spirit was still stirring within him; and let us beware how we admitted him into the temple of the constitution, lest he should burst his bonds, pull down the fabric, and involve himself and us in common destruction (hear, hear). What was the first act of the late Cortes of Spain, when they were taking so much care to preserve their own civil rights? They declared that the only religion of the state was the Holy Roman Catholic Apostolic religion; that it was necessary to protect it by wise and just laws; and that the exercise of any other was prohibited. In the new state of Mexico, and in Belgium, the same intolerant spirit prevailed; and the first act of the Sardinian Government, on its restoration, was to restore the old intolerant laws on the subject of religion. The evidence which had been given before the Committee, and on which it was attempted to found the argument of a change in the Catholic religion, was, in his opinion, unsatisfactory. No man would venture to appeal to a jury on such evidence. The evidence of Dr. Doyle was totally inconsistent with the opinions contained in his letters signed "J. K. L." He believed that emancipation was comparatively an object of no desire to those in whose name it had been so long and so clamorously called for. He founded his opinion on the testimony of those who had as often represented themselves as the friends of the people. The house would probably recollect the testimony which was given by Dr. McNevin before a Parliamentary committee in 1798. He was asked by a noble lord, who at that time held a pen in his hand, "Do the people of Ireland care the value of this pen, or the drop of ink which it contains, for Catholic emancipation?" His answer was, "No." Emmett, who was no mean authority in Ireland, in 1798, said, "I consider that the people of Ireland do not care a farthing for Catholic Emancipation; nor did they care more for reform, until they were told that it would lead to other objects, of which one was the abolition of tithes." Oliver Bond was examined at the same time. He said, in answer to a question which was proposed relative to the institution of the Society of United Irishmen,—"The Society of United Irishmen was instituted in 1791, for the purpose of obtaining reform; the question of Emancipation was a mere pretence." He was asked, "Do you think the mass of the people of Ireland care about reform?" His reply was, "No; but those who think for them do" (hear, hear). He believed that the case was much the same at the present day. The bill, if it were passed to-morrow, would not satisfy those persons who disinterestedly took upon themselves to think for the people of Ireland. Our whole constitution was a system of exclusion. Power was regulated in this country by age, sex, and property; and he thought we had as much right to look to opinion in the administration of our mixed constitution, as to age, sex, or property (cheers).

Mr. Horace Twiss said, that although the opposition to this bill had been rested mainly on the ground that the proposed alteration would be repugnant to the constitution, upon that remarkable theory of the hon. member for Corfe Castle, that this constitution was in its genius exclusive, yet the friends of the bill had hitherto taken little notice of this line of argument. But it would be to be regretted if the country should thence infer, that the advocates of concession had given way upon the main constitutional ground; and he would therefore solicit the attention of the house to a constitutional view of the question, which he believed had not been before presented, at least, not connectedly, or in its clearest light. In dealing with this, which was the material question remaining on the bill, he would narrow the issue to one single point of the exclusive law; and that issue could not be taken upon a point more convenient than the exclusion from Parliament; because that was the particular exclusion which the opposing party regarded as the strongest in principle for their argument; and if it should be practicable to make out the proposition that even this exclusion from Parliament was not of the essence of the constitution, it would hardly be pretended that there was any thing essential in the exclusion from any of the minor franchises. Though several enactments existed for a century before the Revolution, imposing severe penalties upon Popish recusants under certain circumstances, yet the only principle, regarding franchise or eligibility, that was known to the constitution down to Charles the Second's reign—a principle unqualified by any condition but the single one of acknowledging the political supremacy of our own Sovereign, to which the Catholics, for the most part, had never been averse, was the common law principle, as declared by Lord Bacon, that "the subject that is natural born hath a competency of ability to all benefits whatsoever." When the Parliament, therefore, in Charles the Second's reign, enacted the tests which this bill proposed to repeal, and which tests, with some little modification of the oath under William and Mary, were at this day the bars to the entrance of Catholics into Parliament, it was naturally thought requisite that a deviation so striking from the common law principle of general eligibility should be justified or at least explained to the people, by reasons set forth on the face of the statute. Now if these original reasons, which had been thoroughly valid and constitutional at the first, continued valid and constitutional still, then it might be true that exclusion was a principle of the constitution, and ought not to be superseded by such a bill as the present. But if those original reasons had expired—if all their spirit had evaporated with time—then either it must be shewn that other constitutional reasons had arisen since, which now supplied their place; or it must be allowed that, with the extinction of the constitutional reasons for exclusion, the exclusion itself had lost its constitutional character, and merited support no longer (hear, hear). The makers of this statute of Charles II., set forth in its preamble, "that the divers good laws then in being against Popery, had failed of their desired effects, by reason that Popish recusants had access to court, and liberty to sit and vote in Parliament." For the sake, therefore, of ensuring the desired effects, by the prevention of those two violations of the good laws against Popery, as also for safety against the danger with which the Popish Plot was then supposed to be threatening King Charles and his Government; for these two reasons—and these were all that even the statute alleged—the legislature proceeded, among other enactments, to provide for the exclusion of Catholics from the Parliament as well as from the court. This exclusion from Parliament, then, instead of having been what very many supposed it, a regulation of a substantive character, intended to form a new era and a permanent principle in our constitution, was in truth enacted in the humble, secondary character of a help to the desired effect of the divers good laws then pre-existing against Popery. Now what did gentlemen suppose those divers good laws against Popery were, which this especial help was thus introduced to havigorate? Something which we fondly clung to—which we religiously and affectionately revered? They were neither more nor less than the body of repealed pains and penalties (hear, hear)!—that body, which, after it had survived all the circumstances that perhaps in the 16th and 17th centuries might have justified its original creation, was decayed by time into disuse and disgust, and lay for years a lifeless lump in our legislation; when Parliament passed the Act of 1791, which buried the last remains of the nuisance, and removed it for ever from the nostrils of the people. That was the collection of divers good laws against Popery, which this preamble said, would fail of their desired effect, if Papists were not forbidden to sit and vote in Parliament! To preserve at this day, when Parliament had swept away the Code itself, a harsh restriction, which originally affected no higher character than that of an auxiliary to that code, would, at best, be an absurdity—even if it did not involve a wrong. But it was a wrong, and in nothing more notoriously than in this, that, while the original preamble to the restriction kept its place upon the statute book, setting forth, as its reason, a code of laws, now long since repealed and annulled, the restriction not only kept the birthright of our fellow-subjects from them, but kept it upon a false pretence. It was true, that the support of the divers good laws against Popery, was only one of the two motives alleged in this preamble; for it adverted to another, and at that time a much more influential motive, the danger, or rather the terror, of Popish plots. But grant that these plots justified exclusion: grant even that the plots were real; what mattered these things to the present generation, at a time when not only the conspirators with their conspiracies were crumbled into dust, but the government itself, for whose safety against them this statute professed to provide, had been re-modelled on a larger and surer foundation. The reasons assigned in the statute of Charles II. having thus entirely failed, the vindicator of the tests was driven to seek their constitutional title in such other reasons as might have arisen since. The principal of these ex post facto reasons was, that the exclusion had been settled at the time of the Revolution. It was an article, the Solicitor-General had said, in the compact of King William with the English leaders, in order to confirm the Protestant constitution of these realms. No; but in order to another object, doubtless very important while it lasted, but an object in its nature not quite so lasting—in order to confirm the new and not yet secure title of the Prince and Princess of Orange (hear, hear)—in order to provide, at a juncture when almost every Catholic was a partisan of James, a test which, in the Papist, should detect the Jacobite (hear, hear). For this, the real object, there was no need that these invidious disqualifications should be prolonged beyond the secure completion of the Royal settlement. But the moment any one approached this part of the case, he was straightway warned off as a sort of trespasser upon the constitution of 1688. Now, he would by no means speak loosely or lightly of any thing so enacted or sanctioned; all was done, he believed, for the best at that time; but the modern mistake about the constitution, as then arranged, consisted in not distinguishing between its permanent principles and its temporary expedients. The permanent principle of the constitution was, that every subject, whatever his station, should not only possess a perfect security for his person and property, but should likewise hold the greatest proportion of public rights, which it could consist with the general welfare, that he should be permitted to enjoy (much cheering); and every measure seemed to him to be consistent or inconsistent with the constitution, not as it tallied with any particular circumstances of 1825, or of 1688; but as it promoted, or impeded that great general principle (hear, hear). There might be exceptions, no doubt, to any political rule—exceptions of troubled periods, and exceptions as to dangerous individuals; but ought one million of people to be the rule, and five millions of people the exception? Ought the exception, as in Ireland, permanently to comprise five times as many cases as the rule? If that were the real result of the theory, if the doctrine established that disqualification was the common and general rule, and eligibility only the privileged and rare exception; if the argument thus construed the constitution to be the inheritance of only one man in every half-dozen, he ventured to retort upon that doctrine the charge of unconstitutional tendency, and to affirm that the breach of allegiance to the constitution was not with those who would communicate it, and promote its growth, but with those who would cramp and curtail it. He would show, however, that King William's principles were not chargeable with the inconsistencies imputed to them. It appeared, from the returns to Parliament, in 1731, that, in the earlier half of the last century, the whole Catholic population of Ireland was less than one million and one-third, and the number of Protestants between 7 and 800,000; and at the time of the Revolution, which was upwards of forty years before, the numbers were probably fewer. On a numeration so small, our ancestors might not unreasonably have considered that political dangers might justify the relative depression even of the majority of the whole people, when that majority exceeded the minority by only three or four hundred thousand persons. But if those founders of our constitution were alive at this day, to see the Catholics, with the other Dissenters, exceeding the Protestants of the Established Church by nearly five millions of souls, could it be thought, that in a state of facts so different, the law they would recommend would be the same? No; they would tell their country, according to the tenor of the principles upon which their great names were founded, that to a surface so extensive a narrow rule must be inapplicable; that political inequalities, however occasionally justifiable upon a small scale, became intolerable and impossible upon a larger one; and that the mere physical operation of things, the mere swelling of the stream of population, must hurry, of itself, irresistibly forward, to burst all those weak embankments, and lay waste the land which it should be forbidden to enrich. He listened, therefore, gladly when they referred him to their ancestors; he allowed and he admired the model; all he asked was, that they might avoid servility in studying it; that they might construe their code, not with a literal minuteness, but as its great authors would have written it had they been writing now; that they might no longer pore blindly upon the letter of their laws, but rise to the spirit of their legislation. Gentlemen who relied on the inviolability of all the anti-Catholic provisions that were arranged or acquiesced in at the time of the Revolution, might find themselves enmeshed into difficulties which a mischief-loving Papist would take not a little diversion to behold them struggling withal. The very first Parliament under King William most seriously enacted—ludicrous as such a provision might now appear—that two Justices of the peace, from time to time, might search a recusant Catholic's house and premises, to see if he possessed—arms? No. Treasonable papers? No. But to see if he possessed any horse of more than 5*l.* value; and moreover, that any friend of that Catholic assisting in the concealment of such unconstitutional Popish nag, should be liable, not only to pecuniary penalties, but also to three months' imprisonment. Now, on the principles of some gentlemen, this law, for the exclusion of Papists from the turf, was just as rightfully an unalterable feature of the constitution, though a feature not quite so prominent, as the law for the exclusion of Papists from Parliament: nay, if there were any difference in point of authority between the two, the horse law had rather the higher pretension, because it originated under King William himself, in the very year of our great Revolution. In 1791, the Parliament revoked the power of the magistracy to tender the Test, and thereby virtually abrogated also the penal enactments upon the horse-owner who should refuse to take it. We had hitherto supposed that they had done that very judiciously; but from the argument now under consideration, which he did not see how the hon. member for Corfe Castle could help adopting, who made exclusion his hobby, it should seem that Parliament made no small mistake, in thereby dismantling one of the bulwarks of the constitution; that it would have been happier, if, in 1791, some cautious patriot had whispered his too easy country, that she should keep the "equo ne credita" more steadfastly in view—that she was bound by her constitution to preserve all her establishments exclusively Protestant, down even to her very racks and mangers. It was now, he feared, too late. The stable-door had been imprudently thrown open to the insidious Pope; and though we had him still debarred from the mansion house, he was nestled irremovably in the hay-loft (laughter and cheers). If, then, there was no general immunity for all the laws left standing by King William's Parliaments, was there any thing about this statute of Charles the Second, in particular, to distinguish it from its contemporary laws, and endow it with a special charter of unalterability?—It had been already altered, time after time. First, by the statute of William and Mary, which had re-moulded the section prescribing the oath; a second time, by a statute of George II., which had repealed the material section, requiring tests from the royal household; a third time, by the 31st of Geo. III., which had repealed the still more important section, whereby Papists were excluded from court; so that there had actually, by this time, been more taken away than left standing of that great constitutional protection, which we were still told it would be destruction to us to break in upon, or even to touch. Gentlemen however, imagined they had entrenched themselves on a still stronger ground of constitutional principle, when they argued that the reasons assigned for this bill would lead to the extent of releasing our sovereigns, as well as our parliaments, from any test of their Protestant faith. The reason why they might exclude a Catholic from the throne, consistently with their admitting him into Parliament, was this:—that though the essentially Protestant principle of the constitution would not be affected in any assignable degree by the admission of half a score Catholics into a body of several hundred Protestants, yet that Protestant principle would be not merely endangered, but absolutely destroyed, if they were to fill the supreme place, which in its nature only a single individual could fill, with an individual who should not be Protestant. One Catholic would change the whole character of the Crown; while fifty Catholics no more make any change in the character of the Parliament, than fifty admirals or colonels would convert it into a council of war. That, in one word, was the reason why no inconsistency was chargeable on the proposal of admitting a few Catholics into a Protestant Parliament, which would equally continue to be Protestant still, and yet excluding any Catholic from that Protestant throne, which his single accession would render Protestant no longer (hear, hear). He was bound to admit that if Catholics were really dangerous subjects at this day, little argument of a constitutional tenour could be raised for admitting them into the legislature, from the mere fact, that in other and dissimilar times the charter of our liberties was won by Catholics: just as on the other hand he was entitled to insist, that if the Catholic of this day was not a dangerous subject, the misdeeds of his ancestors in certain dark and distant ages, afforded no constitutional plea for his disfranchisement now (hear, hear). But at all events it would be fair to say, apply your measure equally—if you visit upon the Catholic the sins of his fathers, beyond even the third or fourth generation, do not debar him from his interest in his father's deservings (hear, hear). When the striking fact was first pointed out, that of the baronies, by whose lords Magna Charta was acquired from King John, the only four now extant as baronies were in the tenure of Catholic peers; that fact was appealed to, less in the way of strict argument than as matter of feeling. But it did become a question of argument, whether they should tell one vast body of the people, that, in their entire case, the constitution had for ever repealed that great law of nature and of civilised society, which had made the merits of the parent a transmissible inheritance to his children—if you were thus to tell them, that while the state expected the services of all her subjects, her constitution had cut off one of the strongest of human inducements to serve her (hear, hear). What zeal would have been felt for our liberties by those Howards, and Talbots, and Arundels, and Cliffords, who won not only our original charter under John, but its repeated confirmations and enlargements in subsequent reigns—with what heart would they have risked, as they did, their lands and their lives, to lay the first ground-stones of that constitution, beneath whose shelter it was our pride to dwell, if they had dreamed that a time was to come, when their posterity, and the posterity of Catholics like themselves, must be shut out, without an accuser, without a crime, without even a surviving suspicion, from the threshold of its protection and its privilege (repeated cheering)? If, then, all the ancient reasons for restriction were thus extinct, as well those which operated in earlier times, as those which had been assigned in the statute of Charles II., and in the arrangements of the Revolution, inasmuch that the law of exclusion could stand no longer upon them, but must rest, if at all, upon other reasons of a more modern necessity, then he presumed to say, that upon principle the supporters of the tests were now precisely in the same situation in which they would be, if, with the expiration of the old reasons, the old law itself had expired also, and they were now introducing a bill to renew them for a further term. He had listened in vain for any suggestion of danger or inconvenience from the abrogation of the tests. He was not, indeed, surprised that no such suggestion had been offered; for, indeed, what appropriate ground—nay, what plausible topic, even of those which once and long were popular, would the proposer of a renewal of them be now in a condition to dilate upon? There survived no such aspirant. The ambition of an over-reaching Pontiff—the dim reflection of her classic antiquity, was all the lustre that now remained to Rome. As to the project, long imputed to the Catholics, for recovering the forfeited estates, he would not ask the house to disbelieve the imputation, because the Catholics themselves denied the design; nor because the obliterating hand of time had made that design impracticable, by effacing four-fifths of the forfeited titles—but because the leading classes of the Catholics themselves had become extensively the purchasers of the forfeited lands (hear, hear). Would the renovator of the tests then enlarge upon the probable numbers of the Catholics in Parliament, and the influence which those numbers would carry with them? Those numbers, and that influence, would stand in about the proportion which one bears to sixty-five or seventy. But his hon. friend, the Under-Secretary (Mr. Dawson) had expressed his apprehension, that a legislature chequered with Catholics, would follow the ancient example of Tyrconnell's Popish Parliament; a Parliament which his hon. friend had described indeed to be so very Popish, that it contained only eight Protestants in the House of Commons, and not more than ten in the House of Peers. But bigotted as they were, at all events they did not exclude those few Protestants for the difference of their religious faith (hear, hear). And when that Catholic majority upheld and advanced its own Catholic faith, unheeding and unchecked by the handful of Protestants, the inference forced itself upon him, that in like manner a Protestant Parliament now, would be very little impeded in the maintenance of its Protestant faith, by a similar admixture of Catholics (much cheering). But his hon. friend dreaded the insincerity of that religion; and the persecuting spirit which he supposed peculiar to the Catholic religion. Persecution, however, was not more peculiar to the Catholic than to most other of the many religions which in different ages had been what was called established—that is, connected with the ruling powers of the state (hear, hear). Take, for example, the persecutions upon the two main questions which those very tests involved—the nature of the Lord's Supper, and the supremacy of the Pope. Henry the Eighth persecuted furiously for the Catholic opinions respecting the nature of the sacrament: that would be attributed to his breeding up in Popery. But he persecuted just as furiously against the supremacy of the Pope: was it Popery that prompted him to that? Bishop Bonner committed his murders on behalf of the Catholic faith; and it would be said that Popery spurred him on; but was it Popery too that led Craumer to burn men alive for the Protestant faith (hear, hear)? Or when Trajan set the aqueducts of pagan Rome afloat in Christian blood, was there any Pope in the plot, with Apollo and with Jupiter (hear, hear)? The danger of the recurrence of persecution had passed away for ever (hear, hear). Persecution was endured in other days, from the same ignorance on the part of the people, as to their own just rights and physical powers, which induced them to put up with its kindred evil, political oppression; but if a new Henry, a new Mary, or a new Elizabeth, were to arise in these days, we should no more allow them to give their bishops commissions for burning us, than we should let them arm their privy councils with arbitrary powers to imprison and fine us. But there were some who, not fearing much in our days from the faggot or the rack, were yet unrecovered from the apprehensions excited by the associations in Ireland, and were now induced to withhold their support, lest the house should seem to have been frightened into a vote. If, after the angry demonstrations of those bodies, the house had hurried them, for the first time, to a vote of concession, there might have been some colour for the imputation of timidity; but bearing in mind, that bill after bill for the relief of the Catholics had passed this house in this very Parliament, and failed only in another stage, he would put it individually to every member of those majorities which had hitherto carried the question through this house, which course would afford to his constituents and to the world the better assurance of his firmness, that he should maintain his consistency by his unaltered vote, or that, in an excess of panic, he should retract and upset the mature resolves of years (hear, hear)? Before gentlemen, who had previously supported this measure, should resolve to abandon it now rather than risk the imputation of fear, he begged them to consider whether, if there were such a thing as being frightened into a vote, there might not also be such a thing as being frightened out of it? He begged them to consider whether their credit for courage would stand much higher, if they should be called on to make their election, and act, at the time—as come that time must, if ever war should break out again—when Ireland, arming in the general excitement, should hold her weapons ready to be guided, as the policy of England should guide them, either for our defence, or, which God avert, for our dismemberment (loud cheering). England would relieve her then, and better then than never. But he would have no man flatter himself with the delusion, that the concessions which he might subscribe with a drawn sword at his throat would ever be set down as the result of any very fearless, philosophical deliberation on his part (repeated cheers). Besides the associations themselves, the source of the fear had ceased to exist. Ireland, the quarter of the empire most largely and directly to be affected by the proposed concessions, had for some time past been so free from her wonted disturbance and distress, that in the annual balance of our affairs, that kingdom had this year, for the first time, he believed, within the memory of man, been carried to the credit side of the public account. Even if the Catholic religion had been, as some alleged, too often made the cloak of dangerous designs against the state, a cloak which they were resolved they would not encourage any subject of this realm to wear—could they believe, after the experience of so many unhappy years, that their's was a policy which would be likely to induce him to cast that cloak aside? The very fables of childhood would teach a sounder wisdom. They would tell how the wayfaring man, who, when assailed by the tempest, gathered the folds of his garment but the more closely about him, relaxed before the kindly influences of a gentler sun, and opened his bosom to its warmth (much cheering). No doubt concession had been made to a great extent—that was precisely his argument—and the larger the boons which parliament had granted, and the oftener parliament had granted them, the more it made for his case. For, wherefore had they granted so much to the Catholics? Not, of course, from fear; not, undoubtedly, from favour; but because on each single occasion, when, as trustees of the public safety, parliament had felt themselves justified in sanctioning some fresh concession in the series, the circumstances upon which they acted, the visible effects of previous boons upon the behaviour of the Catholics, had been such as to satisfy reasonable men that each new concession respectively would be free from danger to the public weal; so that each of the consecutive relaxations, instead of being an argument against more, had, in truth, been a successful experiment; showing how completely the welfare of the state might consist with even a progressive concession (hear, hear). He trusted he had now made out the proposition with which he began, that the constitution to which gentlemen had appealed was not of the exclusive character which they would impute to it; that the dangers which might once have existed as constitutional reasons for exclusion were altogether at an end; and that no others had arisen since to supply their place. And these considerations had the greater force, because, even if the Catholics were proved to entertain any, or all of the objects which had often been imputed to them, no man had yet uttered one single syllable to show in what manner the proposed relaxation would assist in advancing their energies (hear, hear). Nay, on the contrary, it should seem that parliament would be diminishing the power of the Catholics by removing the sympathy with their wrongs (hear, hear). The preamble of the statute of 1 Edw. 6, c. 12, after reciting that "Rebellion and insurrection, and such mischiefs, had made it necessary to enact laws which might appear to men of exterior realms"—for even then it was that foreigners had their eyes on our religious dissensions—"and many of the King's subjects, very strait, sore, extreme, and terrible, although they were then, when they were made, not without great consideration and policy, moved and established, and for the time very expedient and necessary"— concluded, as he would do, in the following words:—"But, as in tempest or winter one course and garment is convenient, in calm or warm weather a more liberal case or lighter garment, both may and ought to be followed and used; so we have seen divers strait and sore laws made in one parliament, the time so requiring, in a more calm and quiet reign of another Prince, by the like authority and parliament, repealed and taken away: the which most high clemency and royal example the King's highness willing to follow, is contented and pleased that the severity of certain laws be mitigated and remitted, upon trust that his subjects will not abuse the same, but rather be encouraged thereby more faithfully, and with more diligence (if it may be) and care for his Majesty to serve his highness" (repeated cheering).

Mr. Hart Davis contended that the constitution of England being essentially Protestant, no concession of power should be made to the Roman Catholics beyond that which they possessed at the present moment. He was the less disposed to consent to any further concession, because he had no guarantee that the Catholics would be more satisfied with those now proposed, than they were with what they had already obtained. Was it, he would ask, decent or just to the Sovereign of the country, that he must be Protestant, while at the same time he might be surrounded by Catholic councillors? He was not disposed to trust the Catholics. He had no confidence in the professors of that religion; for he believed, that if they got what they now sought, they would endeavour to become equal in the state to the Protestants, and when they obtained that, they would strive for the superiority.

Mr. C. Grant said, this question had been always argued on the broad basis of a general measure, but he regarded it as essentially an Irish question; and viewing it in that light, he would ask, "Reject this measure, and how will you deal with Ireland?" (loud cheers)? Whoever regarded the intense expectation which had been excited, the profound and universal national interest which had been awakened, must have a mind of peculiar fortitude to look at the question in any other light than as affecting the peace of Ireland. To this part of the subject, often as it had been adverted to, he had never heard a rational answer. Some hon. members seemed to think that a partial concession, that the eligibility of a few Catholic barristers to the honour of a silk gown, would secure the tranquillity of that country, but when they had to deal with six millions of people, seeking for the restoration of their civil rights, it was a mockery to rest upon a point of this kind. The supporters of the bill took their ground on the broad constitutional principle, that every man should be admitted to an eligibility to that rank and office which he might claim as a British subject. As long as the present exclusive system lasted, no firm reliance could be placed on the duration of the tranquillity of Ireland. But some hon. gentlemen founded their objections to an alteration of the existing system on the very evils which it had produced. It was said, that the Irish people were not contented--that they would never become so under any modification of the laws. He would ask those hon. members, had they ever attempted to make them contented (hear, hear)? Had they conciliated the affections of that generous and warm-hearted people (cheers)? The simple state of Ireland was superior to a thousand arguments. They passed penal statutes against the Irish Catholics until they made them lawless and insurrectionary almost by nature; but what one act had they done to render them contented (hear, hear)? It had been said by some, that it would be cruel to have the King alone deprived of all freedom of conscience, whilst he was surrounded by Catholic councillors; admitting this to be an anomaly, he would ask whether the anomaly was the result of this measure? Did it not at present exist? Was not the King prevented from becoming a Presbyterian, although he might be surrounded in his court by ministers of that persuasion, or by believers in no religion at all (hear, hear)? Many objections had been taken to this measure, on the ground of its recognition of the spiritual power of the Pope; but was not this power most substantially recognized at Maynooth—an institution endowed by a Protestant state, of which Catholic visitors regulated all the bye laws affecting the doctrines and discipline of the Church of Rome (hear, hear)? It was said, that after the passing of this bill no conscientious Protestant could swear hereafter that the Pope had no "spiritual authority within these realms;" but was there any man, who, at his entrance into that house, took that oath, and did not at the same time believe that the Pope did possess such a power (hear, hear)? The great misconception under which they had hitherto laboured, in the proceedings towards Ireland, was, that they forgot the moral influence of laws; the parliament forgot that they were legislating for a warm and affectionate people, who were much more likely to be influenced by kindness than coercion (hear, hear), and until they admitted the principle of conciliation to its fullest extent, it was vain to hope for any thing like tranquillity in Ireland (cheers). When enlightened foreigners contrasted the policy of England with other countries—when they were desirous of pointing out the want of wisdom, the want of liberality, the want of a power to accommodate itself to the growing intelligence of the age, they pointed triumphantly to Ireland, and then told us not to speak of English magnanimity (cheers). Was not this an additional reason for removing speedily this foul stain from the national character (hear, hear)? Whether they consulted the security of Ireland, or the glory of England, it became now ten times more incumbent on them to emancipate—not Ireland, but to emancipate the English people and the English legislature from the disgraceful bonds in which for so many years they have been enchained (cheers). It had been argued that this measure would not affect the great mass of the people, because the lowest individual could not attain the highest offices in the state; but one of the soundest maxims in the constitution was, that the most exalted office was open to the humblest individual; and it was to maxims of this description that those workings of conscious merit, struggling against, and surmounting the difficulties that surrounded it, could be traced, which exertions had made this country what it was: it was that unabated and encouraged ardour diffusing itself through all the ramifications of society, that had raised England to her present unrivalled greatness—

"Spiritus intus alit, totamque infusa per artus
 "Mens agitat molem, et magno se corpore miscet."

(cheers). He should take the opportunity of offering to the house his humble testimony with respect to the great body of the Irish Catholics—a testimony founded on the experience which he had acquired, when in the exercise of official duty in that country. When he first entered on that duty, he had felt strongly on the situation in which the law placed that body of the King's subjects. He was then told by those who differed from him, that greater experience, and a personal acquaintance with the local circumstances of Ireland, would correct the warmth of his enthusiasm. He did not deny that these observations had their effect—they made him at least ready to give a reception to every argument that could be advanced in their support. They produced in his mind a determined impartiality on that great question; and he could now assure that house, that his further official experience, instead of shaking his original impressions, more deeply confirmed them (cheers). There existed in that country no common point of intercourse between the Government and the people—no illustration of that habitual, he would say instinctive fellow-feeling, which so marked the character of England, which vibrated from one extremity of the land to the other, which was felt

"—At each thread, and lived along the line."

The great mass of the people of Ireland moved in an orbit of its own; it presented the dark surface to the view of the Government (hear, hear). A mass thus circumstanced would be, to use the language of Mr. Burke, formidable from the "activity of its inertness." But in Ireland, that great body, in place of being inert, was quite alive—it was full of moral and physical influence. And it was in such a mass that the severity of the law had sown the seeds of discontent which it was still considered by some, expedient to nourish and treasure up. True it was that the great portion of that penal code had been repealed, but there was still a remnant which, though useless as to security, was potent for insult and degradation (hear, hear). He could not but feel that such a system of policy had in Ireland discovered six millions of the people from all sympathy with the aristocracy, from the influence of property, and substituted for those natural holds on popular affection, an influence either of the priesthood, which, when duly qualified, was salutary, but which, under certain circumstances, might become noxious, or transferred their guidance to the dark plottings of the midnight incendiary, who, by working on their passions, aggravating their grievances, and appealing to their love of enterprise, too often and too fatally led them to exercise, with their own hands, a rude and vague justice on the laws themselves (hear, hear). In every period, since the communion of this country with Ireland it had been a maxim with some statesmen that the Irish were not fitted for the British constitution. Undoubtedly that maxim, by being too pertinaciously adverted to, had worked out its own necessity—for it was a question of notoriety, that as it affected Ireland, the Constitution was always, he might say, in a paroxysm. It was unjust to impute to Catholics—that, as Catholics, they were incapable of all those great and patriotic attachments, which were the objects of general admiration and respect. The history of France furnished an example in disproof of such an imputation. When Henry the Fourth was opposed by the Duke of Guise, to whose party all the atrocities which disgraced that period were to be attributed, the Catholic nobility of France—the chivalrous portion of that body—attached themselves to the standard of that Protestant Prince, because, as the historians of that period had observed, they believed him to be the Sovereign, destined by Providence to ascend that throne. Thuanus, in his preface addressed to Henry the Fourth, had made some observations most descriptive of all those calamities to which a country, torn by religious dissensions, was subjected:—"Nempe ad cetera quibus hoc infestum virtuti sæculum scatet mala, religionis dissidium accessit, quod jam too pœne sæculo orbem Christianum continuis motibus vexat et deinceps vexabit, nisi tempestiva remedia, atque adeo alia quam quæ hactenus adhibita sunt, ab iis, quorum præcipue interest, adhibeantur. Nam experientiâ satis edocti sumus, ferrum, flammæ, exilia, proscriptiões, irritasse potius quam sanasse morbum menti inhaerentem (cheers): ad quem proinde curandum, non iis quæ in corpus tantum penetrant, sed doctrinâ et sedulâ institutione, quæ in animum lenitèr instillata descendit, opus est." Before he concluded he was anxious to guard himself against the imputation of being considered, because he advocated the cause of six millions of Catholics, indifferent to the religion which he himself most conscientiously professed. For that religion he felt, he sincerely hoped, as warmly as any man who heard him (hear, hear). He detested the doctrine that men were proportionally liberal towards other forms of faith as they were sceptical in regard to their own. Actuated by a far different conviction, he supported liberality towards the Catholics, because he felt that the unassailable purity of the Protestant belief allowed him with safety to open the porch of the constitution to any other clam of fellow Christians (hear, hear). No man could now doubt that this measure must eventually pass. It might be delayed unhappily a year or two, but pass it would. He saw that result in the progress of public opinion, in the enlightened charity which all classes of the community were feeling towards each other—he saw it in the attention which the state of Ireland had attracted from the Legislature, and, above all, in the light which, as it affected Ireland, had broken in upon the country by a thousand avenues (hear, hear). How was it possible, when all the other impediments to national greatness and increased prosperity were removed, that such causes of disunion and heart-burning could remain (hear, hear)? Disappear eventually they must; and if so, why not crown the great arrangement, by making that which was inevitable, now acceptable (cheers).

The Solicitor-General contrasted the extemporaneous evidence of Dr. Doyle with the deliberate writings of that individual under the signature of J.K.L., and stated, that with all the respect that he felt for a Catholic bishop, he could not believe him as a witness, when he heard him uttering sentiments directly in the teeth of all that he had written. The three measures of Catholic Emancipation, of the elective franchise bill, and of the proposed establishment for the Catholic clergy, were so blended together, that he could not oppose the first without saying a few words in condemnation of the other measure. With regard to the Elective Franchise bill, he would declare that it was one of the most unconstitutional measures he had ever heard of. The defenders of it said that it was made an adjunct to the Catholic Relief bill, in order to conciliate Ireland. To conciliate Ireland? Was the emancipation of the patrician and equestrian orders of Ireland from the disabilities under which they laboured, calculated to reconcile the general mass of its population to the loss of one of its best and dearest privileges? He would ask the hon. bart. who had brought forward the measure now under discussion, whether he would consent, for any measure which would benefit the splendid shopkeepers of Bond-street, to disfranchise the baker, the butcher, the chimney-sweeper, et hoc genus omne, who lived, as the hon. bart. must know, in the blind alleys and dark lanes of Westminster (hear, hear)? It was stated that the Elective Franchise bill was rendered necessary by the splitting of freeholds which took place in Ireland; but was Ireland the only part of the country where such practices took place? Had the hon. baronet never heard of such practices at Brestford? What was the value of the Isleworth mill from which so many forty shilling voters were driven up to vote for the hon. baronet? True it was that such a system might be productive of much fraud and perjury: but it was not on account of religion, it was not on account of the amelioration it would produce among the mass of the people, that it was required to disfranchise the forty shilling freeholders, but on account of the political advantages which the passing of the other bill would bestow on the higher ranks of the Catholics. The character which he would give to the Elective Franchise bill was contained in two words—it was magnum latrocinium (hear, hear). For instance, he could imagine a meeting between Mr. O'Connell, and one of the unfortunate disfranchised forty shilling freeholders, in which the latter might say, "Well, Mr. O'Connell, and what have you got?" "Oh," the answer would be, "I have got a silk gown, and a seat in Parliament." "Ah! that's very well indeed for you; but what have we got?" "You! Why, while we have got well robed, you have got well robbed" (a loud laugh)! He for one would never consent to give privileges to one class of men, and uno flatu to take them from another. A more unconstitutional measure had never been attempted since the grand forfeiture of the charters before the revolution (hear, hear). He could find no case in our annals which formed a parallel to the present. No borough had ever yet been disfranchised without due investigation of the charges brought against it, and without a considerable mass of evidence being taken upon oath to substantiate them; and yet the house was now precipitately going to disfranchise half the voters of Ireland upon evidence of the most conflicting and unsatisfactory nature, without having got any two individuals whom it had examined to agree, as to the qualification which the freeholders of Ireland were hereafter to possess. He would now proceed to the resolution relative to the proposed remuneration of the Catholic clergy. By that resolution they had determined to establish a Papal church, armed with all the jurisdiction belonging to Papacy (hear, hear). He thought that the house could not be aware how extensive, how intolerable that jurisdiction was. Were hon. gentlemen aware that the rite of baptism, the rite of marriage, the rite of sacrament, the rite of entering the church, that of confirmation, that of receiving charity, and that of burial, were all spiritual rites which could be withheld or not, according to the will of the clergy? Connected with this subject was the form of oath to be taken by the Catholic bishops of Ireland. Why did these bishops refuse to take the same oath as was taken by the Catholic bishops of Spain? The bishops of that country admitted the supremacy of the sovereign in the oath which they took on their investiture; for in their oath was this clause, "salvis regalibus, et usitatis consuetudinibus et tota subjectione domini Ferdinandi." Why could not the bishops of Ireland swear with a similar salvo? He complained that there had been a considerable doctoring with the oath to be taken by these prelates. It was different in the bill of 1816, in the bill of 1821, and again in the present bill. He could not say that the present form of it was auctior than it had previously been, because it was shorter; nor emendatior, because it was less correct. The learned gentleman went on to describe the jealousy with which the French government watched the conduct and correspondence of a Nuncio resident within their territory, and the regulations by which they secured to the chief officers of government the inspection of his communications from and to Rome, as well after his departure as during his stay. Such was the caution used in a Catholic state in admitting any emissaries or delegates from that dangerous power, a state, too, which took care previously to secure itself as much as possible by retaining for the crown of France, against all the Papal pretensions, the right of nominating its own bishops. There was no Catholic state in Europe—not even Spain, where the abominable tribunal of the inquisition prevailed—that did not show something of a corresponding jealousy, in its regulations of the intercourse between the clergy and the see of Rome—that did not compel by some means a recognition of the right of the Government to keep the ecclesiastics in submission to the secular power. The term securities was ridiculous in its application to the present vague law. What security could there be in a commission of Popish bishops, empowered to inspect all communications from Rome, and report thereon to the Privy council? What security would there be for abuses in the treasury, if instead of those continual checks put upon the financial administration by the house and its members, the Chancellor of the Exchequer could prevail upon Parliament to appoint a commission, composed of four Lords of the Treasury? Would not the constituents of the hon. baronet twit him with the fallacy, if he were to propose no better securities for the administration of the money of the nation? Yet such was his provision for the protection of the national religion. He would not reason gravely upon the securities. A great man would be ashamed to throw away the powder and shot of a good argument upon so wretched a position (laughter). These were not the penalties provided by Mr. Grattan, illustrious alike for his enlightened views and his patriotism, nor by his learned friend the Attorney-General for Ireland. Their bills proceeded on the principle, that the state must have the opportunity of viewing all documents coming from that quarter, and the power of inspection was given to the great officers of state accordingly. He compared the adjuncts of the bill to wings, by which it had promised to make an Icarian flight. And yet, for all its wings, he could not help thinking that down it must come. It was said that circumstances were so altered that Popery was no longer dangerous—that the atrocities charged against it were taken from the iron ages of superstition and violence. They were, therefore, to look at its present state, green and fresh as it appeared. In several bulls and other instruments of the Pope, of recent date, Bible Societies were denounced, and the reading of the Scriptures forbidden. Parliament never could vote money for the purpose of bending down six millions of people in a degrading slavery to a spiritual thralldom, which assumed the power of excommunication and eternal perdition, if its victims were only to venture to read the word of God, or to offer up their prayers to him without leave first obtained of a priest. He concluded by moving an amendment, "that the bill be read a third time that day six months."

Mr. Huskisson thought that the argument had run too much upon the question of establishing a Roman Catholic church, instead of the question of tolerating one which was established. With their spiritual tenets and doctrines he had nothing to do. In the practices and intentions of the Romish hierarchy he could see nothing to dread, were they even wickedly inclined. He owed it to justice to vote for the removal of every enactment against the Catholics, or any other body of men who remained exposed to pains and disabilities long after the evils and dangers anticipated by those enactments had ceased. To withhold their rights was to keep alive divisions, to increase the dangers, to retard the prosperity of the country in times of peace, to distract our energies in war, when they ought to be combined against the common enemy. He considered the opposition to the adjuncts of the bill as of very little weight, because they came before the house rather as matters of detail, and all arguments on the principle had been long ago set at rest for ever. The practical view of the measure was with respect to Ireland. Apart from Ireland, however cogent the arguments and claims of the Roman Catholics and their advocates, they were comparatively unimportant. In Ireland they had to contend with all the difficulty of a divided establishment. With an evil of this magnitude still increasing among them, they ought to think of a remedy. Could they hope to convert the Roman Catholics? The speculation was too idle to discuss. He trusted much to the diffusion of wealth and intelligence among the Irish. But they must not expect that the Catholics would ever cease in their attempts until they had acquired their rights. What then was left but to remove the causes of discontent? The gallant member for Westmeath, who knew the value of 10,000 additional troops in preserving the peace of Ireland, and from his professional habits was not likely to be too easily alarmed, was of opinion that Catholic Emancipation would do more to tranquillize Ireland than 10,000 additional force. In consequence of these restrictions on the Roman Catholics, Ireland suffered the loss of all the benefit that might under other circumstances be derived from the employment of millions of English capital (hear, hear). The Catholics came before Parliament as supplicants for admission to a participation of all those civil rights and privileges which were enjoyed by all other classes of the King's subjects; in this application they were backed by a large portion of the intelligence and influence of the Protestant community, both in England and Ireland, and it was the circumstance of their being so supported that made further denial of those claims highly dangerous. There seemed to be some hon. gentlemen who supposed that the Roman Catholic's perpetual meditation was how he might most effectually plan the overthrow of the Protestant establishment. The Roman Catholics were at this moment asking only to be admitted within the pale of a Protestant political society. Could it, then, be imagined, that the moment they should succeed their exertions would be turned to the destruction of that society (hear, hear)? Unless, therefore, the house could suppose the Roman Catholics to be the most foolish, as well as the most wicked people in the world, it could not entertain fears of this description. The chief ground of his rt. hon. friend (Mr. Peel's) objections was, that a Roman Catholic would be a dangerous adviser in the councils of a Protestant King. He (Mr. H.) could not apprehend that a Roman Catholic, as such, could be thus dangerous in such a situation; for if he could bring himself to plan the removal of the Protestant king, recognized by the constitution, or even the downfall of the Protestant Church, of which that king was the recognized head, he must have previously made such a sacrifice of his judgment to his zeal—he must be a bigot of so prostrated an intellect as had never before aspired to power. But, let his talents be ever so great, they would always be to be measured by the ability, and wisdom contained in that house (hear, hear). He warned the house, that if they did not at once proceed to do away with those unjust restrictions, and to repress these childish and unfounded prejudices, they would have, over and over again, to deal with assemblies in Ireland of as formidable a description as the late Catholic Association (hear, hear). The hon. member for Durham had rather reflected upon the way in which he conceived that the two bills, which he called the two wings, had been treated and prepared in the preliminary stages of their progress, prior to their being brought up before the house. But he begged to say, on the part both of himself and of his rt. hon. friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, that neither of them knew any thing of the bills in question, till the notice of the hon. member for Stafford and the noble lord (Gower). For his own part, he believed that both bills were intended to aid the great measure of Catholic Emancipation. As to the bill for disfranchising the forty-shilling freeholders, he could not say that he altogether approved of its principles. In voting for the other, he had intended to give it his sanction only up to this point and to this extent—that as this house held the public purse, and was bound to provide for the expenses of the public service, so he should hold it was bound to provide for the effectual operation and results of a measure which, by aiding Catholic Emancipation, would be calculated to produce such incalculable benefit to the community, over which the parties in question might fairly be supposed to exercise so extensive an influence. But when his rt. hon. friend (Mr. Peel) talked about the making provision for a regular establishment for archbishops and bishops, and an inferior clergy, as a concomitant to the bill for Roman Catholic Emancipation, he (Mr. H.) begged to say that he contemplated no such provision whatever. He thought, indeed, that it would require much previous inquiry and consideration, before they could proceed to make any provision for the Catholic clergy by law. To the bill now before the house he gave his most cordial support.

Mr. Peel merely wished to take this opportunity of re-stating, that the opinions he had formerly held on this matter remained still unaltered. He could not concur with those who thought that no further concessions whatever ought to be made to the Catholics; he had distinctly declared his opinion that in all respects the Roman Catholics of England should be put on the same footing as those of Ireland. But he was still of opinion, that it was for the permanent interest of this country that the legislature and the chief executive offices of the state should be confined, as they were at present confined by law, to those who protested against the doctrine of the church of Rome. When he saw in what manner religion, and especially that religion, had influenced all the civil contents that had taken place in this country—how intimately religious feeling had been connected with all the great feuds recorded in our history and that of Scotland and Ireland—how mainly it had influenced the two great events of the Reformation and the Revolution, he could not but feel, that the desire to extend their own creed would ever be a leading motive with every class of its professors. When he looked at the numbers of the Roman Catholics, and at the circumstances under which the transfer of church property to Protestant hands took place at the Revolution, he could not feel satisfied that it was expedient to remove those barriers which he thought much better calculated to protect the Protestant ascendancy in this country than the ecclesiastical securities which it was now proposed to substitute for them. The exclusion of the Roman Catholics was coeval with the Reformation. In the 5th of Elizabeth it would be found that every knight, burgess, &c. before he could sit in that house, was obliged to take a certain oath, which if his learned friend (Mr. Twiss) would be content to administer, instead of the test or abjuration oath, he (Mr. P.) would be quite satisfied (a laugh). The learned gent. had quoted the preamble of an act which was passed in the reign of Edward VI.; the language of which he considered to be very beautiful and impressive:—"But as in tempest or storm one vest is convenient; in better or milder weather a lighter and more liberal garment, both may and ought to be used," &c. Now he (Mr. P.) being anxious to ascertain what was the "light and liberal garment" used in the reign of Edward VI. in respect of these matters, had found, on perusing the act, that it was one under which, for the very speech that learned gent. had this night delivered he would have been put to death (laughter, and cries of hear). "If any person shall by any writing, word, deed, or act deny the King's supremacy—then he and all his aiders, abettors, and comforters"

—that would be the learned member and all the gentlemen disposed to support him (laughter)—"should incur and suffer the penalty of death," &c. His apprehensions of danger from the removal of the existing barriers against the Roman Catholic religion were in no degree weakened by the vote to which the house had come—that it was "fit and expedient" to make provision for the Roman Catholic clergy; though he would not say but that it might be necessary hereafter to consider of the propriety of making some sort of provision for this class of persons. Without at all disguising from himself the difficulty of the two only alternatives which they were told the house had to choose between on the present occasion, he thought there was yet another plan to be proposed, which ought, at least, to give no dissatisfaction to the parties it applied to. If the legislature and the chief executive offices in the Protestant Government, as settled by the Bill of Rights, were left solely to Protestants, and all others opened to the Roman Catholics, he could not see that the latter would have a right to complain of such an arrangement, nor did he believe that it would lead to any of those invidious distinctions which he admitted had existence in Ireland, or those irritating processions that could not be enough condemned. That the Parliament was on this great measure placed in a situation of difficulty he did not deny; but that difficulty was in no slight degree attributable to the course which had been hitherto taken in that house on the subject, and by which the hopes of the Roman Catholics must necessarily have been raised very high. He had, however, not been instrumental in exciting or encouraging any false hopes in the minds of the Roman Catholics; and he therefore, perhaps for the last time, should now, by his vote, attest his uncompromising opposition to this bill, which proposed to grant them all that they claimed.

Mr. Brougham: The right hon. gent. still apprehended danger, it seemed, to the Protestant Establishment both in church and state, if the Roman Catholics were to be allowed access to office. The same alarm on the same account was experienced in England 120 years ago. But as no harm had happened notwithstanding, he had a right to anticipate that 120 years hence our posterity would laugh at our fears, as we now did at those of our ancestors. When the Scottish Union was to introduce into the House of Lords sixteen Presbyterian peers at once, the Bishop of Bath, the venerable predecessor of one of the most vehement opponents of the Catholic claims at this day, earnestly besought the Lords to consider that they were, by such admission of the Presbyterian peers, exposing themselves to a danger, the greatness of which no tongue could speak (a laugh). He had heard a great deal about the Jesuits of the church of Rome; and on that and on former occasions they had been flourished in the faces of gentlemen to deter the house, if possible, from having any communion with them. But what would they say to a Protestant bishop—one of the flowers of episcopacy—not a friend to the Catholic cause, but one who agreed perfectly with the right hon. gent.—a man, however, of great learning and research—what would they think of such an individual, if, when you signed the thirty-nine articles, he said—he, he it observed, hating Jesuitism—

"Though you sign the thirty-nine articles, you do not agree with them separately; but in the lump you admit of their propriety. Your belief with respect to some of them is an overflow—with reference to others, it is an ebb tide; and so far as certain other points are concerned, it is nearly a spring tide. You therefore can make a sort of average statement of your belief, and you may take your living for having swallowed the whole of the thirty-nine articles in this manner" (laughter). Such was the doctrine held out by that learned prelate. He was told that Dr. Doyle's pamphlet, if taken and contrasted with his examination, contained matter very different from that which he had delivered before the committee. Dr. Doyle's pamphlet contained, he thought, many intemperate expressions. But was it not possible that Dr. Doyle was sorry for those expressions? Was it not barely possible that the tone of that pamphlet, that the tone of speeches which had been quoted, and the difference which appeared in the evidence that had been subsequently given, might have been produced by the kind and considerate treatment which the individuals had experienced? Might not that change have been effected by the opening of the doors of Parliament, to a certain degree, for the purpose of listening to their grievances and complaints; and that, too, with an implied understanding that the Parliament of the united kingdom would redress them? Might not these considerations have mitigated the tone of those who approached the legislature with a tale of long-suffering? And if so, could any man advance a more cogent reason for proceeding in the same course of conciliation, and admitting the Roman Catholics to the full benefit of the constitution (hear, hear)? He protested against making the speeches or writings of any individual, a reason for condemning all those with whom he might be connected. Why should they make the opinions of one man, out of five or 6,000,000, the standard of all the principles, and of all the feelings, of the great body to which he happened to belong? How would gentlemen in that house like such a measure to be dealt out to themselves? How would the rt. hon. gent. who spoke last feel, if he heard any individual say, "I will not judge of the rt. hon. gentleman by what he has said himself; but by such or such a speech, delivered by a gentleman who supports his principles. Mr. Such-a-one spoke no very sensible speech—he can talk very great nonsense—so can Sir Such-a-one, or my Lord Such-a-one: listen to them; and then you will have a sample of the feeling of the Home Secretary, whose principles they advocate" (laughter). He had, in the course of the debate, heard something of persecution; and it was said that the principle of persecution was inherent in the Catholic church. Let not those who used this argument be too precise in its application. There had been persecutions in all churches. Let the priests of any religion have power, and let men speak in opposition to their doctrines; and persecution would be sure to follow. Let the house look to the head of the Lutheran church, which first pointed out the errors, as they were called, of the church of Rome. Luther himself was not free from the charge of intolerance. But whether our church were Lutheran or Calvinistic—for

Lord Chatham had declared, that we had a Calvinistic creed, an Armisian clergy, and a Popish ritual—Calvin was also a persecutor—the persecutor of Servetus, whom he caused to be burned. He called on the house to look at the scenes which, at no very remote period, had been acted in this country. He alluded to the infernal torments—he could call them nothing else—which, 150 years ago, were inflicted on the people of Scotland, under that tyrant, who, alike contemning the law of God, and the sacredness of the constitution, sent his people to die the death of martyrs, on account of the covenant. They died as they had lived, convinced of the justice of the opinions they had espoused, and scorning to give up a principle, even though their existence depended on it. On the one side were the priests, who possessed power; on the other side were the honest men, who dared to deny that their doctrines were right; and the result was that persecution, which he defied the man best read in matters of this kind to equal in the history of this country or of Europe. When individuals bandied about the charge of jesuitism and of persecution, he would advise them to remove all those disabilities, which, while they created ill feelings amongst one party, produced no benefit for the other, and to remember the words which had been quoted from Thuanus—Proscriptiones irritasse potius quam sanasse morbum menti inherentem. Let England throw aside her long-prized, and he once thought exploded Irish impolicy. Let her leave to foreign powers no spot on which they could dwell in the hope that there the empire might be weakened. Some of them at this moment dwelt with delight on Ireland. Every thing that passed in Ireland found its way into foreign Gazettes. In the Vienna Gazette not a word was said about our improvement in arts and sciences—not a syllable about the strides which education was making—not the least notice of the liberal policy which distinguished our commercial arrangements. These matters were all carefully concealed; and, with one exception, our domestic affairs were passed over wholly unnoticed. Unfortunately, the history of Ireland formed that solitary exception. The same feeling existed elsewhere. Let there no longer be a spot in the empire on which foreign enemies could suffer their eye to dwell with malicious pleasure. Make it as unpleasant for them to look on Dublin or on Cork as it was at present for them to view Edinburgh or London. Peace, it was true, was now established: but would war never come? And when it did come, let them, unless they changed their conduct towards Ireland, look to that country then. Did they recollect the situation of Ireland in the revolutionary war? Nay, fifteen years ago, when they talked of Ireland, did they not speak of that country as if a province of the empire was likely to become a province of France? Such times might come again, and such fears might be renewed, if the Catholic Claims were rejected now. After they had put down the Catholic Association—after they had increased their military power—after they had done much to irritate, and little to produce a kind feeling, he did not believe there was any man, whether English or Irish, who would be vain enough to answer for the peace of Ireland, even if a firm peace pre-valled in every other part of Europe, if this measure were thrown out (hear, hear). But his he would say, that if they sent up this bill to the other house by a large majority, he thought, without arrogating to himself any peculiar foresight, that they might depend on the tranquillity of that country (hear, hear). But if it were not carried by such a majority, and that at the present moment, in this very reign—in the reign of His Gracious Majesty the King who now sat on the Throne—then he could only say that he had exonerated himself from any blame that might attach by calling on the house to be wise—by imploring them to act while it was day—by entreating them not to wait till the dark night shrouded them, “when no man can tell what will come!”

Sir F. Blake said he was always at his post; he stood there as the unsolicited advocate of the Roman Catholics (loud cries of question). They were entitled to an equality of rights and privileges (question, question); and this he asserted boldly, even in the face of the rt. hon. Secretary for the Home Department. (Laughter, and cries of question, rendered the remainder of the hon. bart.'s speech inaudible).

The house then divided.—For the third reading, 248—Against it, 227.—Majority in its favour, 21.

The bill was then read a third time and passed, amidst considerable cheering.

LORDS, WEDNESDAY, MAY 11.—Sir John Newport and several other members of the House of Commons, brought up the Catholic Relief bill. Sir John Newport, in handing it to the Chancellor said, “The Commons have passed a bill to remove the disqualifications of His Majesty’s Roman Catholic subjects, to which they request the assent of this house.”

Lord Kington presented a petition against the bill, from a member of the University of Oxford, the Rev. Thomas Sibthorpe, who prayed that he and other clergymen of the Established Church might be relieved from taking the oath of supremacy if this bill passed. The situation of persons taking orders would be completely altered by it. The Catholics and Dissenters did not admit of any interference of Government with their churches. The Church of England acknowledged the King as its head, but on the condition that the Government should be solely in communion with it. The state of the case would, however be completely altered, when the Government admitted Catholics to a participation of power in the state.

The bill was then read a first time.

FRIDAY, MAY 13.—The Archbishop of York presented a petition from the clergy of the East Riding of Yorkshire.

Lord King said that it was worthy of remark that but few petitions had been presented from the clergy of those dioceses which were large and rich, such as Canterbury, York, Winchester, and Durham; whereas they came in great numbers from those parts of the country in which the dioceses were small. A great proportion of the petitions from the clergy had come from Leicester, Cornwall, Devonshire, Sussex—in short, from all those places where the bishops were in transitu, and from which translations might be desirable. He must however say, that for his part, he preferred the venerable fixtures of that house, to those pieces of furniture which were moveable and capable of being rendered more valuable by change.

The Bishop of Exeter declared that he never used any influence in procuring petitions. As he had stated this before, it was unfair in the noble baron to make this assertion again; but the noble baron might, if he pleased, repeat the calumny, for calumny it was. With regard to one of the petitions, he had a letter from the clergyman of the parish, informing him that no influence had been used to procure it, but that, on the contrary, the people had applied to him. He believed the real cause of so many petitions being presented, was, that the people of the country did not like to have indifference imputed to them in the cause of religion, as had been done by the noble baron. Their lordships had been told of the danger there would be in refusing to accede to the claims of the Catholics; but was there no danger in refusing to listen to the numerous petitions on the opposite side, which had been laid on the table from the people of this country?

The Bishop of Hereford disclaimed all exercise of influence on his part to procure petitions. Only one had come from the clergy of his diocese.

Lord King did not allude to the extent, but the revenue of the dioceses; the fact was, that the petitions were few from those where there were no translations.

The Lord Chancellor did not rise from any wish to oppose the kind of observations in which the noble baron so often indulged. He had already said, and he was confident of the fact, that their lordships owed a great proportion of the petitions with which their table was covered to the observations of the noble lord; for the people of this country did not wish to be held up as indifferent on this important question of Catholic claims. Let, then, the noble lord go on; because if he did, between that day and the day on which the measure was to be discussed, short as the time was, their lordships would find that many more petitions against the Catholics would be laid on the table.

Lord Holland felt some difficulty in reconciling the assertion that those petitions expressed the sense of the country with what had fallen from several rt. rev. prelates and the learned lord on the woolsack—namely, that the great body of the people was hostile to the object of the bill which had now, for the second time, been brought up from the other house, and to which the Commons of the united kingdom had twice solicited their lordships’ assent. According to the theory of the constitution, as it had been explained by the Anti-reformers, this could not be the case. Whenever the influence of certain secret parts of the constitution had been alluded to, he had been told, that in theory the House of Commons was the real representative of the people. But it seemed that he had been labouring under an error. The Commons were no longer the representative of the people. That house was, on the contrary, to be regarded rather as an oligarchy, as it had often been described by men who were called visionary reformers—as an ingenious contrivance to deprive the many of their rights in order to confer them on the few. It had sometimes been said that there was no proper vent for public opinion; but that complaint could no longer be made. for now a voice had been found for democracy in that house; and the rt. rev. members of the opposite bench, and the learned lord on the woolsack, had constituted themselves the organs of the people. For his own part, though rather a luke-warm reformer, he had rather too much love for reform to deny the possibility of the vote of the House of Commons being different from the opinion of the people. After, however, that house had twice passed such a measure as the present, he did not think it could have been possible for any person to stand up and assert that the universal feeling of the people was against it. In the face of the decision of the House of Commons, which represented the whole people, and in contradiction to the known wish of at least one third-part of that people, their lordships were assured that the country was hostile to the measure; and this they were told on the authority of pocket petitions got up in holes and corners, of scraps of papers like private correspondence, which the members of the opposite bench, and the reverend and learned lord (laughter)—he meant the noble and learned lord—on the woolsack, were in the daily habit of producing. He did not mean to say that there was not a decided objection in some reflecting minds, to granting the Catholic claims, and an indifference on the subject in many others; but he would assert, that nothing had occurred which entitled any reverend or learned lord to say that the feeling of the people of this country was hostile to the Catholic claims.

MONDAY, MAY 16.—The Earl of Derby presented a petition in favour of the Catholic Relief bill. It had been drawn up at a public meeting convened by the boroughreeve, who signed the petition. The number of signatures attached to it was 16,378. A very short time had been allowed before it was sent off to be presented, otherwise he was assured it would have been signed by three times that number; but as it was, he considered it to represent the sentiments of the great majority of the most respectable inhabitants of Manchester.

The Bishop of Chester wished to make a few observations on the petition, which was opposed to another petition signed by 40,000 inhabitants of Manchester, which would be presented to-morrow. With regard to the petition now before the house, it certainly was the fact, that a meeting had been called by the boroughreeve, for the purpose of voting it. On the business being opened, the place of the meeting was occupied by nearly equal numbers on both sides. The question was put on the petition, and an adjournment was moved as an amendment. On a show of hands, there appeared a great majority in favour of the adjournment, and nearly all the respectable persons who attended went away, conceiving that the meeting was adjourned sine die. Soon after, however, a great number of low Irish, chiefly labourers, rushed in. On their arrival, a motion was made and carried, that the petition be presented. It was immediately signed by the persons who had thus rushed in. Copies of the other petition, against the bill, had been left for signature at different places in Manchester. A great number of Irish labourers availed themselves of the opportunity thus afforded, to sign not their names but their marks. On examination, it was discovered that between 2 and 5000 crosses were attached to it. It was thought that this had been done to depreciate the petition, and these marks were cancelled. The petition would therefore be presented to-morrow as signed by only 38,000, instead of 40,000. He did not deny that the petition presented by the noble earl contained respectable names, but a great proportion was of the kind he had described; and immediately after the name of the boroughreeve, came the names of a great number of Irish labourers, such as Michael Delaney, and the like.

The Earl of Derby:—Instead of the names of the lowest class of Irish labourers—as the rt. rev. prelate had thought fit to describe the petitioners—following that of the boroughreeve, the first name that occurred after his was that of Mr. Birley, who had been the commander of a volunteer corps. Notwithstanding all that the rt. rev. prelate had said, he still maintained that the petition contained a large number of respectable names, and spoke the sentiments of the great majority of the people of Manchester.

The Earl of Limerick censured the language used by the rt. rev. prelate in describing the persons who signed the petition presented by his noble friend. If Irish labourers signed the petition, he thought, however, that they did not deserve to be described as persons of the lowest order, since it appeared that they could write their names.

The Bishop of Chester, in using the expression “lowest class,” meant only to apply it to the worldly condition of the petitioners. He must, however, say, that from their situation in life, as well as their being Roman Catholics, he did not think them the kind of persons best qualified for giving an opinion on the question. Far from him be the idea of casting any reflection on those whom Providence had placed in a lower situation of life than himself.

Lord Clifden did not doubt that many of that description of persons, whom, on account of their worldly condition, the rt. rev. prelate styled the lower class, had signed the petition. Their doing so only proved the existence of general feeling in favour of the Catholic claims from the highest to the lowest*.

The Bishop of Lincoln presented four petitions from different parts of his diocese against * Afterwards, Friday, June 3, the rt. rev. prelate made the following explanation: He said that he had received a letter from Manchester, complaining of certain erroneous statements in the report of his speech relative to that petition. He wished to observe, that the allegations which he had laid before their lordships were made on the authority of a respectable individual; but he was now desirous of doing justice by a more correct statement of the facts. He had stated that the petition was signed by 16,000 persons, but that 12,000 were of the lowest description. He was now informed that a very great number of the signatures were by the most respectable part of the inhabitants. What he had said about the insertion of Irish names appeared also to be founded in mistake. All he could say was, that he had from this occurrence learned a lesson not to make assertions on the authority of others. In future he certainly should not repeat, in that house, the statements of interested parties, without due inquiry.

Lord Suffolk was assured, on the best autho-

the Catholic claims. He alluded to what had lately fallen from a noble lord (King) who drew a distinction between the petitions from large and small dioceses. He could assure the noble lord that his diocese was one of the most extensive, and he doubted not that the noble lord would believe him when he said that he wished that its revenues were among the most extensive also. But he declared that he never had either directly or indirectly influenced the getting up of any petition. It was not becoming in any persons who had to decide on a question to seek for petitions either for or against it.

The Marquis of Lansdown said he had a petition to present from persons who could not be objected to on the ground of their worldly condition. It was signed by only 200 persons, who, however, represented property to the amount of between 90 and 30 millions. It was the petition of certain Merchants, Bankers, and Bank Directors of the City of London. Deeply interested in the welfare of this country, and convinced that that welfare mainly depended on consolidating the connexion between Great Britain and Ireland, they regretted any thing which tended to disturb that connexion. Being persuaded that a great part of the capital of this country was prevented from going to Ireland in consequence of the uncertain state of that country, the petitioners thought it right to approach that house, and to pray that measures might be adopted which would ensure tranquillity, and relieve the capital of this country from the impediments which prevented its useful employment in Ireland. He concluded by requesting that the petition be read at length.

TUESDAY, MAY 17.—The Lord Chancellor presented a petition from the congregation of Percy-street chapel, Pancras.

Lord King had been informed that the minister of Percy-street chapel had, at the close of his sermon, announced from the pulpit that the petition was lying in the vestry for signatures. He stated that the petition was against the Catholics, and observed, that as the House of Lords appeared to be influenced by numbers, it would be advisable for females as well as males to sign it. This subject of the Catholic claims was certainly now made a religious question, since it was mixed up with divine worship. It was held up as one of those things which the congregation were bound to "read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest."

The Bishop of London vindicated the character of the minister of Percy-street chapel. The subject had been mentioned to him (the Bishop) and he found no reason to censure the clergyman, who was a most pious and worthy man.

The Lord Chancellor said that as the Bishop of London was satisfied with the conduct of the clergyman, he hoped that the noble lord would be satisfied also.

The Earl of Caernarvon heard with regret the conduct of this clergyman defended. That defence would tend to establish a precedent for the like conduct; so that, whenever a question might be agitated in Parliament which the clergy chose to call theological, that question ity, that none of the names to the Manchester petition had been canvassed for, and that all the signatures had been voluntary.

would be mixed up with divine worship. In this way the clergy might brawl in their own churches; and by doing so, all respect for their character would be lost. This was another proof of the active interference of the clergy in getting up those petitions which had been laid upon the table. He was sorry to find that on this occasion the rt. rev. prelate not only excused the clergyman, but pronounced a panegyric on his character. If the clergyman were right in mingling this question with the church service, what would the rt. rev. prelate say if any other person, any one of the congregation who might be of a different opinion, should rise up and contradict him? Was the clergyman in this way to turn the church into a debating society? It was not because this petition was against his opinions that he condemned the conduct of this clergyman. Had he been in church, and heard notice given of a petition praying for toleration with as much zeal as this did for intolerance, he should have viewed the transaction with equal disgust. If the clergy thus lost all sense of decency, it would be for their lordships to take into their own hands the protection of the Church, since it was neglected by those who ought to be its guardians. The rt. rev. prelate, in his vindication, had said, that the congregation of this chapel was very much dispersed, and that if the clergyman had not given this notice from the pulpit, they could not have been called together. But he must say, that this was no part of the clergyman's duty, and that it was plain, without his interference there would have been no petition at all, as the people were not disposed to agitate the question. It thus appeared that the clergy were the chief promoters of the petitions against the Catholic claims. When the absence of all petitions was noticed as a proof that the people were not hostile to the proposed relief of the Catholics, the clergy took the alarm. Two or three petitions were then presented from archdeacons. Then, as they became bolder, a few appeared from town; until at last, by the activity of the clergy, their lordships' table was covered.

The Bishop of London had neither praised nor censured the clergyman of Percy-street chapel, for he was not called upon to do either; but he had simply stated what was the fact; that that minister was a most pious and worthy man. With regard to petitions against the bill, he had exerted no influence; but if he had, he might have covered their lordships' table over and over again with petitions.

Earl Spencer regretted that such conduct should be attributed to a clergyman of whom the rt. rev. prelate spoke so highly. In his opinion the transaction was most unwarrantable, disgraceful, and shameful. He was extremely sorry to hear that a business of such a kind should have been brought forward in a church at all, and still more so, that a clergyman should take upon himself any political subject in the pulpit. He understood, indeed, that the minister of Percy-street chapel had introduced the notice respecting the signing of the petition into the body of his sermon. He should be very glad to be assured that this was not the case; but he was informed by a gentleman who was present, that the notice was introduced in the concluding sentence of the sermon, after which followed the usual blessing. It was impossible for any friend of the Established Church—and such his conduct and his votes in that house would prove him to be—to bear of the introduction of political subjects in so sacred a place, even though it had not been in the body of the sermon, without condemning such conduct.

Lord Belle, as we understood, vindicated the clergy of the Established Church. He could not see why they should be so severely censured for doing that which Roman Catholic priests did in support of their religion. Besides, if one individual did any thing wrong, why were all the rest of the Protestant clergy to be blamed for it?

Lord Clifden said it was a great calumny—he did not mean to say that the noble lord was the author of it—to state that the Roman Catholic priests preached up hostility against the Protestants. The Catholic clergy in addressing their flocks from the altar, preached only peace and goodwill. The Protestant clergy, however, had endeavoured to light up a flame; and they might have succeeded, had they not found one already lighted up by their demand of 2s. 9d. for tithes in London under the statute of Henry VIII. An old friend of the late King, Lord Barrington, used to say, that when a parson talked politics in the pulpit he ought to have his ears behind him.

Lord Lifford concurred in the sentiments which had been expressed by the noble earl (Spencer) on this subject, and joined him in deprecating such conduct.

The Archbishop of Canterbury said that the transaction alluded to was quite irregular and highly improper (hear, hear); but as far as he knew, there was no other instance of the kind.

Lord Calthorpe presented a petition from Birmingham in favour of the bill. The names of many of the clergy and magistrates were attached to it. It was signed by nearly the whole of that class of persons whose opinions on other matters had much weight in Parliament. The names of nine bankers, and all the principal manufacturers of the town, were among the signatures. This petition must add to the conviction that the enlightened part of the community were in favour of the measures now before them. It indeed appeared that, as a well-informed class, the clergy stood alone in their opposition to this question.

The Bishop of Lincoln presented a petition against the Catholic claims from the clergy of the county of Hereford.

The Marquis of Downshire presented a petition from Belfast in favour of the Catholic claims, signed by 300 of the principal inhabitants of that town and its vicinity. The names of the present high sheriff of the county of Down, and of the two preceding high sheriffs of Antrim, were among the signatures. It was also signed by most of the ministers of the Established Church, by the bankers, and principal manufacturers. The noble marquis also presented petitions to the same effect from the Protestant inhabitants of the county of Down, including the great body of the Presbyterian population; and one from the Presbytery forming part of the Synod of Ulster, signed by seven ministers, who represented 30,000 Protestant Dissenters.

The Bishop of London presented a petition against the Catholic claims, from Hornsey, in Middlesex.

The Marquis of Londonderry presented a pe-

tion from Darlington, against further concession to the Catholics. He hoped their lordships would pardon him if he availed himself of the present opportunity to express, in a few words, his opinion on this important subject. He had been brought up in the opinions and principles of his deceased relation, of whom he hoped he might now be permitted to say, that he was a most enlightened and honourable statesman. In saying this, he trusted he did not say too much, or too far give way to the feelings of a brother. He knew the sentiments of his brother better than any other person could, and he could assure their lordships, that if there were one point on which he was more earnest and sincere than on any other, it was that an understanding should become to us this great question. It was always to him a source of much regret that the circumstances of the country, both external and internal, should have prevented him from carrying forward this measure to a successful issue. He constantly lamented that he was not able to accomplish an object that he so much desired. In cherishing this wish he followed the example of that great man, Mr. Pitt, who conceived that the Union with Ireland could never be completed until Catholic Emancipation was granted. If an absolute pledge for Emancipation had not been given on the conclusion of the Union, something was engaged to be done which so nearly approached it as to make very little difference. Had his noble relation been living, he would now have called on Parliament, in this period of tranquillity and peace, to fulfil the pledge which had been solemnly given at the time of the Union. He hoped his mind still animated the present Cabinet, and that they would proceed with this great measure, on which the security of Ireland, and the prosperity of both countries, so essentially depended (hear, hear).

Lord Dacre presented a petition from 200 serjeants and barristers at law, in favour of the Catholic claims.

The Bishop of St. David's presented a petition from the Rev. William Dixon, who had formerly been a Catholic curate at Killaloe, in Ireland, and was now a curate of the Church of England, against the bill.

The Duke of Sussex rose to present a petition from the Archdeacon and clergy of Sudbury. This petition certainly was not very numerously signed, but the names attached to it were most respectable. The opinions and sentiments which were expressed in it coincided with his own. Among the signatures were the names of three persons, with whom he was intimately acquainted, and whom he highly esteemed, and he believed his rt. rev. friend (the Bishop of Norwich) would bear testimony to the great respectability of their character.

The Marquis of Lansdown presented a petition from several members of the Universities of Cambridge and Oxford, in favour of the Catholic claims. It was signed, by two heads of colleges, a majority of the professors, and eighty or ninety other members of Cambridge University; but it was not so numerously signed by members of the other University, because the petition could only receive the signatures of such of the latter as were in London, there not having been time to send it to Oxford. Connected as he was with the University of Cambridge, it was with the greatest gratification that he beheld attached to the petition the names of the professor of Greek, of Arabic, of geology, of anatomy, of astronomy, in short of all that was distinguished for learning and enlightened talent in that great University, thus giving a bright example of liberality to the country.—The noble marquis presented a second petition, to the same effect, signed by 100 graduates of Oxford and Cambridge.—His lordship then stated that he had to present another petition, which possessed strong claims on the attention of the house. Their lordships would remember, that a short time ago he presented a petition from Dublin, signed by several Protestant peers, bankers, merchants, and others, praying that relief might be extended to their Catholic fellow-subjects. The petition he now held in his hand, which was to the same effect, contained the signatures of a great many individuals of property who had been prevented from putting their names to the former. It was signed by true Protestant peers, who were not peers of that house, and by a great number of bankers, merchants, and landed proprietors, not members of either House of Parliament; and it might be taken as representing the sentiments of the great bulk of property in Ireland. He presented also another petition signed by 7,000 members of the Established Church, inhabitants of Liverpool, who represented property to the amount of six millions sterling, praying that the Catholic claims might be conceded (hear, hear).

The Duke of Devonshire presented two petitions; one from the Protestant inhabitants of the county of Waterford, which was signed by a large body of the Protestant inhabitants of that county; the other from Bandon, a most populous town, which had long been the great hold of Protestantism; yet now its inhabitants came forward, beseeching their lordships to consider the claims of their Catholic brethren. Their lordships had now the whole people of Ireland imploring them to adopt a measure not of indulgence, but of reason and justice. If there were danger in receiving his Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects into the constitution, by whom was it to be feared? By England, or by Ireland? In this country, where the great bulk of the people were Protestants—or in a part of the empire where Protestants numbered as one to thirty? If the Protestants of Ireland came forward and said that they apprehended danger from concession, there might then be some grounds for withholding it; but if they said, that so far from that, their happiness and very existence depended on the Catholic claims being granted, what excuse was there for refusing to do the Catholics justice? Their cause was daily gaining ground—they were advancing in wealth and intelligence, and their claims would not be allowed to sleep (hear, hear). Let their lordships, then, avail themselves of the present favourable moment; the country was in a state of unexampled prosperity; the Protestant and the Catholic were ready to meet each other on terms of cordial amity; the other house of Parliament had passed the measure; if, then, their lordships neglected this precious moment, it might never return (hear, hear). He rejoiced that this great cause was in the hands of such able advocates; he assured them they had his most cordial wishes for success, for on the decision of this question depended the existence of Ireland. He implored their lordships to be just to themselves, by removing the stain on the national character, and to consolidate the strength of the empire by uniting the hearts and hands of the people (cheers).

Earl Grey said that he had now to present to the house, a petition signed by the Duke of Norfolk, and the other English Roman Catholic peers, and by upwards of 30,000 persons of that persuasion in this country, praying for the removal of those laws which excluded them from the privileges of the constitution, for no fault of theirs but because they entertained opinions which it did not depend upon their will to change. They presented themselves before the house, proudly conscious of their own competence to be admitted to the full enjoyment of liberty; they humbly, but firmly, stated to their lordships, that while those disabilities under which they at present laboured continued, they would never cease to claim an exemption from them; they appealed to their acknowledged and undeviating good conduct in public—to the manner in which they discharged all the social duties of life—and to their distinguished services to their country upon all occasions when they were not prevented by the jealousy and restriction of the law from engaging in her cause. They repelled the assertion, as unjust and unfounded, that there was any thing in their religion incompatible with a free government; they referred their lordships to those periods of history when the securities of freedom were established by persons who professed the same faith, for a refutation of that assertion. They further asserted its refutation by what in more modern times existed in other countries—in Switzerland, where the Catholic and Protestant cantons were bound together in the closest union; in France, where equal rights with the Catholics were extended to the Protestants; in the Netherlands, where the Protestant states of Holland were united with the Catholic states formerly held by the house of Austria, in one bond of union and equality, under the special guarantee of Great Britain; in Hanover, where all religious distinctions were repudiated by his most gracious Majesty (cheers); in Canada, where the Roman Catholic was the established religion; in the United States of America, whose freedom and prosperity were not impeded, but accelerated and increased with a rapidity almost surpassing belief, by the equal protection afforded by the laws to all religious persuasions. These petitioners stated further, that they disclaimed what had been falsely imputed to them that night, in a petition which he had heard read with disgust, from a person who stated, that he had once belonged to the Roman Catholic religion, but did not say what other, if any, he had taken up—they disclaimed a divided allegiance to their sovereign, whose just rights they always felt themselves bound to support against all other powers or potentates who might presume to attack them. On these grounds they came before that house in the just hope that their lordships would at last relieve them from the operation of those laws which inflicted upon them the injury and disgrace of excluding them from their birthright. He wished he could say that he felt hopes of their success equal to the justice of their claims, and the expediency of complying with their prayer. These petitions came strongly recommended to their lordships by the character of the petitioners, to which the noble earl (Liverpool) had more than once borne testimony, as having shown themselves most meritorious subjects in the hour of danger, in despite of every discouragement. It came recommended to their lordships, in the next place, by the concurrent application in their behalf of their Protestant fellow-subjects, particularly from that part of the empire where, as had been justly urged by the noble duke (of Devonshire), the danger, if any existed, was most to be feared, and could best be appreciated. It came further recommended by the vote of the House of Commons for the second time in their favour. Much discussion had taken place upon the state of public feeling on this question. By some it was said that it was demonstrated by the petitions which had been presented to the house against it; while it was sought by others to take from the weight of those petitions by questioning the characters of the petitioners, exposing the means taken to obtain their signatures, and by stating the countervailing effects of petitions in its favour. Between these conflicting statements, he was not able to decide; but the conclusion he came to from the circumstance that no petition had been presented against it from one county in the kingdom, or from one great town, from which a petition was not also presented on the other side; that every public meeting ended in a division in its favour; but more particularly from the decision of the House of Commons on the eve of a general election—the conclusion he said was, that if there were any strong feeling in the country against it, the House of Commons, however much it might stand in need of reform, was still so constituted, that it would at present afford a faithful echo of that feeling, and such a bill as that now before their lordships would not have been presented to this house for its concurrence. He said, therefore, that if public opinion were not in favour of this measure, it was at least in a state of tranquillity, and perfectly free from alarm upon the subject. He regretted that his Majesty's ministers had not taken it up as a great cabinet measure, instead of abandoning all the duties of Government to a chance medley of interests. Had it been adopted by a united Government, all obstacles would have been overcome; all alarm, all jealousy, would have vanished, and the measure would have been seconded by that good-will which ought to animate all the members of a great civil community worshipping the same God. The rev. prelates opposite disclaimed any interference on their parts to excite public opinion against the Catholics. He was bound to believe them, satisfied that they would state nothing in that house which was not true; but were not their opinions generally known on this subject, and was it too much to say that efforts would therefore be made by others to recommend themselves to their favour by promoting these petitions? However that might be, active exertions had been made to excite those opinions against the Catholic claims. Hitherto they had not succeeded, although they might yet succeed in re-kindling those sparks of animosity so productive of misery to the country. For his part, he was satisfied that this measure was one calculated to satisfy the people of England; and this, as had been stated by the noble duke, was the moment for conciliating the people of Ireland, and rendering that which was at present a Union of law a Union of interest. This great question was now reduced to a question of time, it was admitted on all sides that sooner or later it must be carried. Was it possible that any man who entertained that opinion could take upon himself the responsibility of the consequences likely to result from delay? The noble duke (of Devonshire) had told their lordships that the present moment was favourable for doing justice to the Roman Catholics: it was most favourable, it was most auspicious, but it might not long continue so. At present, this measure of justice would be hailed by the Catholics with satisfaction; delay it a little longer, and it might be held out to them in vain. The country was now in a prosperous state, but were there not already some clouds discernible in the horizon, and was not this the time for a wise and cautious legislature to prepare for the coming storm? Now was the time for their lordships to give that which they might offer in vain in the hour of distress and danger. That had been the case with America: God grant they might not produce another separation, which would be followed by the ruin of this country (loud cheering).

The Earl of Donoughmore having moved the order of the day for the second reading of the Catholic Relief bill,

Lord Colchester said, that so far as the Parliamentary inquiry had gone, it did not remove any of the objections to this measure. Their lordships had always shown a readiness to grant to the Roman Catholics a full participation in the advantages of the constitution, but these, unless accompanied with political power, had always been rejected. It had been surmised that further concessions were necessary: it might be so. They enjoyed the right and security of property: still, if the ends of justice required further regulations for the security of property, let them be made. Civil employments were already open to them—the army and the navy had long since been opened to them (hear, from the Opposition)—but nothing would satisfy them, it seemed, but the broad road to political power. The bill now before the house demanded admission for them to all the offices under the Crown, the Lord Lieutenantcy of Ireland only excepted. Under the provisions of such a bill could any man doubt that the Protestant Church of England and Ireland was likely to be injured? He would leave to more learned men the task of tracing the tenets of the Catholic religion, through the works of individuals who had written in the older times. He would content himself with adverting to some publications which had appeared in their own days, and which had come under their own observation. The most prominent of their writers of the present day (Dr. Doyle) denied the justice of those laws by which the Church of England held its supremacy in these realms. The same opinion was to be found elsewhere. Last year, in a debate on the Catholic question, a document was referred to, in which it was broadly affirmed that the ministers of the Protestant Church would ever be detested by those who differed so greatly from them in religious belief. But then it was said, that all danger was avoided by the cautious manner in which this bill was drawn up. But did those who so argued recollect the oath of the Roman Catholic ecclesiastic? He swore to keep most secret whatever council he received from the Pope, the supreme head of his church—Constitutum Domini Papa tenet et emendat—et nemini dicam. Was there no danger to be apprehended from those who were thus bound to conceal the counsels of their great leader? They had heard not a little about the ornaments of the Catholic Church in foreign countries; their learning, virtue, and piety had been greatly eulogized. But let their lordships turn their attention to the doctrines of Bossuet, Bishop of Meaux, one of those who were particularly pointed out as patterns of toleration. He said, what no doubt was echoed by all his brethren, that the power of the sword should unquestionably be used in support of the Catholic religion. That prelate concluded his funeral sermon over Louis XIV. by eulogizing, above every other act of his life, his conduct in exterminating heretics. This showed what the doctrine of the Church of Rome had hitherto been, and it remained for those who supported the present measure to show that it had undergone an alteration. This bill, it appeared, was to be connected with another measure, which would secure a provision to the Roman Catholic clergy—a kind of regium donum. He looked upon this as a very unfair proceeding towards the Protestants. He conceived it was extraordinary that such a proposition should have been made, without any notification, in favour of a grant of that kind, having been made on the part of the Crown. He contended that such a grant would be a virtual recognition of the Roman Catholic religion in this country—a thing which had not been heard of for ages in this realm. To that proposition he must decidedly object, because it appeared to him to be most unconstitutional. There were many other points connected with this measure which deserved the deepest consideration. It was proposed, to prevent any mischief from the intervention of a foreign power, to have recourse to the domestic nomination of bishops. But of what use was that, when, unless the Pope agreed to receive the person nominated, the proceeding became null? they had been reminded that the Roman Catholics of Hanover were placed on a footing with their Protestant brethren; but it was proper to observe, that the Roman Catholics of Hanover allowed to the monarch, that which the Roman Catholics of this country denied to the King—the right of interfering with the investiture of bishops. This was not all. It appeared, that a commission was to be appointed to examine the bulls and rescripts of the Papal see which might be sent to this country; but the superintendence of those original bulls and rescripts was not to be intrusted to any member of his Majesty's Government. Their lordships must all have heard of a publication which was now circulating through the heart of England on this subject. It was an address from the Irish Roman Catholics to the Roman Catholics of England—telling the latter expressly, that they were unjustly deprived of political rights, and not forgetting to tell them that they ought to wrest those rights from the Government of the country. A power which proceeded in this way ought to be attentively watched. The Roman Catholic hierarchy, let it be concealed as it might, possessed an authority in this country, of which the legislature ought to be jealous. Strange to say, a Roman Catholic institution, that of the Jesuits, which was excluded from Roman Catholic countries generally, had contrived, not only without law, but in his opinion, against law, to acquire large possessions in England. When this was an acknowledged fact, who could be hardy enough to contend that there was no danger, if further concessions were granted to the Roman Catholics, of their exercising an extensive sway in this empire? It was argued that, in other countries, the Roman Catholics held an equality of rights with the Protestants. But the circumstances of those countries were very different from the circumstances of this empire. If, under a despotic government, Roman Catholics of great talents and great ambition attempted, by popular aid, to disturb the existing order of things, their career could at once be checked by the prompt exercise of power. But, under a free government, like that of Great Britain, this could not be done. Much mischief might be effected before the evil could be checked. The notification in a single Gazette might, in one night, alter the constitution of that house, by introducing there a number of individuals of a religion which the State had long been accustomed to look upon with suspicion. A great deal had been said of the securities which the Roman Catholics offered; but, in his opinion, the best security which could be devised for the constitution, was to prevent the Roman Catholics from any farther participation in political power (hear, hear)—to avoid all dangerous experiments, to repel all crude theories, and to resist unnecessary innovations (hear, hear). Emancipation was the great watch-word on this occasion. He would say, that the emancipation which was most necessary for Ireland, was emancipation from bigotry, emancipation from ignorance, emancipation from that foreign power whose spiritual authority was acknowledged there (hear, hear); and, finally, emancipation from the extreme subdivision and underletting of lands (hear, hear). Let this be done, and the peace of Ireland would be secured. The result of all these observations was, that the disturbances which had occurred from time to time in Ireland, were not the consequence of feelings created on account of religion. Some active political leaders might assign that as the cause, but he believed that all those disturbances had their origin on some specific grievance. As a proof of this, let their lordships turn their eyes to the north of Ireland. There the difference of religion was as great as in any part of that country; but there was there more employment and less poverty; and the consequence was, that the disturbances which were common to the south, were there unknown. The present tranquillity of Ireland was adduced as a reason for carrying this measure; but the very cause to which that tranquillity was ascribed ought to make the legislature more vigilant. They were told, that the power of priests was not so great as it had formerly been. His firm belief was, that the power was only dormant—that it could easily be called into full operation—that “it is not dead, but sleepeth.” He called on that house not to resign the high situation which they now held, for the prospect of contingent advantages. He called on them not to fill with discontent the great body of Protestants of England, Scotland, and Ireland, by conceding these demands. Fully impressed with the justice and policy of these sentiments, he begged leave to move, that the word “now” be left out, for the purpose of substituting “this day six months.”

The Marquis of Anglesea, in seconding the amendment, said, that in taking this course, he opposed the sentiments of many of his friends; but he had a duty to perform, which, however painful, he would conscientiously discharge. He had formerly given a different vote, but he felt that he might now, consistently with the course of proceeding which he had adopted on other occasions, oppose the breaking down of a most important barrier of the constitution. The change of circumstances, he conceived, fully justified his conduct. It appeared to him, that the different concessions made to the Roman Catholics had not been met by them with a corresponding spirit of conciliation. Each concession had given rise to new demands, and had tended only to produce restlessness and dissatisfaction. Judging from the tone and language which had recently been used, it seemed to him that nothing short of Catholic ascendancy would satisfy the Catholic body. Allusion had been made to force—it had been almost threatened that the measure should be carried by force. Six to one had been spoken of, as the relative proportion. Now, if there must be a contest—and the idea was most painful to him—he repeated, if they were to be threatened with the opposition of 6,000,000 of men, to 1,000,000—if the fight must come, he should like to meet it when the country was in the best possible situation—when peace prevailed on every side. Still, he must say, that he was, really and sincerely, a friend to the Roman Catholics. He would grant them every relief that was proper, but he would take care to grant them nothing at the expense of the constitution. Seeing the necessity of upholding the Protestant ascendancy, he could not consent to any farther extension of political privileges to the Roman Catholics. With respect to the measures which were said to be connected with the bill now before the house, he would offer a very few remarks. He did not object to an alteration of the elective franchise in Ireland—it might probably be productive of good; neither did he object to making a provision for the Catholic clergy; but he must be allowed to say, that if a Protestant King paid a Catholic clergy, he could see no reason why that Protestant King should be excluded from all power in the appointment of a Catholic bishop. He should now conclude, as his only object was to explain the ground on which he gave his vote on this occasion—which was, an anxious desire to support the existing establishment, and the Protestant constitution of this country.

The Marquis Camden said, that when Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in 1795, he was commanded by his late Majesty to cause an inquiry to be instituted into the state of Ireland, and he could aver that there was, at that time, a strong desire on the part of the Irish government to attend to the claims of the Catholics. It was true, that the rebellious disposition of the Presbyterians in that country, and the restlessness of the Catholics, rendered it inexpedient at that period to make concessions; but those obstacles were now removed, and he should therefore support the measure. He was as sincere a friend to the Protestant Establishment as any of the rt. rev. prelates; and if he saw any danger to that establishment in consenting to the bill, he would never do so; but convinced as he was, that no such danger existed, he most strongly supported the measure, in justice to the Catholics of Ireland. Although no distinct pledge was given at the Union that Emancipation should be granted, yet it was certainly by an understanding of that nature, that that great measure was facilitated. The continued agitation of the subject was strongly to be deprecated, as pregnant with danger and embarrassment; and it was not less from that consideration than from the great love and affection he bore to Ireland, that he was anxious for the favourable termination of the question.

Earl Darnley:—During the whole course of a long parliamentary life he had supported the claims of the Catholics; and he had never heard an argument that appeared to him, of the least cogency against them. There might have been something in the language of a portion of the Catholics of Ireland, which would have been better un-uttered; but it was not to be forgotten what irritating language was used against them. When the Catholic Association was suppressed, with an immediate forbearance—a forbearance characteristic of the Irish Catholics, under all their sufferings—they at once submitted to the decree of the legislature, and in so doing gave an additional proof of their loyalty and attachment to the constitution. His gallant friend (the Marquis of Anglesea) had commented upon the irritating nature of the language and conduct which the Irish Catholics had manifested, subsequently to every act of legislative concession. He had heard such an imputation with surprise; and he was at a loss to discover on what facts such a charge rested. He defied his gallant friend to cite an instance of that irritating language and conduct. Nay, more; he would venture to assert, that legislative favours were uniformly received by the Catholic body with unqualified gratitude. He did not see at that moment in his place the Lord Privy Seal, otherwise he should appeal to him to give a conclusive answer to the imputation of his gallant friend. That noble earl (Westmorland) was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in 1793. And here he must be allowed to state, in answer to that imputation, the history and character of those concessions which were granted to the Catholics in the subsequent years. In 1792 their prayer was refused; but in the year after, when the country was engaged in a war with France—when dangers from without presented themselves in a threatening form, those concessions refused the year before, were recommended to the Irish parliament in a speech from the throne, and passed by a great majority (hear, hear). Such was the history of the concessions of that period: and again he would repeat, that they were received with the unqualified gratitude of the Irish Catholics (hear, hear). But he begged the house to bear in mind that they were now called upon to extend those concessions at a period not of war, but of peace, when the country stood happily prominent in character and glory, in the enjoyment of political and maritime strength, and not to wait to do that which, being an act of justice and of policy, a season of calamity would undoubtedly demand (hear, hear). The question now stood on different grounds from what it had done at any other period. They had now before them a mass of information, particularly theological information, on which, he would take upon himself to say, their lordships and the people of England were totally ignorant before (hear, hear). He had the honour originally to move for the appointment of the committee; it was then refused, but subsequently agreed to, and no man would venture to deny that the greatest benefit had resulted from the investigation. They had now before them the unimpeached and unimpeachable testimony of numerous witnesses on their oaths, acquainted with the precise local circumstances, stated fairly in the face of the world. When, therefore, the noble lord (Colchester) asserted, that the whole of the declarations and efforts of the Roman Catholics was a mere pretence to assist them in obtaining the power and property of the Established Church, that assertion was answered by referring the noble lord to the undoubted testimony of respectable men of that persuasion, who on their oaths declared the contrary. It was not necessary for him to bear testimony to the characters of Mr. O'Connell and Dr. Doyle; but most persuaded he was, that if the latter had the good fortune to have been bred in that pure faith of the Protestant church which their lordships professed, he would not, from his piety and learning, disgrace the right reverend bench before them (hear, hear). He begged to recall their lordships' attention to a passage in the evidence of Mr. Blake, a gentleman who possessed the full confidence of the Marquis Wellesley, and who declared that it was his conviction, that the security of the Protestant Establishment was the great link in the chain that connected Great Britain and Ireland; and that connexion he considered as one of the best guarantees of the happiness and prosperity of the latter country (hear, hear). Now, he might be told that Roman Catholic witnesses were not to be believed upon their oaths—he might be met with decrees of the council of Trent, and other councils, supposed to have the effect of defeating such evidence, but very often totally misapplied: but to reject the evidence of witnesses so respectable as those who had been examined before the committee, on such grounds, was what he would never consent to. Noble lords might talk of this bill as countenancing principles inimical to the doctrine of the Established Church: but were not the household troops opposite—the lawn legion—were not those rt. rev. prelates sufficient to preserve the orthodoxy of Parliament (laughter and cheers)? If they were to carry their anxiety for orthodoxy much further, they might begin to regulate at last the precise structure of the wigs which those rt. rev. prelates wore. And he really considered that the preservation of his own hair, or the assumption of a wig by one of that rt. rev. body, was a matter just as essential to the ascendancy and welfare of the Protestant Establishment in England as was the exclusion of the Roman Catholics from any civil privileges that were enjoyed by their Protestant brethren. But, besides these securities, did not the Protestant Establishment possess a host in such vigilant allies as the noble and learned lord on the woolsack, and a noble duke, who brought up with him a whole corps de reserve in this cause? The fact was, that political influence must in this country ever follow the majority of numbers and of property; and for this reason it was impossible, absolutely, that either in England or Scotland, the Catholic religion should ever again become the dominant one. He was perfectly persuaded that if these claims were granted that very night, the next elections would be determined, not by any religious considerations whatever, but by property and its attendant influence. A good deal had been said about the coronation oath. Now, how could it have entered the heads of any noble lords, or any other persons, to affirm that there was any thing whatever in that oath, as it stood, to prevent and preclude the King of this country from granting any further civil power to the Catholics, he could not comprehend. If their lordships would look at the oath, they would find that in substance it was an oath which rendered it impossible to say that the admission of the Catholics to civil power could interfere with those privileges and that inevitable ascendancy of the Protestant Church which the King pledged himself to defend. It did, therefore, appear to him that all such apprehensions and alarms of danger were imaginary. At the same time he was ready to admit, that there had been a great number of petitions presented against this bill; to which petitions he was not at all disposed to refuse their due weight. If they were to argue solely on their number, it must be believed that the sense of the country was very much against this bill. But if they looked a little further, their lordships would find that naturally enough, the Protestant clergy had given the example of such petitions; and, in a religious country like this, that example was soon largely followed by the inhabitants of counties, towns, and villages; and petitions of the same kind, very numerous signed, from the cities of London and Westminster, had been presented that night to the house. It was said no improper steps had been resorted to in obtaining signatures to those petitions; he believed the fact to be so; but their lordships could not be ignorant of the facility with which almost any petitions in a crowded city would be got up; and he would engage, as a proof of it, to procure a petition at a short notice, and numerous signed, to remove even the learned lord who presided over his majesty's councils from his post. The noble earl, after contending that a very different spirit, in respect of the Catholic Claims, was latterly manifesting itself even among the Protestants of Ireland, asked whether there was a single Irish Protestant to be found, who would lay his hand upon his heart and say, that he believed things could go on in Ireland as they now were? He concluded, by earnestly insisting on the importance of the present time as the most favourable for passing this great measure; and by pointing out the utter inefficacy of the most numerous garrison that could be thrown into Ireland to keep it in peace and tranquillity, so long as the claims of her Catholic population were neglected (hear, hear).

The Earl of Longford said, that living constantly amongst a Roman Catholic population, regarding them highly as individuals, and respecting them as a body collectively, it would be readily imagined that he was most anxious to meet their views with as much favour as any man. But after mature consideration, he could not bring himself to think that this bill would answer the expectations of those by whom it had been introduced, or that it was a measure that could be put into execution without manifest danger to the constitution. It had been imputed to those who, like himself, were unfriendly to the bill, that they wished to visit with penal consequences the peculiar doctrines of Catholicism; but they did not in any degree wish to interfere with religious opinions; nor did they at all presume to measure the speculative tenets, or to regulate the doctrines of the Roman Catholics; they were only determined that the Roman Catholics should not interfere with theirs (hear, hear). The reason of their refusal to concede the Catholic claims, was founded upon the political consequences that would follow upon their assent. Those consequences led to the perpetual interference of the Papal influence, nominally in spiritual affairs alone, but actually in the general transactions and ordinary business of life. It had been deposed, indeed, by witnesses examined before their lordships, and by others, that that interference was strictly confined to spiritual matters and doctrine; but how was the line to be drawn that was to separate in the judgment of a Roman Catholic, spiritual and temporal affairs? He was of opinion that the Roman Catholic priesthood were able to lead the people with great facility; and their own constitution was well calculated to make them subservient to the supremacy of Rome. The commands of the superior to the inferior admitted of no dispute; while the principle of subjection in the inferior was as clearly defined as the right of the superior to his obedience. If they were to be admitted, therefore, to a participation of civil and political privileges without acknowledging that supremacy which was submitted to by our own Church, the Roman Catholic clergy would be put on a higher footing than our own (hear, hear). He would further ask, if they were to admit the Roman Catholic body to the highest places in the constitution, what was to guarantee the Protestant Establishment? By the law none were admissible to offices of political trust, but those whose allegiance was perfected. Of all the dissenters from the establishment, he knew of none whose allegiance was of necessity imperfect, except the Roman Catholics. Standing in the peculiar relation to us which they held, in what light must they regard us? What must be the feeling of a really conscientious Roman Catholic towards the National Church Establishment? Were we not dissenters from their faith, usurpers of the authority of their creed, despoilers of the property of their church? We were voluntary seceders from them, as the other dissenters were from the national establishment. Such, therefore, being their feelings, there was nothing in principle, in Christian-like feeling, in policy or expediency, which required us to make the concessions they claimed or forbade their refusal. Much had been said against the entertainment of prejudices. But were the partialities all on one side? Among the peers who surrounded him he saw many who had the most perfect reasons which could exist for their partiality to the Roman Catholic interests—close connexions—family feeling—the ties of friendship. Would not these give a bias to a man's sentiment as well as prejudice against the Roman religion? It was comparatively easy to root out the belief of an established religion—it was difficult to eradicate prejudice. He had heard mention made of the right of the Catholics to this concession. He denied it totally; for he denied that the interests of the many should be sacrificed to the few. Expediency used to be another argument; it was latterly changed into necessity, which was defined to be a threatening on the part of the Catholics. This reminded him of the story of an old Irish chieftain, whose first address in levying contributions was, "Pay me the money you owe me; if you don't"—(laughter). The question for them was, since the restrictions were imposed, had the country advanced or gone back? Was it not at a pitch of prosperity, wealth, and glory, which were never equalled by any comparison of ancient or modern history? Let them consider the power, capabilities, and resources, which had developed themselves in this little contracted spot of the earth's surface—not the fruits of extraordinary individual talents; but the slow, hardy, and gradual growth of ages, during which the oppressed Catholics, so called, had enjoyed, in common with their Protestant brethren, the fruits and advantages of those councils from which, for their own advantage as well as ours, they had been excluded. Before departing from her present course, it ought to be made manifest to the country that something would be obtained quite equal to that which she possessed; and certainly the least which could be required would be to show that the benefits at present enjoyed could not, by these concessions, be impaired or lost. The argument for adopting this measure, because it came up from the House of Commons, might be good in many cases; but in this their lordships would do best to make use of that invaluable privilege which belonged to them, of judging for themselves. For what was the fact? Was the bill supported by a questionable majority of the other house, or was it not rather a petty shifting majority—a majority merely in name? It could not be assumed that it was the sense of the country, when it was barely, if at all, the sense of the majority of the house. There was one thing which they were not to lose from their consideration. The subject had notoriously engrossed the public attention, and it was impossible that the public mind could cease to be employed with it for some time to come. According to the provisions of the constitution, the time could not be far distant when the sense of the country might be taken in the most direct manner upon this subject. They would then know with tolerable exactness how to appreciate that increase of converts, as they had been called, to the Catholic cause. They would then see if they were justified in taking the sense of that majority for the sense of the country. Concessions to the Roman Catholics could not be claimed as a right, because the right to them did not exist—justice did not exact them—expediency did not require them—the public prosperity could not but be endangered by them—and they were quite incompatible with the Protestant ascendancy, which was necessary for the well-being of the empire.

The Bishop of Norwich said, that if the learned prelates, and those of the clergy who agreed with him in thinking that it was expedient to withhold from good and loyal civil subjects the civil privileges of the government under which they lived on account of innocent, though, in their judgment, erroneous religious opinions, would be content to state their own sentiments without intimating that all true friends to our excellent ecclesiastical establishment must entertain the same sentiments, he should have felt very little disposed "in life's last stage," to have obtruded himself upon their lordships upon the present occasion; but it was quite impossible for a person in his situation to sit silent under the most distant suspicion of being deficient in zeal for the welfare of that church of which he was a minister, because he felt strongly, and expressed plainly what he felt, whenever the wrongs, the insults, the unprovoked and cruel wrongs, which, year after year, were heaped upon more than five millions of as loyal subjects, and as conscientious Christians, as in any of His Majesty's dominions, became the topic of public discussion; and because he presumed to doubt, whether an obstinate perseverance in this narrow wretched system of exclusion, were the best method of promoting the real interest of the United Church of England and Ireland. That was the point at issue between himself and his clerical brethren, whose petitions crowded their lordships' table. He would not say exclusively crowd it; but he might be permitted to say, that with the much-to-be-lamented exception of the clergy, the education and property of the kingdom were decidedly in favour of the bill under their lordships' consideration. If it were not so, why were there no county petitions; why no petitions from the City of London; none from Westminster; none from Southwark; none, or not more than one or two, from any of our numerous, flourishing, and populous commercial towns? All were silent; "sed domus tacent, clamant." They cried aloud that public opinion was unquestionably friendly to the claims of the Catholics. But the Catholics, it was said, were intolerant; and to justify this charge, recourse was had to the transactions of ages long since past—ages, when toleration was neither practised nor understood by Christians of any denomination; for Knox, and Calvin, and even Cranmer, were persecutors as well as Bonner and the Duke of Alva. Could it, then, answer any good purpose to revive the memory of facts, equally disgraceful to both parties—facts, which every wise and good man would wish, for the honour of human nature, to bury, if it were possible, in eternal oblivion (hear, hear)? An appeal was next made to more modern history, by a noble lord (Colchester) but with what justice? He would call upon the noble lord to show him a single country in the whole of Europe, so degraded by persecuting laws as England; to show him a single country, the inhabitants of which were treated with so much harshness and injustice as the Catholic inhabitants of unhappy Ireland. "But," said the noble lord, "the oppressive laws so much complained of have been repealed for half a century." A very able writer, and a very honest patriot—Sir H. Parnell—in his accurate History of the Penal Laws of Ireland, told a very different story. He would not, however, dwell upon the sad detail, as it was not his intention to aggravate but to heal (hear, hear). It had been said, that without these laws, the Established Church could not be maintained in Ireland. If it could be proved—but he thought it never would—that the worldly advantage of any particular ecclesiastical establishment of Christianity, could not be maintained without an obvious violation on the part of its members of the leading principles of the Christian religion, such, for instance, as that most excellent precept, "to do unto others, in all cases, as we would they should do unto us;" and that "new commandment, to love one another," new, both in degree and in extent, which our Divine Master bequeathed to his followers, as his last and best legacy; if, he said, even the Church of England could stand, unless its members were called upon to act in direct opposition to these distinguishing precepts of our holy religion, he should say, without the smallest hesitation, let it fall (hear, hear); for it must never be forgotten, that an ecclesiastical establishment was no part of Christianity, but the mode only of propagating its doctrines; as had been accurately and justly remarked by Archdeacon Paley. It seemed, then, to follow, as a legitimate consequence, that the outward building, the mere fabric of the temple, would hardly be worth preserving, if that charity, which was the guardian angel of the Inner Temple, had taken its flight, and "the glory was departed" (hear, hear). He should, perhaps, be asked—indeed, he had been asked more than once—if he felt prepared to abide by the result of his opinions; a result which, in the judgment of some, must be attended with the entire loss of those pecuniary advantages, and of the honour of a seat in that House, which he derived from his present situation in the Established Church? To this question his answer was very short, and very sincere. Worldly advantages, of whatever description, which could only be secured by the oppression of five millions of loyal fellow-subjects, and conscientious fellow-Christians, had no charms for him; they were poor and valueless; he did not wish to hold them by so bad a tenure; on the contrary, he would gladly relinquish them to-morrow, and "eat his bread in peace and privacy," if, by so doing, the cause which he had at heart could be effectually promoted (hear, hear). These were his genuine sentiments; they had been the same for more than half a century, and he was now much too old to change them. He dared not, however, rashly say, as had been said, that whatever alteration of circumstances might occur in this ever-shifting scene of human life, these sentiments would remain unaltered; but he would say, that reflecting seriously upon what had passed, and was still passing before his eyes, there was very little probability of his thinking differently from what he now did. With respect to the political part of the subject, it was not in his province; and if it were, he should be unwilling to weary their lordships' attention by a repetition of those unanswered and unanswerable arguments which had been so often urged in behalf of the Catholics, by many of the best and wisest men of the age.—He must, notwithstanding, venture to observe, that they had once more an opportunity of doing tardy justice to a large portion of his Majesty's subjects,—an opportunity which, if neglected, was likely to be followed, and at no very distant period, by events which neither the wisdom nor the power of government might be able to control.

The Bishop of Chester said that he rose with considerable embarrassment; an embarrassment proceeding not only from the unspeakable importance of the measure, which, in whatever point of view he looked at it, presented only a choice of difficulties, but an embarrassment arising from finding himself opposed in opinion to many of those whose virtues he revered and loved, whose friendship he held to be among the most honourable distinctions of his life; whose wisdom he had every reason to respect; and to whose political experience he felt he ought to bow. But there were acts of duty, the performance of which cost a pang, only compensated by conscientious persuasion; and on this question he had at least the satisfaction of knowing, that his conviction was formed after much painful inquiry; though in justice to himself he ought to add, that it was in opposition to his early opinions. The change, indeed, was not recent; but there was a time when his mind, imbued with those principles of civil and religious liberty, interwoven with the rudiments of education in this country, and struck with the severity of the penal code, in some of its most hideous features, arrived at the conclusion that the Roman Catholics ought not to be excluded. But when he became better acquainted with the doctrines and practices of the Church of Rome—when he understood its incompatibility with our own Church Establishment, and the importance of preserving that establishment by co-ordinate disabilities—when he reflected on the innumerable evils which Popery, he did not say the Roman Catholic religion, had at various times brought upon the world—when he became convinced that the spirit of that ecclesiastical despotism was unchanged, that “if it crouched it slumbered not,” but still awaited an opportunity for re-exerting its energies, and grasping its prey; he felt called upon to retract his early errors. If aught were wanting to the fulness of conviction upon this subject, he should have found it in the evidence lately placed in their hands—nay in the very portions of that evidence on which the advocates for emancipation relied. Those advocates, according to their own representations, were guided by a light outshining the brightness of history, experience and common sense. It might be said, that he came to this question, no impartial judge; and that night, for more than the tenth time, it had been, not insinuated, but asserted, that the Bench (of Bishops) was influenced by interested motives, in opposing the project. But, he asked with confidence, and let the question be repeated to the country—what right had any man to impute to the Protestant Bishops sordid motives upon this question—he meant what grounds of history or of observation could be produced in proof? Were they motives of sordid and personal interest which induced the seven Bishops to oppose themselves to a Popish King? Did they embrace imprisonment, deprivation and persecution, rather than swerve from duty, because they were governed by feelings of the basest kind (hear, hear)? Ambition, indeed, it might be—that just and laudable ambition, which he trusted had not ceased to burn in the breasts of their less illustrious successors, who, nevertheless, might be equally willing to prove themselves the vigilant sentinels and intrepid champions of the Church, and, if need be, its martyrs (cheers). Interested motives might, with much more truth, be ascribed to some noble lords who avowed their support of this measure, from an apprehension of temporal consequences in the event of its rejection. A great deal had been said of the injustice and cruelty of debarring four or five millions of fellow-subjects of their indefeasible and inalienable rights; but if this question were to be determined upon principle, it made no difference whether the claimants were forty, or four millions. If concession were just let it be made to four men as well as to four millions; for, in a matter of mere justice, the element of numbers ought not to enter into the calculation. But what was the meaning of “indefeasible and inalienable rights,” which some had called civil, and others with more propriety, natural rights? Did any noble lord seriously mean to contend, that individuals possessed any rights which they were not liable, under peculiar circumstances, to be called upon to forego for the public good? Was not this principle recognized by our constitution, and to a degree that seemed to have escaped the notice of noble lords, who talked so loudly of the injustice of excluding from political power, a certain number of the King's subjects; for that after all was the real question. It seemed to him as unjust to exclude an individual from a share in the enactment of laws, merely because he had not a certain amount of property, as to exclude him because he professed tenets incompatible with the religion of the state. He could find no real difference between the two cases; and the only answer was, that in the one case the criterion of qualification was certain, and in the other uncertain; in both cases the civil right was concluded, because it was required by public expediency. The very same principle was recognized by the present measure. It appeared to him, that the right to have a voice in the legislature was not more sacred than that of having a voice in the election of legislators, and that to deprive any body of men of that right, was a greater violation of natural justice than to shut them out of the legislature entirely. Yet this was the very injustice which the advocates of the bill proposed to effect. The ablest supporters of civil right were obliged to admit that it was limited by expediency, and might be retracted or withholden. The Catholics themselves recognized this principle of exclusion in all their applications to Parliament, for their bills uniformly admitted the propriety of excepting the office of Lord High Chancellor in the proposed eligibility. But while some admitted the justice of a principle of exclusion, they denied that opinions ought to disqualify the individual for office: they said a man was no more answerable for his opinions, than for the colour of his hair, or his weight or strength. To this general assertion he could only reply, that there were peculiar and personal defects in the human mind for which it was the misfortune of the individual to suffer, although for them he was not morally responsible, and that the person must patiently endure the inconvenience for the sake of the community of which he was only part. So much upon the argument of general right. Then came the real question—whether the opinions of the Catholics were such as to disqualify them from certain civil rights, more especially those of a legislative description? This was followed by another question—whether the danger of the present crisis was so imminent as to call for the violation of an established constitutional principle, for the sake of avoiding it? Connected with these considerations was another—whether the proposed remedy was calculated to produce the supposed advantage? With respect to the last consideration, all he should say, was, that if there were one point clearer than another in the history of Ireland, it was—that up to the most recent date, the disturbed condition of that country had little connexion with the Catholic question. The wretched peasant was oppressed by a more malignant and exasperating, though not an incurable disease. One of the most distinguished witnesses who had been examined before the committee, had proved that the most exciting and proximate cause of disturbances in Ireland, had arisen from the extreme misery of the peasant, which required a different remedy from that now proposed. The property in the soil belonged, to a great extent, to absent proprietors, who intrusted the management of their estates often to unscrupulous agents. A system of exaction was engrained upon the mode of tenancy; one claim for rent was accumulated upon another, until an amount was squeezed from the soil more than the soil could fairly yield (hear, hear). Such a state of society could be improved by no such remedy as the present bill; it would require measures of a stronger and more efficacious character; it would require the introduction of a better religion, a purer administration of justice, a revision of the revenue laws, a general system of education; and last, though not least, a return of the proprietary of the country to the estates which they possessed within it (hear, hear). A relief from wreckless poverty, from barbarous superstition, and from inveterate insubordination, was the emancipation of which Ireland stood in need,

"To raise her wretched and degraded sons
From listless sloth and reckless poverty."

It was not till 1823 that the great mass of the Catholics of Ireland began to talk of Emancipation; and the meaning attached to the word by some of them was, a restoration of that property to their church of which it had been deprived at the Reformation; and by others, a recovery of the lands which had been forfeited at different periods of their history. Whichever of these opinions the mass of the Catholics entertained, they would be greatly disappointed at finding that this bill, if carried, would bestow upon them neither of the boons which they expected. He would not presume to say what effect that disappointment might produce; but be it what it might, it would owe its origin to that knot of political agitators, who had cast that leaven into the lump, which had disposed it to ferment, in order that whilst it was heaving and swelling, they might knead it at will to their own advantage (hear, hear). Until the Catholic Association commenced its operations, the Catholics of Ireland cared little about emancipation. Nor was that apathy on their part at all surprising, since what concerned only the advantages and privileges of a few, could not, without some adventitious aid, strongly interest the feelings of the many. That the desire of emancipation was not the leading cause of the disturbances which had so long distracted Ireland, appeared from this circumstance—that those disturbances had not diminished according to the relaxation of the penal code. It was lamentable to observe that those who, as well from their profession as from their situation in life, exercised an influence over the Catholic population, had not communicated to them the fact of such relaxations—for they were even ignorant of the fact—which might have proved a powerful motive for contentment. What was the cause of their conduct he would not pretend to say; it was in perfect keeping with the character of those, who, having distant objects in view, thought nothing of their triumph over preliminary obstacles; of men who considered the admission of the lay members of their church into the legislature as valuable only because it facilitated the recovery of the power which they had lost, and who deemed any thing short of that admission as utterly worthless and contemptible.

"Actum inquit, nihil est, ni Pæno milite portas

Frangimus, et mediâ vexillum pono Suburrâ."

Truly had their religion been described in the celebrated remonstrance against Popery presented by the House of Commons to James the First:—"It hath a restless spirit, and will strive by these gradations; if it once get but a connivance, it will press for a toleration; if that should be obtained, they must have an equality; from thence they will aspire to superiority, and will never rest till they get a subversion of the true religion" (hear, hear). He was satisfied that the subversion of the Protestant religion was the ultimate object of the Roman Catholic hierarchy, and that they would be satisfied with nothing else. The present bill, therefore, would not put an end to the distractions of the country; for if the lower orders of the Irish Catholics had any feeling at all upon the bill, it was one which went much further than the supporters of it supposed, and which the measure itself would by no means satisfy. A witness of the name of Macarthy had admitted, that even if this bill were passed, the question of Emancipation would still be made a handle of by political agitators. Could their lordships think that a handle would not be found in the few remaining exclusions to which they would be subjected, in the inferiority of the Catholic church, and in the want of that establishment which it had formerly possessed? He was persuaded that the object of the Catholic hierarchy was the subversion of the Protestant church, and the erection of their own upon its ruins; and he asked whether he could be blamed for opposing this measure, which, in his conscience, he believed would afford them every facility in accomplishing their object. They were all acquainted with the notions which had recently been promulgated with respect to church property;—they all of them recollected the readiness with which the Irish House of Commons passed that abominable law, respecting the tithe of agistment. Daring as that attack had been upon the property of the Protestant church of Ireland, it would be followed by still more daring attacks, when 20 or 30 Roman Catholic members should be seated in the lower house, forming a compact body upon all questions relating to tithes—a body, too, moving in the train of that portentous comet, which "from its horrid hair shook pestilence and war." He now came to that part of the question on which he conceived himself more competent to give an opinion—namely, the dogmas of the Roman Catholic church. A very distinguished member of the Catholic body had told the committee, that unless he conceived this measure would strengthen the Protestant church, he would not give it his support. Now, if that individual's opinion were to be taken as a criterion of the sentiments of the mass of the Catholics, he would say that nothing more fallacious could be imagined. He trusted that their lordships were not about to form their opinions of the feelings of the Roman Catholic population towards the Protestant church from the testimony of a few able Catholic advocates, guarded on all points, and perfectly untheorized to state the opinions of the great body to which they belonged. If they wished to learn the opinion of the great mass of the Catholics of Ireland, they must look to their public meetings, they must attend to their public orators, and to the topics which they selected, as going most directly to the hearts of their hearers; they must hear them denouncing the Protestant church of Ireland as a splendid evil, as a gorgeous pest, and as an incubus on the prosperity of the country; they must listen to the exclamations with which such language was received; and they must form their judgment from those circumstances, and not from the opinions of individuals who had a direct interest in the evidence they gave. To show the inflammatory nature of their speeches, he would quote a passage from a remarkable speech of Dr. Dromgoole, which was received with loud acclamations, and which had since been published in a book that had been carried to the Papal throne, and had been declared to be so able and so Catholic, as to be worthy a casket of cedar and gold. In that speech, Dr. Dromgoole, speaking of the Protestant church, had said, "She shall fall, and nothing but the memory of the mischief she has created shall survive her. Her time is nearly run; and when the day of her dissolution, which is at hand, shall arrive, shall Catholics be bound by the oath which she has imposed—an oath which, in their consciences, they believe to be improper?" And, in another passage, the learned Doctor said, "The Church of England is the eldest of these heretical sisters; I view with horror those sickly sprouts, and their degenerate branches; the time will come, when they shall be gathered up, and cast into the fire; and they shall burn!"—

Quâ stantes ardent, qui fixo gutture famant."

He believed that these sentiments pervaded the whole body of the Roman Catholic clergy. He once had thought that the Catholics had cast an eye upon the tithes of the Church; but he was now of opinion that they did not so much wish to appropriate them to their own use, as to take them from the Protestant church. In that opinion he was strengthened by the statement of a petition presented to the House of Commons, on the last day of May 1823, in which certain Catholics declared that they could not be satisfied without a repeal of the Union, the abolition of tithes, and the annulling of all corporations. The writer, calling himself J. K. L., said, "That Roman Catholics, as Roman Catholics, entertain no designs hostile to the Protestant church; but as individuals engaged in agricultural pursuits they are interested in taking away tithes from the Establishment." This appeared to him to be much the same as if a disappointed suitor in the Court of Chancery should go up to the learned lord on the wool-sack, and say,—“May it please your lordship, I bear no ill-will to you as Earl of Eldon; but as a disappointed suitor in the Court of Chancery, I hit you, as Lord Chancellor, a knock on the head” (a laugh). The same writer (J. K. L.) declared, that the efforts to amend Ireland had been regularly marred in consequence of the exertions of the Protestant church, and that all the murders which had stained the Irish annals, had been carried on under, or had been occasioned by her edicts. Yet this was the same church which had produced a priesthood, to whose zeal, activity, and forbearance, every witness who had been examined before the committee had borne testimony—a priesthood which, in the moral desolation of Ireland, remained the Goads of the desert, and gave to the eye some points on which it could rest with pleasure. He hoped that he felt no animosity towards the Catholics as a body; he hoped that he was not inclined to press hard upon an individual who, like himself, was human and liable to error; he hoped that he was not prone to use harsh language to any member of the same sacred profession to which he himself belonged; but there were emergencies on which truth ought to be spoken out; and he therefore now asked their lordships what weight they ought to attach to the evidence of a man—for this J. K. L. was understood to be no other than Dr. Doyle—who, after casting this poisoned arrow, and hurling this sportive firebrand into the Protestant church, thereby convicting himself at once of the bigotry of Rome, and of the ferocity of jacobinism, came down to the committee, with glowing words, to soften the calumnies he had uttered, and to “hint the fault, and to hesitate the dislike” which it was no longer expedient for him openly to avow. He would now pass by a natural transition from Dr. Doyle to the Pope (a laugh). He contended that the distinction between the Pope’s supremacy in things temporal and in things spiritual existed only in theory. Every Catholic allowed that the Pope had an ecclesiastical supremacy; and that supremacy involved in it certain temporal jurisdictions. Did not the Pope nominate to all the ecclesiastical benefices in Ireland—to bishoprics from 500*l.* to 1500*l.* and 3000*l.* a year; and had he not, by such nomination, a well disciplined army of 3000 ecclesiastics in that country ready at any moment to work his bidding—as army, whose generals he appointed, and who, if they were not the partisans, had at least been the nominees, of a Pretender to the British throne? The Romish Church claimed a power, a sort of ultima ratio Papæ, by which subjects were released from their allegiance by a Bull somewhat similar to that issued by Pius VII. to the French people, releasing them from their allegiance to the Bourbon family. There had been three comparatively modern examples of the exercise of this power. The first occurred in 1643, when the subjects of Charles I. were released from their allegiance by a Bull obtained in Ireland; a second in 1729, when the subjects of George II. were released from their allegiance by a Bull also obtained in Ireland; and the third was the instance he had just referred to, of the Bourbons and Pius VII. He acknowledged that these bulls were mere bruta fulmina—that they were mere empty displays of power (hear, hear! from the Opposition); but empty as they were, they had not been without their effect upon conscientious Catholics. Dr. Doyle had admitted that the Pope, in a rescript to Vienna, in 1809, had said that he still possessed the power to depose princes, though it was not at present convenient to exercise it. He would always contend that such a doctrine disqualified the holder of it from a seat in a Protestant legislature. He knew that Dr. Doyle had declared, that though this doctrine was embodied in the decrees of several councils, it had now become obsolete and disused. He was afraid that it was only as obsolete and disused as the strength of a tiger, whose claws were pared, but whose savage disposition remained untameable; or, as a sword, which rusted in the scabbard, because you would not give your enemy an opportunity to draw it and to plunge it into your own bosom. The doctrine, he repeated, was believed by conscientious Catholics, and all other Catholics were unworthy of legislative indulgence. He had a few words to say upon another offensive doctrine of the church of Rome; and that, not only because it had never been disavowed by the leaders of that church, but because it was now publicly taught in the religious college of Maynooth. The doctrine to which he alluded related to the inviolability of oaths. He thought that no man, who reflected for a moment on the appeal to Heaven which was made in taking an oath, could assent to the power of any human being to absolve him from it; and yet, a contrary doctrine was preached in the college of Maynooth, and promulgated, in Dr. James Butler's book, under its authority. It was there stated that an unjust oath was not binding; and after laying down that position, it was asked, "What is an unjust oath?" "An oath that is injurious to God, my neighbour, and myself." That was a doctrine very different from that of the book which said, "The just man who sweareth to his neighbour, disappointeth him not, though it be to his own injury." He had now stated the principal reasons which induced him to withhold his consent from this measure. Instead of being calculated to heal dissension and abate animosity, he thought it comprehended in itself abundant materials for civil commotion. It was, besides, an inroad upon the constitution we had received from our ancestors, and would serve as a stepping-stone to the Catholic to scale the walls of the Protestant establishment, and invade its most sacred interests. When, however, he said this, he was bound to give his testimony to the meekness, candour, and liberality of the Catholic clergy with whom he was acquainted; and he would add, that in his own diocese there was a Catholic gentleman, of large fortune, worthy—he said it in candour—of a better faith, who had supported a national school for many years near his own residence, entirely at his own expense (hear, hear). Their lordships, however, lived in times when it was not easy to predict the consequences of any given measure. But he placed great reliance on that benign Providence which had hitherto sheltered the Protestant Church, and which, so long as it performed its duty to the country, would not withdraw its support from it. They were, however, bound to act according to the dictates of human wisdom, and so acting, he could not see why they should pass this bill to guard against a contingent danger, or why they should sacrifice a single security to satisfy a problematical necessity. These were some, but not all the reasons, which induced him to give a conscientious vote, in opposition to the measure (loud cheers).

The Earl of Limerick defended the gentry of Ireland from the sweeping charges brought against them by the rt. rev. prelate who had just sat down, in a speech which seemed to him unequalled for intolerance and violence. The rt. rev. prelate had attributed many of the evils which desolated Ireland to the absence of her gentry; why had he so carefully abstained from noticing the absence of her clergy? There was a wide difference between absentee landholders and absentee clergymen. The former would be slaves; were they compelled a ways to reside on their estates; but the latter was bound to reside upon their livings, because they received payment from the state on condition of doing so. The rt. rev. prelate had used language which could not fail to irritate all classes of people in Ireland, and had all but advised the making of interminable war upon the Catholic part of it. There was a rt. rev. prelate near him, who had given him a noble example to imitate. That rt. rev. personage, in a speech full of eloquence, wisdom, and Christian piety, had pointed out to him the duties of Christian benevolence (hear, hear). Instead, however, of following his venerable brother, the rt. rev. prelate had started off in the opposite direction. The difference between the two was extreme;—look on this picture, and look on that. The rt. rev. prelate seemed to say to the house, "Meddle not with the Ark of the Lord, or with its anointed"—that was, its treasure (a laugh). He had said, that the Catholic bishops of Ireland were nominated by the Pope. This was not the case. Three persons were nominated by the Irish Bishops, and the Pope was obliged to select one of them. There was no Catholic bishop in Ireland with a revenue of 3,000l. a year! Whence was such a revenue to be derived? 'Not from see lands, not from fines, but from the parish in which the bishop resided. And how was his revenue collected? From the poor under his care, in sixpences, and shillings, and half-crowns—paltry sums which the rt. rev. prelate opposite would not like to have his income eked out in (hear, hear). The duty, too, of the Irish bishop was admirably performed—none of them were to be found in Cheltenham (hear)—none in London (hear). They were present with their flocks, in health and in sickness, and were at all times ready to afford them every consolation in their power. The idea that such men were not to be believed upon their oaths, was ridiculous. He apologised to the house for the unpremeditated sentiments he had offered to its notice; but he should have held himself wanting in duty to his country as an Irishman, if he had allowed the asserctions of the rt. rev. prelate to go forth without contradiction.

The Marquis of Lansdown began by observing, that the rt. rev. prelate (of Chester) had laid it down, that the enjoyment of every civil right should be regulated by expediency. Now if the rt. rev. prelate rested his objections on that ground, he was, in all his other arguments, combating with a shadow; for if the ground of political expediency existed, the discussion on the theological grounds was unnecessary. If, however, as he was prepared to contend, the expediency for excluding six millions of people from their civil rights had long ceased to exist, it must follow that they ought to be admitted to the enjoyment of those rights which were theirs in common with all other British subjects. He would contend, that not only had the expediency of exclusion long since ceased, but that a regard for the security of property, for the peace of the country, and for the stability of the Church itself, dictated the propriety of putting an end to the system of exclusion. The rt. rev. prelate had said, that in the course of his recent studies, he had found reason to change his opinions on this question, in consequence of certain evils connected with the state of Ireland; but he had not informed their lordships how many of those evils had arisen out of the nature of the Catholic disabilities, nor how a remedy should be applied without removing those disabilities; he had not stated how they were to acquire in Ireland a Catholic gentry and yeomanry without a system by which the one and the other might be protected and conciliated. The rt. rev. prelate, in enumerating the causes which produced the disturbed state of Ireland, had overlooked one circumstance which he might have remembered—that in that country there was the singular anomaly of a Church Establishment which did not represent the religion of the great body of the people (cheers). How would he apply any remedy which would secure the stability of that church without embracing a measure that would conciliate the great body of the people? If they wished to preserve the Church Establishment in that country, if they wished to ensure stability to its Government, their measures must be bottomed on the affections of the great mass of the people (hear, hear). The rt. rev. prelate, while he deprecated any attacks on the motives of individuals, had indulged himself in a great latitude that way, and had made a serious charge on the great body of the Irish Catholics. He charged them with a desire to overturn the Church Establishment, and to regain possession of the forfeited estates. But on what authority did he make that charge? On the authority of a Protestant witness (hear, hear), in opposition to every tittle of evidence which had been given on the subject by Catholic bishops and priests, as well as every member of the Catholic laity who had been examined before their lordships' committee. Surely the rt. rev. prelate could not have read the evidence; for Protestants and Catholics concurred in stating that no property was considered more secure than the forfeited estates, and indeed in one respect they were more valuable than other property, inasmuch as they had a clearer title. If any facts were necessary in support of the oaths of the Catholics on this subject, it would be found in their practice; for those Catholics whose wealth had enabled them to purchase property, had, to a great extent, become the purchasers of those very forfeited estates (hear, hear). Would it be supposed they were anxious to invalidate the rights of those from whom they derived their own by purchase? Yet it was on such grounds that the rt. rev. prelate had rested his tender apprehensions for the security of those Protestants who now held forfeited estates (hear, hear). It was true, that one of the grounds on which he himself supported the present bill, was, the insecurity to which Irish property would be exposed from its refusal; but the insecurity which he dreaded was that which must ever exist where discontent prevailed among the great body of the people. The rt. rev. prelate, in his remarks on the conduct of certain individuals in Ireland, had observed, that no feeling of discontent prevailed in the country until the Catholic Association was formed. Did he take into consideration the causes which produced that Association? Why were there none such in this country? Because no ground for similar discontent existed; because no feeling of such injustice to the great body of the people prevailed—a feeling which, while it was suffered to remain, would be daily breaking out into new forms, until the great question which produced it was set at rest. The rt. rev. pre- late had quoted many violent opinions with respect to the Church of England, which he commented upon, and condemned as the opinions of the great body of the Catholics. Many of those opinions had been quoted from a speech delivered by a Dr. Dromgoole, some ten or fifteen, or perhaps twenty years ago, for he really did not recollect. Upon these the rt. rev. prelate had fastened, and taking them as articles of the Roman Catholic faith, had urged them as arguments against the bill before the house. Was this fair? Was it treating the Catholics with common justice, to fasten upon them doctrines which they disavowed, merely because they happened to be used by one of their body? Their lordships had heard of the writings of a rev. bart. of the Church of England, the Rev. Sir Harcourt Lees. Would the rt. rev. prelate approve of those writings? Would he subscribe to all the opinions they embraced? Would he even approve of the principles contained in some of the petitions presented on this subject? Would he be disposed to sanction all those principles as doctrines taught by the Church of England? Undoubtedly not. Why, then, should he use a mode of reasoning towards others which he would think it unjust to have applied to himself? Why should he condemn men by attributing to them opinions and doctrines which they wholly disavowed (hear, hear)? But to revert to the ground of expediency. If the question were allowed to rest on that ground, there was an end of the objection respecting transubstantiation, and other doctrinal points—there was an end to the objection resting on the belief of the spiritual supremacy of the Pope, beyond how far that belief was calculated to operate on six millions of people so as to disqualify them from the enjoyment of their civil rights. He would readily consent to view this measure as one of expediency; and taking advantage of the rt. rev. prelate's admission, that the spirit of Protestantism was never more prevalent in the country, since the Reformation, than it was at present, he would ask, if that were true, what need had the Church of England to bear on the crutches of the penal code? What had the Protestant Church to apprehend if this bill were passed; or what had it to gain by its refusal? He had expected, that when the rt. rev. prelate spoke of his recent studies on this subject, he would have stated to their lordships facts connected with the present opinions and conduct of the Catholics. Instead of this he had stated that bulls had been sent over by a Pope to depose Geo. II. It was true, the rt. rev. prelate admitted that these bulls had had no effect; but he added, that they affected the minds of the Catholics, though they did not arm their hands. Now he was prepared to contend that those very bulls, and the reception they met with in this country, were the strongest proof of the truth of what Dr. Doyle had given in evidence—that there was a line drawn by Catholics between the ecclesiastical and temporal power of the Pope—a line which a noble lord (Colchester) could not see—a line, beyond which if the Pope attempted any act of temporal power in this country, the obedience of the Catholic ceased. When the allegations of their own doctrines and opinions were not allowed, it was right to put in the conduct of the Catholics of this country, where their rights were limited, and in others where they were not restricted, in order to show, that their allegations were borne out by their practice. The Catholic religion was so dark and hidden, so lost in the obscurity of past ages, as to be traced out only by the research of the antiquarian. Its present tenets of doctrine and discipline were well defined and understood. Why, then, was it necessary to go for objections to the Catholic religion as it now existed, to the tenets which might have been held in it centuries ago! Suppose a lecturer on electricity or astronomy were to say to his hearers—"You must not attend to the state of the atmosphere, or the appearance of the heavens, but you must look to the principles adopted by the ancient founders of these lectures—go to the first volume of the Philosophical Transactions, and there you will find what you must take to be the present state of the science." Would not such doctrine be deservedly held up to contempt—would it not argue in the lecturer an utter ignorance of the present state of science? It would be equally unjust to argue the question before their lordships without reference to the actual state and opinions of the Catholics as they existed at the present day. True philosophy, as Bacon said, was the art of interpreting nature: and a legislator should adapt his measures to the condition of men as they then existed, and not to that in which they might have been at a former period. Let their lordships look at the conduct of Catholics in the different states of Europe and America, and see whether it bore out the allegation that they were hostile to a free constitution, or were found disloyal subjects when in the service of Protestant princes. Their fidelity to Protestant princes had been proved in every Protestant state in Europe; their attachment to a free constitution was proved by their conduct in America, and their disposition to admit religious liberty—by the readiness with which the state of Maryland, composed principally of Catholics, admitted the most tolerant regulations with respect to religious worship. He appealed to the learned lord on the woolsack, whether, in the course of his official experience, he had ever known of any Catholic minister or general who had betrayed the secrets of a Protestant prince, or swerved from his allegiance or duty in obedience to the Pope? And yet in the United States of America, and in the States of Holland, no obstacle was offered to the Catholics taking a part in the government of the country; and even the subjects of a despotic King of Prussia, and of a despotic King of Denmark, lived in the hope of being called into every situation that could gratify their ambition. But in England every thing was different; the Catholic faith was considered to be in opposition to the Established Church, and it was, therefore, in vain for any one who professed that faith to endeavour to increase their knowledge, or improve themselves in any branch of learning; their creed formed an insuperable barrier, excluding them from all honours and all dignities (hear, hear). He himself was a conscientious professor of the Established Church, and he would give it as his firm opinion, that the surest way of strengthening that church was by forming an union of conciliation with the Church of Ireland (hear, hear). It was the custom to speak of the opinions given by the rt. rev. prelates in that house as infallible; and certainly, if that house were engaged during its task of legislation in the articles of religion, or in giving effect to any peculiar doctrine he should be inclined to bow to their authority. No man could listen with more reverence than he did to the arguments and opinions of those rt. rev. prelates; but when the question was no longer the choice of any particular doctrines but what would be their effect on the opinions of men, he confessed that he could not help suspecting that the votes of bishops might be as fallible, and perhaps even more fallible, than those of other lords; owing to the peculiar bias that their minds experienced on matters at all connected, however remotely, with religion. If he might be allowed to give an example of the false prophecies that that house had from time to time witnessed, he would mention the period when it was proposed to introduce into that house sixteen Scotch peers. That proposition was no sooner started than it was heavily denounced by several rt. rev. prelates, who used pretty much the same language about it as was used by their successors on the question of Catholic Emancipation. The alarm was taken, and it was asserted that the whole nation were to be turned into Presbyterians by the sixteen noble lords; and one bishop, in the warmth of his zeal for the Protestant establishment, went so far as to compare the introduction of sixteen Presbyterians into the house to the mixture of so many foreign ingredients in the caldron, which would have the certain effect of making it boil over till it burst. Yet, in spite of all this remonstrance and invective, it was a curious fact, that in the history of the majorities of the house, the bishops and the Scotch peers were almost invariably found to vote together; nor did it appear that there was at the present time one single Presbyterian more than there was the day the measure was carried. Another instance that he would quote was the circumstance of the repeal of the sacramental test in Ireland about a century ago; on that occasion a man whose wit, whose talent and whose intellect could not be doubted—he meant the great Dean Swift—had been so far led away by prevailing opinion, that he ventured to prophesy, that if that test were once repealed in Ireland the religion of that country would be entirely changed, and the whole of the inhabitants would become Presbyterians. After some years had elapsed, the sacramental test was repealed, and their lordships very well knew that there followed no attempt to introduce the Presbyterian religion, and that it had not increased in numbers. In the early part of his late Majesty's reign, a bill was passed for the relief of his Catholic subjects in Canada. The introduction of the measure caused a great clamour, and an eminent Divine published his opinion in the same vein of happy prophecy to which he had already alluded, that the measure would introduce the supremacy of the Pope into Canada, to the great disturbance of his Majesty's Government, and to the final throwing off their allegiance, so that the French court would be able, through the assistance of the Pope, to separate them from the other States of America. Let them look at the result. The intrigues of the French king were indeed employed to detach the States from the allegiance they then owed to the sovereign; but where was it that those intrigues had succeeded? In the States professing the Presbyterian faith, while Popish Canada remained true and loyal to King George III. Yet now their lordships were to be told that no trust could be put in the Roman Catholics (hear, hear). The cause, however, of Emancipation was visibly advancing, and he was sure that the house would at length be absolutely forced into the deliberation of the real question, which was, whether Parliament would chuse to return to the old system of governing the Catholics by coercion, or complete that system of conciliation which had already been so fortunately undertaken? Conciliation had in part been tried, and had in part flourished in proportion; and he would assert, though it was in opposition to the declaration which had fallen from the rt. rev. prelate who had just spoken, that the people of Ireland were essentially improved in their moral and religious condition, and that conciliation had already produced the most beneficial effects. It remained for the Church of England to assist in making the concessions which the Catholics still claimed; and it would be more becoming of that church to be a little more confident in her own strength, and to consider, whether, in ceding rights to another religion, she was in any way diminishing her own privileges; or, whether it would not probably be the means of gaining new friends, and increasing that admiration which it was his pride to believe other religions entertained for the Church of England (hear, hear). He would conclude by reading the opinion of some of the greatest men that England had ever produced—Lord Somers, Lord Peterborough, the Bishop of Salisbury, and the Duke of Devonshire; who had laid it down as their opinion, that an Englishman could not be reduced to a more unhappy condition than that of being put by the law in an incapacity of serving his king and country, and therefore nothing but a crime of the most detestable nature ought to put him in such a situation.—In giving his support to the present measure, he wished it to be most thoroughly understood, that he was not concurring at any other measure that had been passed during the present Session. He supported the bill upon its own merits. He did not imagine that it would form a panacea for all the evils of Ireland, but he thought that it would lead to those further measures, towards which alone she could look for improvement or lasting tranquillity (hear, hear).

The Earl of Liverpool observed, that the situation in which the house stood with respect to this question was equally novel and inconvenient. In consequence of events which had transpired prior to the assembling of parliament, the house had found it necessary to pass an act for putting down the Catholic Association, and also to institute an inquiry into the state of Ireland generally—an inquiry which had also been entered upon by the other house. Now, he should certainly, under such circumstances, have thought it right to await the result of those inquiries, and at all events to legislate only upon a full investigation of the subjects. No such course, however, was adopted by the promoters of the present measure. The bill was brought in without waiting one moment for intelligence: nor was it the mere bill before them that was brought forward. Two others were got up with equal haste and inconsiderateness, some of the provisions of which might go perhaps to alleviate the evils belonging to the main measure, but of which others seemed no less likely to increase them. It was not one measure of change that was proposed, but three. This course might answer the purpose of some advocates of the Catholics; it might serve, as it was meant to do, to catch a few stray votes on the right or the left; but in what sort of situation was the House of Lords placed by such proceeding? He desired to know what it was expected that the House of Lords should do. The House of Commons put them in this condition—it sent them up a bill which they knew not how to act by; having purchased a majority for that bill below, by the introduction of other measures. He had never before met with so disgraceful a proceeding in the course of his parliamentary life. At least, they ought to know what it was they had to decide upon—whether it was the single measure submitted to them, or that measure as connected with two others? For himself, perhaps, this question was one of slight consideration; for he detested, from the very bottom of his heart, the bill already before the house. A great part of it he took to be nonsense; some of it was even rather worse. The least objectionable part of the bill was the proposed concession to the Catholics; for upon that subject he would be content to put one short question to the house—would they grant it or not? If they replied in the affirmative, he would engage to draw a bill for the purpose in half an hour, which should not be liable to a tenth part of the objections which applied to that now upon the table. But would the house, or would it not, remove the Catholic disabilities? That question, perhaps one of the most important that parliament had ever undertaken to decide, could not too soon be treated in such a manner as to place it on a firm and solid basis. The noble lords opposite maintained, that it was right to grant concessions; because the Catholics were entitled to equal civil rights and immunities with their Protestant brethren. That was the plain proposition of the advocates for Emancipation; and he would deal plainly with it, for he met it with a decided negative. The Catholics were not entitled to equal rights in a Protestant country. Upon some points he had been favourable to the Catholics; he did not know but there were others upon which he might still be so; but upon the broad principle—that they were entitled to equal rights—he and their friends were at issue. He admitted—no man could dream of denying it—that all subjects in a free state were entitled to equal rights, upon equal conditions; but then the Catholics, who demanded equal rights with their Protestant fellow-subjects, did not afford equal conditions. The difference was stated in a moment—the Protestant gave an entire allegiance to his Sovereign; the Catholic a divided one. The service of the first was complete; that of the last only qualified; and unless it could be proved that a half was equal to the whole, he could not yield to the Catholic claims. Thus, therefore, he took his stand upon the broad principle of justice: he was content to argue the question, at present, as one of expediency; but he maintained that his opposition to the spirit of it was founded in principles of justice and common sense. It was said, that the practical effect of Catholicism should be looked at; and that the actual operation of that faith was very different from what some of its tenets seemed to point to in theory. Practically it was, that he wished to examine the question; and in no other way. He desired to say nothing about theological dogmas—to seek for no obsolete opinion: the doctrines upon which he would rely should be those laid down in evidence before the house. First, then, it was admitted unequivocally, both by Dr. Doyle and Dr. Murray, that the Pope had the supreme power of naming to the vacant dioceses. It was true, the Pope had been in the habit of attending, in his appointment, to the recommendation of the church of Ireland; but this was matter of mere courtesy or hazard; the power was distinctly in himself; and if he thought fit to appoint a foreigner—say, the foreigner of all Europe most obnoxious to the government or the country—that foreigner would be, and must continue, a Catholic bishop of Ireland. This fact had come out beyond dispute. During the lives of several of the later Princes of the Stuart family, the Pope had been in the habit of appointing Irish Roman Catholic bishops at their nomination. He might now appoint, in the same way, upon the nomination of France or Spain; and the individual so constituted would proceed to exercise influence, and most extensive temporal influence, within the British territories. The question was not, let the house recollect, as to the danger, or the degree of danger, which might attend the concession of these claims: the question was, whether it was fit that equal rights should be enjoyed by Catholics and Protestants? Immediate danger be apprehended none; but it was not always in the brightest or the calmest weather that the storm was farthest distant. When could the Established Church appear more secure than it had seemed at the restoration of Charles II.? Yet, within twenty years, it was threatened with total destruction by the machinations of a Popish prince. Seeing where the appointment of the heads of the Roman Catholic church lay in Ireland, it was impossible not to advert to the power—the temporal, the practical power, exercised throughout that country by the priesthood. The system of confession—the right of demanding it, for the act was not left to the will of the individual confessing—rendered the clergy masters of all the secrets of the community. The priest, receiving confession, was bound to secrecy not only as to crimes committed, but he was equally bound to secrecy as to crimes intended to be committed. Thus a Catholic clergyman, discovering, in confession, that there was a conspiracy on foot to blow up both houses of parliament, would not be justified in making known the fact. To take a simpler instance, if a man came to a place at which there were two roads, and a priest knew that if he took the right hand he would be murdered, and that by the left he might be saved—he would be guilty of a dereliction of duty if he gave that man a hint which might preserve his life. Differences such as these must of necessity prevent the Catholic and the Protestant from amalgamating. With respect to education, there was scarcely any possible mode by which Catholics and Protestants could unite in one system. There was none of this difficulty with other Dissenters; for, whatever were their shades of difference, they had the same foundation to build upon. In the same way it was allowed by Dr. Murray that marriages between Catholics and Protestants were altogether disallowed; that they were not permitted at all, except upon an undertaking that the children should be all brought up in the Catholic faith. Then, if there could neither be intermarriage, education in common, or any other description of domestic bond between the Protestants and the Catholics, how was it possible that kind feelings between the followers of the two persuasions could exist? The fault was not the fault of the Established Church; it was in the bigotry and intolerant spirit of the Roman Catholic religion. As a proof of the intolerance of that church, he would allude to the sentence of excommunication. To give a crust of bread, or a cup of cold water, to the proscribed party, though he were perishing for want, was a punishable crime. Many, no doubt, there were, among the Catholic priesthood, most virtuous and deserving men; but among so large a body there could not fail to be some of a very different character; and yet these men generally, it was stated in the evidence before the house, had more authority over the peasantry than their landlords. Now what guaranty could be given in such a case for Protestant security? He held—their lordships held—all the bills held, that a Protestant succession was the foundation of our constitutional system. If these measures should pass, the Protestant succession would not be worth a farthing. Much had been said of rights—indeffensible and natural rights. Now, speaking of a King's rights in the same sense, and no other, as that in which he would argue for the rights of a peasant, would it not be hard upon the King and the heir to the throne that they must be bound to the Protestant faith, while the chief-justice, the ministers and secretaries of state, might be Roman Catholics? Why was this? Where was the danger in having a Popish king or a Popish chancellor, if all the other executive officers might acknowledge the Pope? He thought there was less danger in a Popish chancellor, who might be removed at pleasure, than in a Popish chief-justice, who would hold the administration of the criminal law in his control, and could only be removed by a peculiar process of law in case of his dereliction. The house ought at once to meet this bill fully and unequivocally, and not to deceive the people; they ought at once to declare, that if the bill were to pass, Great Britain would be no longer a Protestant state. The first evil he should apprehend from its passing would not be immediate; but it would be infallible, and would come upon the country a manner little expected. It was not the immediate object of the Catholics to possess themselves of the property of the Established Church; they were too wary to proceed openly and directly in any such design. No, their object was, in the first instance, merely to diminish the property of the church. What was the language held by one of their authorities upon that very point?—That he did wish to decrease the magnitude of the possession of the church; but he wished it, not as a priest, but as an Irishman. Was any man so blind, or deaf—was any man so lost to all the benefits of experience, as not to know what such language really meant? The most insidious way in which the Catholics could possibly set about their work was to say, "Take the property of the Established Church, and give it to the public for the general benefit of the country." When once the property of the Protestant hierarchy was invaded by such an artful attack, it required but little wisdom to foretel what would befall the remainder of its rights. The grand maxim of the Catholics was, that if one church sank, the other must swim; destroy the Protestant Establishment, and the Catholic would flourish. There was nothing inconsistent in the evidence before the house, that they had no design or desire of attacking the Protestant Church; for the Catholics thought, that if they could destroy it by what they called legislative means, it was no destruction in the sense of their professions. To destroy that church was, however, their grand object; it was their oath, their every thing. Noble lords appeared to think, that by education, and by removing the impositions which were laid on the Catholics as to marriages, and as to government patronage, all dissensions between the two churches would cease; but the question was, whether the effect of this bill would not be to increase those dissensions (hear, hear)? The bill would leave the two parties where they were, except that by giving new powers to the Roman Catholics, it would be bringing them upon an equality, and thereby increase the discord. If it were possible to unite the Catholics and Protestants in one friendly mass, by any common system of education, he should applaud the effort to obtain so desirable a result; but separated as they were, and actuated by the spirit by which it was well known that so many on both sides were actuated, such a project was absolutely impossible. The very hope was visionary; and those who had the object at heart, and had introduced the present measure as a means, would find themselves egregiously deceived, if they were to carry the present measure. What was then the good which could result from this bill? Would it tranquillize, or tend to tranquillize Ireland? Great mistakes had arisen from the belief, that because Ireland had been in a very disturbed state, and because very objectionable measures had been resorted to for keeping that country in peace, that therefore all the disturbances had grown out of the Catholic disqualifications. But it was a proposition proved to the certainty of abstract demonstration, that the disturbed state of Ireland for the last twenty years, had had nothing whatever to do with the Catholic question. For twenty-five years the Insurrection Act had never been put in force in the province of Ulster, and yet that province was the great seat of religious animosities and violence, because the two parties were so nearly upon an equality. It had, on the contrary, been put in force in the south, where no religious dissensions whatever had existed, or at least, to the extent of disturbing the public peace. Absentees, combined with the minute subdivision of property, had occasioned an increase of population, to a most enormous extent; this had brought the country into a state of beggary, and from hence had sprung all the disorders of the state. This great evil, he was happy to say, was now curing itself. Dr. Doyle stated in his letters, that the population of Ireland was now positively decreasing. He perfectly agreed with the rt. rev. prelate (of Chester), that, whether the Catholics amounted to one, two, or three millions, made no difference, and ought to make no difference in the decision of this question. It was a great question that ought to be decided upon general principles, and extended views. But with respect to the number of Catholic subjects, the greatest exaggeration had been resorted to. A noble lord had stated that the Catholics of Ireland outnumbered the Protestants in the proportion of at least five to one; it was unquestionable, from accounts which could not be incorrect, that the proportion was not even three to one. With reference to the recent augmentation of the Catholics, it was equally well proved that the Catholics now bore the same proportion to the Protestants as they did in the time of Sir W. Petty. Their lordships had heard upon all occasions when this question was debated, that the Protestant subjects of foreign states enjoyed many advantages which were not enjoyed by the Catholic subjects of the English crown. He begged the house to consider that there were circumstances in the English constitution, growing out of the advantages of that constitution, which might make restrictions upon the Catholics more necessary than in absolute monarchies. But persons spoke as if the Irish Catholics were really deprived of all participation in the advantages of the constitution. He did not wish to undervalue what the present bill would give them; but without it, they still possessed more rights and privileges than any people of Europe, without any exception. He certainly could not carry his argument to America, where a man might pay any priest he liked, or no priest at all. Whatever might be the freedom of the polity of the United States, theirs was not the British constitution, nor was it the constitution which he wished Great Britain to possess. There was, therefore, no parity of argument between the two countries. The mass of the property in Ireland belonged to Protestants, whilst the mass of the population was Catholic. When concessions had hitherto been made to the Catholics, the cry had been that the house was granting a great boon to the people; but the present bill would have the directly contrary effect, for its object was to benefit only about forty or fifty individuals, who aspired to places of public trust, whilst it took away the civil rights of many thousands. The vote of the House of Commons, on the 29th April last, declared, "that it was expedient that provision should be made by law for the maintenance of the secular clergy of the Catholic religion in Ireland." This provision, in his opinion, was to all intents and purposes establishing by law the Roman Catholic hierarchy in its full pride and power. This was going at once to the very object of Catholic triumph; and those who had been the most alarmed, and had thought that such a state of things would grow out of the present bill, had never thought that it would have been done so openly. Was such a measure constitutional? Was it consistent with the rights and privileges of Protestants? It had been speciously argued, that the Catholic claims could not militate against the coronation oath: but that oath was created solely for religious purposes, and it was only by inferences that such an opinion could arise, for that oath was most positively to maintain the Church of England in all its rights and property. The Catholic church of Ireland was not like the Catholic church of England. The Catholic church of Ireland was an ancient church, with a jurisdiction, with bishops, priests, parishes and every other appearance of a regularly established church. He had a letter in his pocket, to prove that in Ireland the Catholic bishops would not even address the Protestant bishops by their legal titles, and in the Catholic almanacks, all that related to the Catholic church was printed in large letters, whilst what referred to the Established Church was printed in a small type.

The Catholic church showed a complete parity of jurisdiction with the Establishment. The house could not, therefore, conceive it possible to favour such a church with safety to the Church of England. He had argued the point upon a narrow principle, in order to convince the house that the present bill was totally incompatible with the first principles of the constitution. He could not bring himself to view it as a measure of peace and conciliation. Whatever it might do in this respect in the first instance, he was persuaded that its natural tendency would be to increase dissensions and to create discord, even where discord did not previously exist. He intreated their lordships to consider the aspect of the times in which they lived. It was their fate to hear doctrines openly promulgated, which were as novel as they were mischievous. The people were now taught in publications to consider Queen Mary as having been a wise and prudent Queen, and that the world had gained nothing whatever by the Reformation. Nay, more; it was promulgated that James the Second was a wise and virtuous Prince; that he fell in the glorious cause of religious toleration; and that three months before he abdicated the throne, he had put forth a most solemn declaration, that he never meant to injure, much less to subvert the Established Church, and this was published to the people of this country by grave Catholic divines. Could the house be aware of these facts, and not see that a great and powerful engine was set at work to effect the object of re-establishing the Catholic religion throughout these kingdoms—and if once established, should we not revert to a state of ignorance, with all its barbarous and direful consequences? Let the house consider what had been the result of that fundamental principle of the constitution which they were now called upon to alter with such an unsparing hand. For the last one hundred and thirty years, the country had enjoyed a state of religious peace, a blessing that had arisen from the wisdom of our laws. But what had been the fate of the country for the one hundred and thirty years preceding that period? England had been in a state of the most sanguinary religious contentions. The blessings of the latter period were to be attributed solely to the nature of those laws which had granted an equal toleration to all religions, while, at the same time, they maintained a just, reasonable, and moderate authority in favour of the Established Church. He could not view the present measure without the deepest apprehension, and he trusted that their lordships would not make any such desperate experiments upon the constitution, and upon a system under which the country had enjoyed such innumerable advantages (loud cheering).

The Earl of Harrowby rose to reply to the arguments of his noble friend (Lord Liverpool) not because they had made any impression upon his mind, but because they might possibly have had some effect upon the minds of others. He had disclaimed all intention of arguing the question upon a religious basis, and had considered it as a question involving the allegiance of the Catholic subjects. If those arguments were worth any thing, they went too far, for they would prove that every Catholic would hold but a divided allegiance between his Church and his Prince, and the whole history of the Catholic church would prove, that for centuries the Catholics had never acted upon any such principles. But granting these assertions and arguments, they amounted only to this, that the Catholics possessed a principle which the Pope might call into use against any civil government. If this were the fact, he need only ask what instances had occurred in modern history of the Pope having been able to avail himself of any such power? He would not go back to all the ancient creeds, and declarations of councils, on which so much had been said on former occasions. It had been said that the doctrines professed in those creeds, and promulgated by those councils, had not been distinctly disclaimed. Was it nothing that many of the most obnoxious of the doctrines in question had been disclaimed by high Catholic authority? Was the declaration of the Council in France in 1682, with Bossuet at its head, nothing? Was it nothing, that when the questions respecting those doctrines were put to all the great Universities of Europe thirty years ago, they expressed their surprise at the circumstance, and their indignation at the imputation involved in the supposition that they could really believe such doctrines? Was it nothing, that in the face of the public the principal leaders of the Roman Catholic church had abhorrently disclaimed such tenets? His noble friend had stated various grounds to shew, that Roman Catholics could not be good subjects of this, a Protestant state; but it might be shewn on the same grounds, that they could not be good subjects of any state. Among those was the doctrine of confession. He allowed that it was a monstrous doctrine. But in what way did it affect the security of the state? His noble friend ascribed the danger to the secrecy imposed upon the priest. But this secrecy, although it might render the priest guilty of misprision of treason, could make no change in the character of the subjects. The laity now confessed to their priests, because their priests were not at liberty to reveal the confession. If the priests were at liberty to reveal the confession, the laity would no longer confess; but would that make any difference in the existence of treason, or any other crime? Detestable, therefore, as the practice of secret confession undoubtedly was, its abolition would afford no security for the better discharge of the duties of good and faithful subjects by the people. He disapproved as much as his noble friend did of the Catholic doctrine of the non-circulation of the bible. But it should be remembered that that was the doctrine of a part of our own Church. An erroneous doctrine to him it certainly appeared to be; but was it to be held, that because the Catholics maintained such a doctrine, it was not fitting that they should enjoy equal civil rights with their Protestant fellow-subjects, many of whom maintained the same? It was the same with respect to the peculiar doctrines of the Catholics as to marriage, and the other sacraments of the Catholic church. He was quite at a loss to understand what there was in those doctrines so menacing to the safety of the country as to warrant the house in denying those by whom they were professed a participation in the civil privileges enjoyed by their countrymen. And besides, who was it that attached most importance to such doctrines? The peasantry. Who were most under the influence of the priesthood, by whom these doctrines were preached? The peasantry. To the peasantry concessions had been granted. On the contrary, on whom were these doctrines least operative? On the very description of persons whose civil disabilities the bill under consideration was intended to remove. If, therefore, the argument were worth any thing, the legislature had gone too far already; and what was worse, they had begun at the wrong end. To him it seemed that the relief now proposed might be much more safely afforded to men of enlarged minds, than the concessions which were formerly yielded to the description of individuals for whose benefit they were intended. With regard to the influence of the Pope, it was undoubtedly true that the Pope had greater influence in the nomination of bishops in Ireland than in their nomination in any other country in Europe. But did not the Pope exert that influence at present? If dangerous, was it not dangerous at present? If dangerous, would not that danger be counteracted by the concessions now proposed? It was an evil which in some respects the legislature could not diminish. They could not loosen the bonds of spiritual allegiance to the Pope. What then could they do? They might draw more closely the links of political attachment to the state (hear, hear). The true way of dealing with the supposed danger was to strengthen those ties which bind man to man, and the citizen to the government of his country (hear, hear). That what had been done already or might be hereafter done would act as a panacea for the evils of Ireland, he would by no means say. But he was quite prepared to say, that without the proposed measure Ireland would not be tranquillized. As to the fears from the introduction of Roman Catholics into Parliament, they appeared to him to be utterly nugatory. Nor could it be apprehended that a ministry would ever attempt to maintain itself by an alliance with the Catholic interest in Parliament; it was certain that any ministry endeavouring to sustain its tottering power by such means, would insure its speedy fall. With regard to the Established Church, it was unnecessary for him to make any profession of his attachment to it. If he felt that any danger was likely to result to the church from the proposed measure, he would encounter all the inconveniences which were to be apprehended from its rejection. But whence was this danger to proceed? From the exertions of physical force? That physical force was now in existence. From the bulls of the Pope putting that force into action? That the Pope might do now. Was the danger to proceed from legislative measures? There would be six or eight Catholic peers in that house. In the other House of Parliament, he understood from some quarters, that there might be three—from others, that there might be sixteen, but he would suppose that there might be fifty Catholic members. What could they effect? From all their efforts, he was persuaded that the Church would rest perfectly secure. The apprehensions, with respect to it, all related to a remote, contingent danger. To attack the Church in Ireland, would be to attack the Church in England. To attack the Church in both countries, was to attack the land-owners; and such an enterprise could never hope to be attended with the slightest chance of success. But suppose that any alleged alarm should prove well-founded; suppose that any real dangers to the Church should show themselves. A reference to the circumstances under which our ancestors had provided against those dangers, would show the facility with which they might be averted. Let their lordships recollect the circumstances of the latter end of the reign of Charles II. A concealed papist on the throne; a declared papist next heir; Louis XIV. suspected of that of which it was now known he actually was guilty, bribing the King of England to forward his views. Yet, under all these circumstances, our ancestors effectually guarded the Protestant Church from the dangers with which it was menaced; and why might not we or our posterity be equally able to guard it from similar dangers, should they present themselves? It had been said, that the leaders of the Catholics had created a disturbance in Ireland. The term "creation," implied the production of something new. Was disturbance new in Ireland? There it was; there it had been for centuries; and there, owing to the anomalous circumstances in which that country was placed, he feared it would long continue. As circumstances existed at present, it was the interest, or appeared to be the interest, of the leading minds of Ireland, to continue the existence of a state of discontent and disturbance. If to the higher classes of Catholics the door to the fair objects of ambition were opened, what temptation would they then have to keep up the agitation of the country? Was it probable that, having no wish unsatisfied, except the substitution of Roman Catholic bishops for the Protestant ones, they would, on that account, wage desperate war against the whole strength of the country? Such a thing was not to be believed. If it were to occur, the strength of the Protestant empire would be sufficient to beat it down. But, could any man say what would be the result of the disappointment of the Catholic hopes in the present instance; what venom that "hope deferred which maketh the heart sick," might infuse into the Catholic mind? Could any man say, what might be the result, if we were engaged in a foreign war, and with a country which would possess both the means and the inclination of attempting to seduce the loyalty of Ireland? It was the astonishment of all Europe that we did not seem to think it worth our while to guard against the possibility of dangers so extensive; and thereby to deprive our enemies of extensive means of annoyance. The decision of their lordships that night, if it should unfortunately be that which he feared he must anticipate, would be hailed with triumph by the rival powers of this country, who would see it in the seeds of our future weakness (hear, hear).

The Lord Chancellor said, he would not enter into the merits of the Catholic question, but would merely state his reasons for not agreeing to the measure now before their lordships. He did not understand how it happened that this bill came before that house in its present shape and form. He saw, from the votes of the other house, that it was connected with a bill which went to disfranchise a great number of the freeholders of Ireland, and he also observed from the same votes, that it was deemed expedient that the Government should pay the salaries of the Catholic clergy of that country. No person conversant with parliamentary practice could view these measures without perceiving that they were nearly connected with the present bill; and yet they were asked to decide on that bill without knowing what was to become of the two measures which were introduced with it. This, he must say, was not a proper mode of legislating; and if he had no other reason for opposing the bill before their lordships but the circumstance to which he had adverted, he would make his stand on that ground. From the period of the Union with Ireland, he never heard of this question being brought forward, without mention being made of ample security for the Protestant Church and Protestant Establishment. It had been his duty, from many circumstances, not to separate himself from the minister who conducted the affairs of Government at the period of the Union, on account of certain differences of opinion. That minister was favourable to the Catholic claims, and he had often asked him what were those securities which he intended to propose, and without which he had declared he would not agree to the measure of Emancipation? But, notwithstanding all his inquiries, he never could find what those securities were. Although there was a degree of ingenuity displayed in the manner in which this bill was drawn up, which he had hardly ever seen before in the composition of an act of Parliament, there was no variation in the preamble from former bills. That preamble contained—first, a solemn acknowledgment that the Protestant Establishment of this realm in church and state must be inviolably and permanently secured: then came an allegation that they were so secured. He allowed that they were secure, provided the acts which rendered them so were permitted to continue in force; but if their lordships took away the substance of those acts, where was the inviolability of their security? He then alluded to the provisions in the bill for regulating the intercourse with the see of Rome, and said that the title “pack of nonsense,” by which his noble friend had described it, was full as respectable a one as it deserved. What security against the influence of Rome, was afforded by three commissioners, who themselves refused to acknowledge an undivided allegiance to the sovereign? He (the learned lord) had taken a positive oath, by which he bound himself to deny the spiritual or temporal jurisdiction of any foreign prince, potentate, or prelate within these realms, which, so help him God, he would not violate. It was true that some-where an interpretation had, he understood, been put on that spiritual jurisdiction by two eminent lawyers, one English, the other Irish, which he undoubtedly did not understand. As a privy counsellor he had also taken an oath to defend and maintain entire and inviolate the supremacy and prerogative of his sovereign. He had also taken the oath of allegiance. He knew that it might be said his mind was fettered by the trammels of a lawyer, but he had the authority of Lord Hale, to state that the oath of allegiance was erected to dissipate the different constructions that were put on the oath of abjuration, which, though not created, was restored by that enactment. Under the sense of these obligations, he should oppose any measure which derogated from the supremacy of his sovereign. It was out of his mind to understand what a jurisdiction merely spiritual meant. If, by a spiritual jurisdiction, the marriage of a Protestant with a Catholic was set aside, though the courts of civil law of this country compelled the parties to continue in wedlock, he would ask was that a spiritual or temporal jurisdiction (hear, hear)? The discussion of the present measure required a much larger field than its advocates gave it. It must be considered in connexion with the disfranchisement of the freeholders, and the provision for the Catholic clergy of Ireland. They could not refuse to English Catholics what they granted to the Irish: and then they would be bound to put the other Dissenters in this country, on an equal footing with the Catholics; so that ultimately all the bulwarks and fences which their ancestors had provided for the safety of the Protestant Church would turn out to be wholly useless. As to the measure for giving salaries and stipends to the priests of the Roman Catholic church, if they granted them in Ireland, they could not refuse to support a similar hierarchy in England. If they gave this stipend to the Catholic hierarchy, it would be impossible to refuse a seguim denum to the clergy of the Dissenters. They had heard much of the constitution of the States of America. He trusted that the experiment that had been made in that country of a government without a religious establishment, might, for the peace of its people, succeed; but it was not because such an experiment was on trial, that he would agree to surrender the rights and security of that church establishment in this country, which had contributed so essentially to its glory, prosperity and happiness (hear, hear). With respect to the other measure which it appeared was to accompany the accomplishment of the present bill, he meant the disfranchisement of the forty shilling freeholders comprising thousands of his majesty's subjects—if it were true that that measure was brought forward with a view to catch the votes for another bill, which went to obtain an extension of civil rights for a few, it did in that light appear to him most objectionable. Some noble lords might term him a reformer. As for the bill for the disfranchisement of Irish freeholders, if it had any connexion with the present measure, the house ought to have it before them. If what a noble friend of his had stated was correct, it certainly went a great way to diminish his respect for the bill which had come from the House of Commons. They were not justified in taking away the civil rights of persons, which had been conceded to them upon the supposition that they were competent to exercise them. He had lived too long to attach much respect to the character of a Reformer; a term which united revolutionists and republicans with some of the best persons in the kingdom. He then insisted that the sentiments of an infinite majority of the people of this country were unfavourable to the bill. He should be sorry to say that the House of Commons did not represent the sense of the people; but he well recollected when the East India bill passed the House of Commons, against which numerous petitions had been presented, it was then, as it was now, contended that the people approved of the measure. Then, however, unluckily for that assertion, there came a general election. The House of Commons, after that election, was differently constituted; and the result proved, that what was alleged to be the decision of the people of this country turned out to be a delusion. He felt that, in the few observations he had made, he had not, at that advanced hour of the morning, expressed himself as clearly as he wished, but he should conclude with assuring their lordships, that after twenty-five years' deep consideration of the subject, he could not, consistently with his sense of duty, and the station which he held under the crown, support the present bill (hear, hear).

The house then divided, when the numbers were,

Content—Present, 84—Proxies, 46—Total, 130.

Not-Content—Present, 113—Proxies, 65—Total 178.

Majority against the bill, 46.

COMMONS, THURSDAY, MAY 26.—Mr. Spring Rice rose to move an address to his Majesty, praying that he would direct copies of all despatches received from the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, respecting the origin, nature and extent of the religious animosities in that country, to be laid on the table of the house. He said that in doing so he should carefully abstain from any topics that were calculated to irritate and inflame. He must, however, advert to the proceedings of that house during the present session, in order to show that he had parliamentary ground for his motion. If he had made his present motion at the beginning of the session, it might have been unwise in the house to have acceded to it. At that time they all expected that Ireland would form the prominent subject of their deliberations. The subject had been recommended to their consideration by the Speech from the Throne and had been brought under their notice by the inquiries which had been subsequently conducted elsewhere. But the case was now entirely altered. The close of the session was now at hand; and after all the parade of professions which had been made towards Ireland, what measure had really been enacted to promote her welfare, or redress her grievances? An act to extinguish an association, which comprised within it all ranks and classes of Catholics, was the only act which the legislature had bestowed upon Ireland. After they had thus legislated against the whole mass of Catholics, what had been the conduct of that body? They had submitted in silence to the measure; they had done more—they had given to the law a wider construction than its letter seemed to import. They had ceased entirely to assemble as a deliberative body. He mentioned that circumstance to show that the Catholics deserved well of the house; but he should be acting unfairly, if he concealed the fact that their acquiescence in the law was derived from a very different source than their satisfaction with the law itself. They were full of hope that in consequence of the inquiries which were going on, the truth would be elicited as to their views and principles; and they thought that if that object were accomplished, justice would apply to their grievances the necessary remedy. After those inquiries had proceeded for some time, the Catholics received from that house the reward of their good conduct; their cause gained ground not only in that house, but in all the enlightened classes of the country. The bill, which had occupied so much of their attention during the present session, was carried to a second reading with increased majorities. That occurrence kept the hopes of the Catholics alive that their condition would be bettered before the end of the session; and those hopes were not diminished by the conduct of those who opposed them in the House of Commons; for a conciliatory tone had been adopted by the opponents of Emancipation in that house, which made those who sought it regret that such talent had been arrayed against them—which rendered the defeat of the Catholics less dangerous in Ireland, and even made refusal graceful and dignified (hear, hear). The bill proceeded to a third reading, and was finally passed. What happened next? That bill, which had been twice passed in the House of Commons—which had been twice placed by his rt. hon. friend near him (Sir John Newport) in the hands of the Lord Chancellor, which went up to the Lords supported by a great mass of the Protestant feeling in Ireland, was unceremoniously rejected on its second reading by the other House of Parliament. He would not comment improperly on the conduct of that branch of the legislature. If he were to state that the conduct of the House of Lords had placed the House of Commons in a disgraceful situation, he knew that the Speaker would tell him that his language was too strong. If he were to say that the proceedings of the other house were foolish, that they were mere nonsense and trash, he knew that the Speaker would tell him that his language was not such as a member of one house of Parliament ought to use of another (hear, hear). It would therefore be sufficient for him to say, that the two Houses of Parliament were at issue with each other upon a question which involved no less a subject than the happiness of Ireland and the stability of England. That being the case, should the House of Commons pause where it was? Should it abandon its efforts in behalf of Catholic Emancipation; or fortify the case it had already made out with such evidence, and place it in so unquestionable a light as would render it acceptable even to the House of Lords? He thought they should take the latter course, and prove by evidence and authority that they were right in the view which they had taken of this great question, and that the House of Lords was wrong. This was not like a difference of opinion on a Silk bill; it was not like a question whether satins or ribbons should be manufactured in Spitalfields or in Yorkshire. It was a question of vital importance, on which the two houses ought to come to some conclusion. He did not know how this could be better effected than by the evidence and authority of the individual who had been sent over as the King's representative to administer the affairs of Ireland. He thought that Lord Wellesley as an eye-witness was better qualified than any other man to give an account of the civil animosities of Ireland, with their consequences. He thought, too, that the opinion of Lord Wellesley would have great weight with the parties with whom he had to deal; with the Cabinet which had appointed him, and with the House of Parliament to which he had so long been an ornament (hear, hear). It was not sufficient to tell him that Lord Wellesley had frequently stated his opinions on the condition of Ireland in the House of Peers, and that there could, therefore, be nothing new in his despatches. That was not the fact. The opinions which Lord Wellesley had expressed in the House of Peers were the opinions of an individual peer who had been long resident in India, and removed from all association with Ireland. He wanted the opinions of Lord Wellesley, the King's deputy in Ireland—he wanted his opinion of that country after he had governed it for four years under circumstances of greater difficulty than any which had ever fallen to the lot of former governors, and after he had by his government conferred upon it greater good than all of them put together. But it might be said, that he had no right to assume the existence of such despatches as those for which he had moved. He contended that every probability was in favour of their existence; and he put it to the house, that in such despatches a distinct opinion must have been given one way or the other, as to the necessity of Catholic Emancipation. It was impossible to touch upon any Irish question, without meeting the Catholic question (hear, hear). How then was it possible for Lord Wellesley, who from his situation was bound to give an account to the Cabinet of the distresses of Ireland, their causes and their remedies, to have written a single despatch without giving an opinion upon this question? It was that opinion he wanted. He wanted it to show that the recent majorities of the House of Commons had been right in passing the Catholic bill; and he therefore called upon the individuals who had formed those majorities to support his motion, in vindication of their own conduct. But, supposing that there were no such despatches, then he said that Lord Wellesley should be examined before the House of Lords. A crisis had arrived, which required the appearance of that illustrious nobleman upon the scene. If he had followed the course most congenial to his own mind, he should have pressed such a motion upon the house: but he was told that if he did press it, he would be met by a declaration that the presence of Lord Wellesley could not be spared from Ireland. When he considered the consequences of the rejection of the late bill, he had not alone to deplore hopes deferred, but principles avowed, which, when taken in their full and legitimate extent, amounted to a denunciation of all concession to Ireland, and which, pushed to their legitimate conclusions, would warrant, not the repeal of the present penal laws, but the re-enactment of the old in all their violent operation (hear, hear). If these principles were tenable, it was unwise to put off that re-enactment: if Catholics were necessarily bad subjects, and capable of holding a divided allegiance, Parliament had already gone too far in confiding in their pledges, and had trusted them too much. This was the legitimate conclusion from the principles of some members of administration. He deplored that result, and it was to calm and sooth the prevailing irritation which such a course was calculated to provoke in Ireland, that he brought forward this motion. He did not mean to say that Catholic disappointment must necessarily be attended with disturbances in Ireland, for it was the duty of every good subject to prevent disorder, and he hoped that feeling would influence the friends of concession on the present occasion: but of one thing he was quite sure—that so long as a heavy grievance were permitted to remain unredressed, so long must there exist a liability to disturbance, and a discontent of which every advantage might be taken by the enemies of good government. The hon. bart. (Sir T. Lethbridge) had admitted, that notwithstanding the rejection of their claims, he was persuaded the Catholics would still behave with loyalty and affection. If this were his persuasion, why refuse them that confidence which they required and deserved? But he feared that the Catholics would confide as little in the praises bestowed upon them by the hon. bart. and those who opposed their claims, as that hon. bart. and his agricultural friends did in the high tribute paid by the late Lord Londonderry to their patience and forbearance, when the hon. bart. and Mr. Webbe Hall were described as the O'Connell and O'Gorman of the agricultural complainants. The Catholics would, he feared, when praise was offered from such a quarter, remember the language of the poet—"You spat on me last Wednesday; you scorned me on such a day; another day you called me dog; and for all these courtesies you give me praise and deny me justice." If the Catholics, however, rejected the advice of their enemies, he hoped they would take the recommendation of their friends. As one of the latter, there were two principles which he would particularly urge for their adoption. One was, to preserve union among their own body, under all vicissitudes, from Giant's Causeway to Cape Clear, if they hoped either to meet or to deserve success. The next was, to obtain by all means in their power, the Protestant co-operation, which was already so generally held out to them. The time would inevitably come, when Ireland would be so unanimous in her demands for justice, that neither that, nor the other house of Parliament, at the instigation of any Government, could persevere in refusing concession. The Irish members were two to one in favour of the question, and the Peers of Ireland were divided with equal strength in the same cause. The necessary effect of exclusion, against this evidence, was to bring the people of Ireland to curse the British constitution, and detest that Union, which under more fortunate circumstances would be productive of so much good to both. It was under such circumstances that he was anxious to have the despatches of Lord Wellesley laid before them—to calm the agitated feeling of Ireland; and to enlighten the public mind of England upon a subject in which his opinion as chief governor must necessarily have great weight (hear, hear). When he alluded to the feeling of the people of England, which was in advance upon this question, he deprecated the base arts which were used to diminish it. The same wretched device of chalking "No Popery" upon the public walls, had been used, they would recollect, when "No King" was scrawled in the same manner. Having mentioned this fact, he would relate another, which he was sure was not promoted by the respectable opponents of the Catholics. One Benbow, an obscure publisher of seditious pamphlets at former trials of notoriety, was at present engaged in disseminating a speech, purporting to have been delivered by an illustrious personage elsewhere, to which comments were subjoined which were sufficiently objectionable in this country, but which, when circulated in Ireland, were calculated to excite extreme irritation and discontent. He knew positively that a person in office, who was a member of the House of Peers, had taken care to disseminate this document all over Ireland. He could not help, when he considered the nature of the opposition to this question, reflecting upon a similar alarm which had been sounded in the people's ears in former periods. In 1720 considerable alarm existed in this country respecting danger from the plague, then raging at Marseilles, and Government undertook remedial and precautionary measures; but Lord Hardwicke recorded, that such was the delusion which had been practised upon a large portion of the people by the steps taken to prevent the dissemination of contagion among them, that they denounced what they called "barrack hospitals," and declared they would have "no red-coated nurses" (a laugh). In 1753 a bill was brought in for the naturalization of Jews—a measure against which not even the voice of an old woman could now be raised in the country, although in its day it encountered a fierce attack, and drew forth petitions from London and other places, as was the case with the late Catholic bill. The London petition set forth that, "Should the said Jews' bill pass into a law, it would greatly endanger the Christian religion, would undermine our happy constitution in church and state (a laugh), and would be highly prejudicial to the interests of trade in general, and of the city of London in particular" (laughter). Now notwithstanding this severe denunciation the succeeding Chancellor of the Exchequer did not find the introduction of Jews into the city of London, nor even into Downing-street (a laugh), attended with the disastrous consequences which were then foreboded. The "Craftsman," after denouncing the innumerable disasters which would arise from the measure, proceeded in these words—"I must beg leave to set forth the consequences of this bill. With God there is mercy, but with the Jews there is no mercy, and they have 1700 years of punishment to revenge. If this bill passes we are all Jewish slaves, and without hope of relief from the goodness of God. The monarch would become a creature of the Jews, and the freeholders would be insignificant to him. He would disband our British soldiers, and raise a greater army of Jews, who might force us to abjure our royal family, and to be harmoniously naturalized under a King of the Jews. Awake, therefore, my brother Christians and Protestants. It is not Hannibal at your gates, but the Jews, who are coming for the keys of your church doors" (loud and continued laughter). In the debate which arose in the House of Commons upon the bill, a west-country baronet (a laugh), declared that if they admitted the naturalization of Jews, they would soon be outvoted by them in Parliament. "They will divide our counties," said he, "in lots among their tribes, and sell our lands to the highest bidders" (a laugh). Another member was of opinion, "that the Jews would increase so fast after the bill, as to absorb a considerable part of the land of the country, and compel the people to contend with them for the preservation of their property, as well as the ascendancy of their power." The member for London too, Sir John Bernard, took a more deep theological view of the subject—like that in a late petition from Leicester, which charged the Catholics with being the descendants of those who had burned the petitioners' ancestors—and said "that the Jews were the offspring of those who had crucified their Saviour, and whose descendants to all generations laboured under the divine curse." He referred to these extracts to show, that the old alarm was just as consistent as the new (hear, hear). There was also a mock Hebrew Journal, published at the time of the Jew bill, in which was the following advertisement—"Since our last, arrived one mail from Jerusalem. Last week twenty-five children were publicly circumcised at the Lyng-in-Hospital, Brownlow-street. Last night the bill for naturalizing Christians was thrown out of the Sanhedrim by a very great majority.—The report of the Christians rising in North Wales is entirely without foundation. Last Friday being the anniversary of the Crucifixion, it was observed throughout the kingdom with demonstrations of joy." In this way, and at all times, in the Jew bill as well as the Catholic, the most ridiculous clamour had been excited by disingenuous means. And if they traced the cause of such clamour, they would find it always emanated from similar sources. In tracing the cause of opposition to the Jew bill in 1753, the first authority which he found was that of Lord Chatham, who had stated in his place in Parliament, "that he was convinced, as were most other gentlemen, that religion had nothing to do with this dispute, but he saw that the people had been made to believe it had, and that the old high church persecuting spirit had begun to lay hold of them" (hear, hear). So said he too; it was the old high church love of exclusive power and monopoly that was working against the Catholics, and had been used to delude the people; and he was convinced that many who used such arts knew as well as he did that religion was as little concerned in the late bill, as in that for the regulation of weights and measures or for determining the length of the pendulum by the number of its vibrations. Still, touching on the Jew bill, he found in the Hardwicke papers a letter from Dr. Birch to Mr. Philip Yorke, in which he said, "All this clamour about the Jew bill is merely intended to influence the elections next year" (hear, and a laugh). It happened in those days, as in these, that there was an enlightened Bishop of Norwich who had been an advocate of the Jew bill. Dr. Birch stated, that he was upon his return to his diocese, insulted for his conduct; for "when he went to confirm some boys at Ipswich, they repeatedly derided him, by calling out for circumcision;" and notices were posted up, intimating that "on Saturday next the Bishop will confirm the Jews, and on the following day circumcise the Christians" (a laugh). Thus was the cry against liberal measures in all ages equally senseless and brutal (hear, hear). These apprehensions might be compared to the alarm excited in certain quarters by the late bill. The danger apprehended from conferring more power upon the Catholics was equally absurd; the law could not confer a greater power upon them for inflicting mischief, were they so inclined, than it did at present by continuing the grievance. It was the grievance which made such men as Mr. O'Connell and Mr. Shiel influential. When he named those gentlemen, it was not to distrust them; on the contrary, they were entitled to respect, and deserved well of their country; but he preferred to have power vested in the laws, and not in the hands of individuals, however respectable. The time would come when the resistance of Parliament to concession would be viewed not only with astonishment, but with contempt. The religious wisdom of one age was often the object of contempt to succeeding generations (hear, hear). The opponents of so just a measure as Emancipation could not hope always to move in an atmosphere of their own. Such a notion exclusively belonged to the middle ages, and could not prevail in these more enlightened times. If they persevered in so impolitic a course, they must see the consequence of the union of foreign influence with internal discontent. It was to avert this crisis that he called for Lord Wellesley's despatches. If no opinion had been given from that quarter, such negligence deserved rebuke; if it had, it should be made known, in justice to both countries. On former occasions the noble lord's despatches had been used in Parliament to support legislative proceedings for Ireland. They could not now be refused, consistently with their own votes, or with their duty towards Ireland (hear, hear).

Sir T. Lethbridge rose, not, he said, to discuss the general question, but to disclaim having at any time entertained any idea that the Catholics were disloyal, or indulged in any abuse of that body. But sure he was, that when hon. members alluded to the expression of popular opinion in England as being in favour of the late bill, they deluded themselves; for he was perfectly satisfied that the current of the public mind had set exactly in the opposite way. With respect to any mortification which had arisen, or was likely to arise, from the rejection of the bill, those must answer for it, who had excited hopes, which were so certain of being speedily dashed: Still he was confident that whatever irritation might arise from that circumstance, it would not impair the general loyalty of the Catholics.

Mr. Goulburn would not consent to treat the question of Emancipation as a mere Irish question. He differed from those hon. gentlemen who had found fault with the decision of the legislature upon that view of it. It was a great constitutional question, which went to affect the well-being of the state itself, and of the constitution, as it had existed for 200 years. He was as well aware, as they could be, of the danger of admitting into questions of this nature the warmth of religious prejudices: but it was very certain, that the people dreaded the consequences of passing the Emancipation bill. He could give the public credit for a feeling of pain at the necessity of the exclusion—many of them having only to object to it the apprehensions which they had of any change. The proceedings of that house upon the Jew bill had been referred to. He had no great reverence for any authority which depended upon quotations from long debates of former times. He gave the hon. gent. credit for his selections, but it would not be difficult to find support for any side of an argument in those resources. Still it would be worth while for the house to remark how strong the community were when combined upon any point of religious feeling. This was manifested in the power of public opinion, which compelled Parliament to repeal their own concessions, not only in the affair of the Jew bill, but also in 1780 (hear, hear). He admitted that there might be many objections to the proceedings of 1780; but they ended in retracting the concessions out of deference to public sentiment. He would not detain the house upon the present motion. The production of the Lord Lieutenant's despatches had been complained of heretofore as being the constant prelude to acts of rigour and severity on the part of Government, because they furnished the house with details of those outrages in different parts of the country which had called for those rigorous measures. How could any details of that nature tend to soothe Ireland? But they were wanted, the hon. gent. said, to convince the other house that they had been wrong in their opposition to the Catholic Relief bill. This was the first time in which despatches had ever been called for in order to convert the House of Peers. Their lordships, however, were not without sufficient information as to the opinions of the Lord Lieutenant. His lordship's vote was recorded, and his opinions, which had been known for many years, had undergone no change. It would be better, if any necessity of this nature existed, to make a motion for the examination of the Lord Lieutenant himself. There were no adequate grounds for the present motion.

Sir John Newport could not treat so lightly as the rt. hon. Secretary had done, the interests and security of six millions of people. It was desirable and essential for the legislature to know the opinions of a Lord Lieutenant, so highly gifted, who had resided in the country for some years, and who had already acknowledged his obligations to the Catholic body for their assistance in tranquillizing the country in times of difficulty and peril. It was the duty of the house to ascertain what measures that noble person held to be most eligible for permanently quieting that country. For his own part, he disliked "things as they were" in Ireland. He was not easy at beholding those hearings of dissatisfaction and disappointment—Ignis suppositus cineri doloso—which his hon. friend had described. He deeply deplored the illiberal zeal with which the heat of religious animosities had been fanned almost into a flame. He thought that when the clergy had set the bells ringing at the defeat of the Catholic bill, as if another Waterloo had been fought and conquered, they had done more than any other class to pull down the Church Establishment. The Catholics had a right to complain of the tricks and management which had been resorted to to secure the defeat of the Catholic bill. He adverted, in particular, to the conduct of a noble lord at the head of the Government, who had made use of the opportunity of the committee to put questions to the Catholic clergy. That noble lord should have given them to understand, in the first instance, that which he only made known on the second reading of the bill—that at no time, nor under any circumstances, did he deem it possible to admit the Catholics to the privileges of the constitution. That would have been the conduct of a fair and honourable mind. He complained, too, of the part taken by a right rev. prelate in attributing the opinions of a speech delivered by a Catholic clergyman to the Catholic Board, though it must have been known from the very same sources of information, that a whole day did not pass over before those opinions were disowned, and marked with extreme reprobation by the gentlemen of that Board. He deplored the infatigations in the councils of the Crown which disposed them continually to lead the affairs of Ireland to the verge of peril. "This is true," said Lord Bacon, "that the wisdom of these latter times in Princes' affairs is rather fine deliveries and shiftings of dangers and mischiefs when they are near, than solid and grounded courses to keep them aloof. But this is but to try masteries with fortune. And let men beware how they neglect and suffer matter of trouble to be prepared: for so man can forbid the spark, nor tell whence it may come" (cheers). He could not predict the time and all the separate circumstances; but he looked upon the first formidable and successful attempt to separate from her a considerable body of her subjects as ringing the death-bell of England. He reminded the house of the inward hatred in which this country was held by the Holy Allies; how jealous they were of her power, her grandeur, her opulence, how much they envied her, and how resolutely they would league, per fas et nefas, to deprive her of them, should an opportunity arise. If ministers treated this subject lightly, they were mistaken. Their delusions would lead the country into the utmost peril. He cautioned all future governments against tampering again with those disgraceful prejudices of the popular mind, which had been played on in 1780 and 1807. He thought that the rt. hon. Sec. (Goulburn) went too far in wishing to put his estimate of the value of the opinions of the Lord Lieutenant upon the house. That nobleman was known to have opinions upon the subject of Emancipation differing materially from the rt. hon. Sec. The opinions of the right hon. gent. were well enough known to the house—much better than those of the Marquis Wellesley, whose years, talents, and political experience were likely to have quite as much weight with the house as the declarations of his right hon. Secretary.

Mr. Curteis thought it a happy thing, judging from the communications of his constituents, whom it was his sole wish to please, that the Catholic bill had been thrown out. It would have been treason in him against his constituents, had he voted for the measure.

Mr. Brownlow said, that during two sessions they had been engaged in obtaining all possible information on the affairs of Ireland, from all classes of Irish subjects—from the judges on the bench to the meanest officer of their courts, from the highest dignitaries in the Catholic church to its humblest ministers—from grave ecclesiastics, from general officers, from all who were in the least likely to furnish any thing to the general stock. He thought it, then, neither wise nor courteous to leave out the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whose means of obtaining knowledge, whose high station, talents, and influence, were likely to produce more information than could be derived from any other source. The rt. hon. sec. had said that the house knew his lordship's opinions sufficiently, because he had voted by proxy for the bill. The consequence was not so plain as it would thus appear. Many noble lords—the custom almost prevailed among Irish lords—spoke one way and voted another. How could the house be sure, unless they were allowed to judge by their own eyes, that a Lord Lieutenant might not have voted one way, and written another? It was well known that the correspondence of that noble marquis was lying in the office of the Home Secretary. What sympathy could there be between the noble marquis and his rt. hon. friend? Did the Lord Lieutenant partake in any way of the opinions of the rt. hon. gent. who was so far from thinking Emancipation just, that neither then nor at any other time did he think that it could be conceded? This he acknowledged had been his own opinion for some time—just so long as his reason did not forbid it. Why was he so ready, it might be asked, to abandon his former opinions? Because he had discovered their worthlessness. He had abandoned those opinions in deference to reason and argument, and had taken the course sanctioned by expediency, policy, and justice. He deeply regretted that his rt. hon. friend continued in those opinions. He told the Catholics of Ireland, "You may be as patient as you will—you may shed your blood, and give up every thing from loyalty to your King and Government; but expediency and justice require, that now and for ever, you remain aliens to the constitution." What a proposition for a Government to announce to a whole people! What must Ireland feel on finding, that though seventy-five of her own members voted for the Catholic bill, and of the remaining twenty-five who voted against it, five or six were English, the voice of her legislative representation was stifled? That Emancipation would be carried some day he was sure; because it had been triumphantly carried by that house. But in the mean time there was much that pressed for speedy concession, which had been too long delayed. The laws and government of England had worn deep and sore traces in Irish feeling; therefore was immediate change in many things necessary—therefore was it bad for Government to continue in its old course of exclusion. He complimented his hon. friend who made the motion, for having this night made the most valuable of all his patriotic exertions to save his country from ruin and despair (loud cheering).

Mr. Peel applauded the sentiment of the hon. mover in wishing to avoid all topics of irritation, and in the conduct in which he had so ably conformed to it. For his own part, he was resolved to follow so good an example. Had he been otherwise disposed, his hon. friend who spoke last had given him more than enough occasion. He felt no necessity to apologize for the opinions to which he adhered, and which were his hon. friend's too, within six weeks, because he could not, like his hon. friend, be converted by Dr. Doyle's evidence. The change wrought in his hon. friend might be justified by conviction; but unless he felt equal motives, he could not be convinced. He would advise his hon. friend not to conclude, that because he had changed that he was infallible, and to leave some small degree of liberty to the judgments of those whom he had left in their former ignorance. He was still bound to give his former coadjutors credit for their integrity and their motives. Not six weeks ago was his hon. friend engaged in calling some parties to a strict account who had done something to offend an Orange Association. He (Mr. Peel) had then to advise the house to quell all angry feelings on the occasion. He had addressed his hon. friend as the chosen advocate of particular opinions on that question, entreating him not to precipitate a discussion that would produce no good, and might terminate in the most unfavourable manner. Yet he was now to be accused by his hon. friend, after this six weeks' communication with new opinions, of a want of uniformity and system (hear, hear). He might, possibly, have done wrong in adhering with so much steadfastness to old systems and old notions; but if there were any one charge to which his public conduct had rendered him less amenable than another, it was this charge of a want of consistency. He could safely affirm that he had, on no occasion, stood forth to oppose the petitions of the Catholics without a feeling of deep regret at being obliged to resist the claims of so large a body of his fellow-subjects; for whom he entertained all those friendly sentiments that he felt for all claimers of his Majesty's subjects, but whose applications he conceived it to be his duty to the constitution to oppose (hear, hear). He had been perfectly willing, when called upon, to give his services to the Crown, provided only that he should be at liberty to retain his own opinions on this subject. At the same time, he considered it to be a part of his public duty to act cordially with his colleagues in all other respects wherein their sentiments concurred. He might confidently appeal to his rt. hon. friend (Mr. Canning) whether his personal opinions had ever influenced him in respect of the administration of the existing law? His most earnest desire had ever been that the law should be impartially administered between Catholic and Protestant. Let it be proved to him that in any case the contrary had happened: he would be the first to propose that the injustice should be remedied, and prevented for the future. He thought that every favour which might be extended to the Catholics ought to be extended in proportion to the respectability, rank, and opulence of the candidates. The hon. mover had referred largely, but somewhat irregularly, to discussions which had recently taken place in another house. Neither himself nor the hon. gent. could have any better authority, he presumed, for what had taken place on that occasion, than the newspapers—a species of authority constantly liable, as the hon. gent. must know, to error and uncertainty. But the rt. hon. bart. (Sir J. Newport) had gone further; for he had referred to proceedings of committees of the other house, to the extent of pointing out what questions ought and what ought not to have been put in those committees to the witnesses examined before them (hear, hear). But how was it possible for the rt. hon. bart. to judge as to the propriety of questions that were put to witnesses not before him—not before this house? He had said, however, that there were particular questions which the noble lord at the head of his Majesty's Government should not have addressed to the witnesses. Why, suppose that noble earl, or any other noble lord, chose to think differently of the matter; did the rt. hon. bart. suppose that it was possible to prevent such questions being put? It was a very bad, as well as inconvenient practice, to allude in this manner to the proceedings of the other house. But he would now come to the dry parliamentary question on the motion itself. He begged to ask, without referring for the present to the Catholic question, whether any parliamentary ground had yet been laid for the production of the papers (hear, hear)? In the early part of the present session, a motion had been made for the suppression of the Catholic Association; and in a later period of it, a bill had been brought in for the relief of the Roman Catholics from their present disabilities. On the first of these occasions, notice of a motion was given by an hon. member, for the production of papers relative to the communications which Government might have received on the subject of the Catholic Association; but so little importance was attached to it, that upon the night on which the motion was to have come on, no house at all was made. The second question had been carried through the house without the same sort of motion being renewed. Yet now, when both of these questions had been discussed and passed, the hon. gent. moved for the production of papers that could only have been called for, he should have thought, on one of those preceding occasions—and of papers which he supposed only, but did not know to exist (hear, hear). The hon. member called for their production after both those questions had been disposed of for the present, in order to convert the Lords (a laugh). But in the alternative of such supposed papers never having existed at all, then he meant to propose a vote of censure against the Lord Lieutenant for having failed to transmit despatches of this character. Such parliamentary grounds he had never certainly till now heard assigned for the production of any public papers. But what were the terms of the motion?—"That all despatches relating to the origin, nature, and effects of religious animosities in Ireland be produced." No limitation, therefore, as to time or place (hear, hear). He must really ask the hon. gent. to leave those who had the responsibility on their shoulders, to judge, under such circumstances, whether the production of the papers intended by so extensive a motion would be productive of that good which he unquestionably contemplated. Of course those papers might include all that the Lord Lieutenant might have written to the Government, relative, among other things, to Orange lodges and associations that now, as he believed, existed no longer? Could any good follow from this exposition? Would it not tend to revive the unhappy feelings that had once been excited by the party spirit of societies which were now no more? Could not the hon. gent. suppose that there might be very good reasons for the Government's declining, at this juncture, to produce any communications that might so have passed between them and the lord lieutenant? Upon these grounds he doubted whether, if the house were in possession of these despatches, the hon. gent. could effect any good result by his motion. At the same time, he felt no sort of wish to conceal what the real opinions of the Lord Lieutenant were. Those opinions he conceived to be already matters of record; and he should not deceive the house if he did not explicitly state, that the same sentiments which that noble lord had already uttered in his speeches formerly, and latterly by proxy, were still warmly maintained, and cherished by him (cheers). For the reasons he had already submitted, he found himself under the painful necessity of opposing the motion.

Lord John Russell said, that as to change of opinions, there were undoubtedly occasions upon which it was not entitled to respect. But when he saw an individual possessing large property in Ireland and extensive family connexions, like the hon. gent. exposing himself to great personal obloquy by conscientiously espousing a different opinion on a great public question from that which he had at first entertained, then he must say, that change was a meritorious act of duty. As this was the last opportunity he might have in the present session, he (Lord J. Russell) was anxious to offer a few words on the subject of Ireland. He had supported the two measures of conciliation that had been introduced almost coincidently with the bill for the relief of the Catholics, because he saw that many English county members, even, were disposed to vote in a conciliatory spirit; and because it would have been a pity to lose so golden an opportunity as the carrying of those measures seemed to offer, for effecting that conciliation of so large a portion of the King's subjects. But he should not think himself bound on future occasions by the votes he had given on those measures. As to the divided state of the Cabinet on this question, he thought it would be better to have one entirely hostile, than the present. He could very well understand the force of what Mr. Pitt had said in 1804, to Lord Fingall, and what Lord Fingall had subsequently communicated to him (Lord J. Russell), that "his opinion was in favour of the Catholic claims; but it was an opinion that could not be mentioned to His Majesty; the existence of his administration, and his ability to prosecute the war with France depended, perhaps, on the continued rejection of those claims" (hear, hear). This had been said to be a presumptuous speech on the part of Mr. Pitt; but it at any rate contained intelligible ground of opposition to the Catholic question. But what was there in the situation of affairs at the present moment that could be compared either in point of existing danger as to our foreign relations, or of the advantage to be gained by a perseverance in rejecting the claims of the Catholics, with the period at which Mr. Pitt might make use of both these arguments to justify the line of conduct which he adopted? The situation of the country was now in all respects essentially different. He should conclude by expressing his conviction, that unless Government speedily carried the Catholic question through both houses, the country was not safe, and there could be no tranquillity, not for Ireland merely, but for the whole kingdom.

Lord Francis L. Gower felt extreme reluctance at opposing the motion. If he thought the vote he was about to give would at all prejudice the interests of the great question of Emancipation, to which he would henceforward devote every energy he possessed, he should feel no hesitation in adopting a different course. The opinions he had formerly entertained on the Catholic question had been a good deal guided, perhaps, by personal considerations and feelings of a powerful nature; but all such were now merged in the consideration of the great principles upon which his vote would be given in favour of that momentous question (loud cheers).

The Chancellor of the Exchequer declared, that if he thought the production of these papers would lead to the attainment of the object which his hon. friend had in view, he would not oppose the motion. That hon. gent. seemed to flatter himself that the production of such papers would have an effect in allaying the irritation of Ireland in regard to the decision of another house upon the Catholic question. But he could not see how the effect was to be produced, even if these papers should appear to contain the very items which the hon. gent. anticipated. It was quite improbable that there should not be mixed up in the correspondence referred to, details of various kinds connected with the condition of Ireland, which would unavoidably produce effects the very opposite to those which the hon. member contemplated. On that ground alone he thought it inexpedient to comply with the motion. The line of argument which had been taken on this occasion by his hon. friend was much more likely to conciliate and assuage angry feelings, than any papers that his motion could include (hear, hear). He was anxious to do justice to his honourable friend for the tone and manner with which at a moment of peculiarly angry feeling, he had re-opened this discussion (hear, hear). With respect to the Catholic bill he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had expressed his opinions pretty clearly, both by his speeches and his votes in favour of it, and on the two other propositions that had been adverted to; propositions which he had supported, but certainly not without great reluctance, hesitation and difficulty. The noble lord who had attacked the consistency and conduct of His Majesty's Ministers, had done them the justice to say that he imputed to them no want of integrity; but still the noble lord observed he could not understand how they could reconcile it to their own consciences to be still in office (hear, hear). He could hardly, perhaps, as a minister, expect to be believed in the full extent to which he was about to speak, (hear, hear); but he would say, that if he thought he could forward the great question of Catholic Emancipation by going out of office, he would resign to-morrow (loud cheers). At the same time he would readily acknowledge that he could not see how ministers could be called upon to retire from the government at a time when the country was generally satisfied (hear, hear) and when he did not know how a government could be formed which should be unanimous on this question: but he deprecated the impression which it might suit the purposes of some persons to diffuse—that the question of Catholic Emancipation was so lifeless as it was made out to be (cheers). He was struck with the circumstance, that of the Irish members, who were formerly the most violent against it, a large number was added, but very lately, to the supporters of the measure. Other authorities in the state had also shown themselves very favourable to it; and it was still proceeding advantageously. So much of the debate of this night had been on extraneous matters, and the question on the motion was confined within so narrow a compass, that he thought it unnecessary to trouble the house with any further observations, and should content himself with opposing the motion.

Mr. Brougham said that the rt. hon. Sec. (Peel) had offered various reasons why the motion should not be complied with. In the first place, he said it went back to an indefinite period—that, with respect to dates, it was all at sea. If that were a sincere objection, he was sure the rt. hon. gent. had Parliamentary skill enough to know that he might at once have made the motion definite by limiting it; but if that had not occurred to the rt. hon. gent. he would tender, under favour of the hon. mover, his humble aid in limiting the motion, by the insertion of the words, "for the last twenty-four, or twelve, or eight months." The second objection was, that the motion called for a vast variety of particulars; some respecting Orange lodges—which would revive much unpleasant discussion. To meet this objection he would propose to limit the motion to such information as could be produced without detriment to the public service. The third objection was, one of a most extraordinary nature, and on this point the rt. hon. gent. had performed one of the most nimble evolutions which he had ever witnessed. The hon. gentleman turned round on a sudden, and asked, "How do you know there is any such paper in existence?" He would answer that question by saying, that if he did not know the fact before, he knew it now; if the paper had not been in existence, the rt. hon. gent. would have said so, and that would have satisfied the hon. mover at once: just as the one reason, in the story, for not saluting—namely, that there were no guns or ammunition, was held to be more logical than the other twelve (a laugh).—As to the argument, that it would serve no good purpose to have Lord Wellesley's opinion on the subject in writing, because that opinion was already known by the proxy which he had given, he was at issue with the rt. hon. gent. He desired to see the language of the despatch in which the noble lord had declared his opinions, rather than the dumb proxy allowed by the custom of another place. He wished to know the reasons by which the noble lord backed his opinion. He wished to see the relation in which that recommendation stood to other recommendations of his lordship, on which Parliament had passed measures of great importance. In what way had the session begun? In the King's Speech, they were recommended to take measures against the Catholic Association. And why? Because it was said to be dangerous to the peace of Ireland. And how was that proved? "By the despatch," said the King's Speech, "of my viceroy in Ireland; here is the result of his experience and observation, and he advises that a law should be passed to put down the Catholic Association." If any country had been ill used in this proceeding, it might be Ireland—if any country had a right to complain, it might be England as well as Ireland. But there was one individual, and he an illustrious one, who had a great right to complain of the manner in which he had been treated in regard to his country—that country which might be happy under his sway, if he were allowed to pursue an undivided, uniform, and consistent system of government, but whose government, as matters now stood, distracted as it was, by one man being set to pull one way, and another to draw another way with equal and opposite force—thus counteracting the efforts of each other—produced no result which the country or Parliament had a right to expect (hear, hear). On the noble lord's authority coercion had been resorted to; on his recommendation the Catholic Association had been put down; but coupled with that recommendation was, as he was informed, a strong and anxious wish that they should accompany coercion with conciliation. They had adopted the first part of his recommendation, the rest they had given to empty air. Was it fair, reasonable, or consistent, or was it doing justice to Lord Wellesley, to ask Parliament to pass measures bearing a harsh and unpleasant aspect—to put down tumult, without at the same time doing what came recommended from the same parental mouth—opening the door of the constitution to the bulk of the Irish people? But ministers withheld those measures which would prove Lord Wellesley consistent, as well as kind and humane, because they would prove that they, ministers, had taken a false estimate of what the exigencies of the time required. The rt. hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer had endeavoured to explain how it happened that on the question of Catholic Emancipation he and others of his colleagues chose to submit to being defeated by the more influential part of the cabinet. He must confess that he could not understand the rt. hon. gent.'s reasoning; but more of that hereafter. He had read a great deal about the way in which that question had been opposed by persons in the other house of Parliament, although he must not mention what he had read. The house in which he was speaking was the only place in the universe in which any thing said in the other house could not be made the subject of observation. Any persons in any society, in any debating-club, in any tavern-meeting, in any smoking-room, in any ale-house in England, Wales, Ireland, or Scotland, might meet in safety and discuss, without hearing a word about breach of privilege, every act, every word, every speech, aye, every gesture of any individual member of the House of Lords, and be just as safe the moment after as they were the moment before (laughter). But he could not do so in that house. Well, it was a case of necessity, and he must submit. He had no right to make any allusion to what was said in the House of Lords. But there was nothing to prevent him—there he was on an equal footing with a stranger out of doors—from alluding to a libel which had been published, and which he expected to see prosecuted both in England and Ireland—he meant a speech purporting to be a speech of a most considerable person—of high military commanders, the highest—of those near the throne, the nearest—which had been circulated, as his hon. friend had made known, to his astonished ears, and he had no doubt the house partook of his astonishment, in Ireland, and which was printed in fair characters by Benbow, the greatest libeller both of religion and of government, and of persons, male and female, which modern times had produced, as the records of the Court of King's Bench could testify (laughter and cheers). That libel—a speech which never was spoken, which never could have been spoken by the illustrious person whose sentiments it purported to express—had been circulated in Ireland, by a noble peer. Of course his learned friend the Attorney-General would move to-morrow week, the first day of term, in the King's Bench, against Benbow; for any thing more scandalous, more outrageous, more monstrously injurious to the illustrious person in question, mortal fancy could not devise, than to make him say—as was done in the pretended speech—that when he came to the throne he would not govern according to the principles of the constitution, but according to a model and scale of his own—a scale which even James II. never dreamed of governing by, or if he did dream of it, never whispered it to the world when his conduct originated the bill of exclusion, or when it caused him to be actually excluded, to make way for his Royal Highness the Duke of York and family (cheers). James II. had never said any thing one-millionth part so scandalous as that which was attributed to the Royal Duke in this libel. He was glad that an example would be made of the printer here, and the circulator in Ireland, of this atrocious paper. He was extremely happy to find that the Attorney-General had resolved not to follow his usual practice of filing an ex-officio information. To move the Court of

King's Bench was more satisfactory (a laugh), as it would afford the Royal Duke an opportunity of denying on oath, which he knew he was very anxious to do, that he had spoken the speech which was falsely attributed to him. But the Royal Duke was not the only person who had suffered in public estimation from the misrepresentations which had gone abroad respecting them. With respect to a noble marquis, who had been alluded to, he must say he thought he had been misunderstood. All that he had intended to say was, that if this country was to enter into a struggle respecting the Catholic question—that last and most dreadful of all the calamities before them—it was better that we should do so now than at a period when we had a foreign enemy; and there he agreed with the noble lord. The noble lord had, perhaps, not being used to public speaking, expressed himself rather awkwardly, just as he (Mr. Brougham) might get into a scrape, if he were to attempt to review any of the noble lord's military operations (a laugh). Now he came to the rt. rev. prelates (a laugh), two of whom were held up to public estimation. One rt. rev. prelate who had formerly supported the Catholics—before he became a bishop (a laugh), but who was now opposed to them had—would it be believed?—this bishop, being of sound mind (a laugh), in order to prove that he and his right rev. brethren had no sinister motive in opposing the Catholic claims, but were actuated by nothing but what was most pure, had referred to the case of the seven bishops—the very seed of the church. But, good Lord Bishop, very different were the two cases. The seven bishops opposed the King and the Heir Apparent to the Throne: they resisted the encroachments of arbitrary power; for this they went to trial, and for this they were prepared to go to the scaffold. The good Lord Bishop should remember, too, that by his opposition to the Catholics, instead of exposing himself, as the seven bishops did by their opposition, to the liability of going to the tower by water, to be there shut up, and afterwards brought to Westminster-hall for trial, he exposed himself only to the danger of further promotion (a laugh). The most imminent danger which he would run was that of being expelled from his own see to another—it might be better, but in the common course of things it could not be worse (laughter). The jeopardy which he ran was that of going along with the high court party and the heir-apparent; and his extreme devotion towards the rising sun would not, as sometimes happened, operate injuriously to the rt. rev. Father in God in the present reign; for in the course he was pursuing, he would just do himself as much good in the present reign as he expected by reversion in the next (laughter). Surely the persons who had put forth such libels on the rt. rev. prelate to whom he alluded, would be subjected to prosecution. What could be more scandalous than to make a rt. rev. Father in God talk such unaccountable nonsense? That it was a libel, any body who ran might see—aye, if he ran as a bishop would from Chester to Duham (laughter); or as a curate ran, which was, it was said, as the crow flew. He hoped all those matters, which greatly amused himself and others, would be set right at the earliest opportunity, by bringing the offending parties to trial. The House of Lords, however, were not placed under such restraint with regard to speaking of other assemblies as the House of Commons. What would be said to him, if he were to talk of a noble and learned lord in the other house, as that learned individual, for reasons of his own, most conscientiously—for he must be taken to be more conscientious than any other man, as he was always talking of his conscience—had chosen to speak of two members of that house, whom he alluded to as lawyers “eminent in their own estimation?” But with respect to much of the trash which had been uttered in another place about the manner in which the Catholic bill was framed, he could relate an anecdote, which might teach some persons the propriety of being more modest on such a topic. He remembered on one occasion, the noble and learned lord talked for half an hour about the provisions of a bill which had gone up to the other house. “Was ever,” said the learned lord, “such stuff to be seen on the statute-book?” There, by-the-bye, the learned lord showed but a moderate acquaintance with the statute-book, for there was no absurdity which might not be found there. “What lawyer,” continued the learned lord, “could have written this?” Thus, most conscientiously, advertising him (Mr. Brougham)—for the bill was his—to his clients, as a person who was no lawyer. It turned out that the very parts of the bill to which the learned lord objected had been written by himself six months before, and he had forgotten it. He pulled out of his pocket, in the presence of a near relative of the noble lord, the manuscript with all the absurdities in the noble lord's hand-writing to which he objected in the printed bill, and which he (Mr. Brougham) had introduced only in compliance with the noble and learned lord's wish, having in the first instance objected to them himself. Remembering all these things, the rejection of the Catholic bill had not at all diminished the respect which he had, previously to that event, entertained for that august assembly. It gave him satisfaction, however, to know, that though that assembly believed they had set the Catholic question at rest by mustering their large majorities, it never would be set at rest till that was done which alone could tranquillize Ireland, giving her equal justice, and making equal law for the millions as well as for the few (hear, hear). The opponents of the Catholics might set forward their military commanders, they might array against them their subtle lawyers, for the first time changed by the new light which appeared to have broken in upon them from the declaration of war, falsely ascribed to a Royal Duke; and here he must say, that this document appeared to have deceived even the premier, and to have warmed him into a degree of ardour, obstinacy, and pertinacity in adhering to policy now exploded in the eyes of all reasonable men, which he had never before expressed so determinately or so dogmatically. They might bring into the field their military patriots, and their legal patriots, and, by the assistance of their proxies, and their forces from the west and the north, obtain a triumph—not over the House of Commons, for of themselves they should not think for an instant—but over Ireland, over England, over right and over justice. That triumph, however, would be but momentary. They might now exult, but their tone of exultation would soon be turned into another strain. Of one thing let them be well assured—they had not done with the Irish question by their vote. It was not easy to still the cry of six millions of their countrymen, even if that cry were wrong; much less when it was the cry of right, of reason and of justice, against mere brute power and unreasonable obstinacy, which set all justice at defiance (cheers). To the people of Ireland he would recommend submission to the law—bad, bad as it was; but he agreed with his hon. friend in counselling union—above all things union (cheers). Let no little personal piques or local differences divide them—let not even considerable differences of opinion for one moment split them who should unite as one man, and who if united must conquer (cheers). The lords—the bishops—the heir presumptive to the throne—all could not defeat them, nothing could do that but their own disunion and violence. He had to say a few words respecting the disunion in the cabinet on the subject of the Catholic question. It appeared strange that the country should be governed by ministers who could agree about a joint stock company, but not upon a question which distracted a great part of the empire. In Mr. Pitt's time, that minister was accustomed to say that he could not attend to the Catholic question whilst he had to watch the Emperor Napoleon: but now Napoleon was dead, and the Catholic question was the only important question which could arrest the attention of Government. Mr. Pitt, too, used to say that the late King would not hear of the Catholic question. His late Majesty was an elderly man of formed habits, and his scruples were conscientious, and therefore entitled to some respect. His present Majesty, however, was not in the same situation as his father. He was, to be sure, a man well stricken in years, though not of very venerable age (a laugh), and had no conscientious scruples that he had ever heard of (laughter) with respect to the Catholic question. On the contrary, his Majesty had always stated that he was in favour of Catholic Emancipation. He had repeatedly given his pledge in private to support the question, to the leaders of the measure, and with that they had been satisfied. But he would pursue that matter no further. He could not help feeling regret that those members of the Cabinet who were favourable to the measure should compromise with their colleagues who were opposed to it. He hoped yet to see the day, however, when a stand should be made for the question. If it so happened that they left office, they would, indeed, quit the smile of the court; but they would quit it for the gratitude of the nation, and for the still more delightful and imperishable reward, the applause of their own hearts and self-approving consciences (much cheering). To address himself, however, to those—if any—who might treat recompenses like those as somewhat visionary (hear, hear)—who might consider the applause of a country, and feelings of self-approbation, as topics pleasant to declaim about, but not, in practice, very profitable or desirable (laughter)—to those gentlemen he would suggest—and this, at least, was a doctrine which they would listen to—that there would not be much risk in making the stand which he adverted to, for he did not think that the sacrifice of places would be demanded. He did not much expect, although he had in his time seen strange things, to see an administration formed out of the hon. member from the west of England (Sir T. Lethbridge) and the right hon. Sec. (Peel). Those persons who on a late occasion had prevented the rt. hon. gent. (Mr. Canning) from quitting his native country (hear, hear) would interfere again, if they found him resolute; and rather acquiesce in his opinions than suffer him to quit his place. He might enjoy, if he would only condescend to accept it, one of the highest triumphs which it was possible for ambition to conceive; for he (Mr. Brougham) again asserted, as his decided opinion, that it was impossible to try the question as he advised, without securing a glorious victory (much cheering). His hope still was and his prayer, that the friends of Catholic concession would end their compromise and save Ireland; but if they did not, still he did not despair; nor would he ever despair of a cause which had the strength of right, as well as of numbers to back it (hear, hear). The Catholic cause had principle to build itself on, and popular favour to adorn it. Let Ireland be but true to herself—let unanimity prevail among her children—let violence give place to sterling, steady opposition, directed systematically and constitutionally against a government in which they could not for a moment reasonably trust; let Ireland only adopt this course, and he had still no doubt, that, by herself—if left by those who called themselves her friends—she might work out her own salvation.

Mr. Plunkett thought it probable that the resolution had been chiefly moved for the purpose of affording hon. members an opportunity to notice the Catholic question in its present situation; that end having been answered, he was inclined to submit to the hon. mover whether it was worth while to push it any farther. As far as he could learn, the despatch demanded was not required with a view to any measure either pending or intended to be introduced. This being the case, it could only be called for—supposing it to exist—for purposes of abstract discussion—and for such purposes he was not prepared to give it; and if it turned out that no such despatch existed, then the absence of it was to raise a ground for inculpation against the noble marquis at the head of affairs in Ireland. Now he saw no ground made out, as far as either of these intentions went, for calling upon government to produce the despatch in question; nor did he think there was any pretence for alleging that ministers had only followed up the coercive measures recommended by Lord Wellesley, and that they now refused to produce the document which contained the noble lord's counsel as to amelioration. He did not know that he could personally speak to the despatches of the noble marquis, but he believed that he was pretty well acquainted with his sentiments; and, as far as he could judge, there had been no measure, either of inquiry, grace, or favour, recommended by him, which the English government had not, in the fullest extent, attended to. Having said thus much and just taking leave to add, that upon the Catholic question generally, he believed the sentiments of the noble marquis to be entirely unchanged; that his opinion as to the paramount necessity of the measure was as strong as it had ever been at any period of his life;—having said this, he should pass by entirely the question as to the motion itself, and trouble the house with a few observations, in reply to those which had fallen from the learned member for Winchelsea. With respect, then, to the Catholic claims, be thought that the country was left, by the recent decision, in a situation deeply to be lamented. The difficulty was not merely that the question of Emancipation had failed, but that a positive opposition of opinions was avowed between the lower and the upper House of Parliament. The question had on this occasion been brought forward, by the hon. member for Westminster, without his aid, and he might say without his concurrence. Had his opinion been asked at the time of its introduction, he should certainly have said, that the period chosen was unfortunate; but he had not thought fit to volunteer that declaration after the bill was before the house. In what had happened, all circumstances taken into view, he found nothing to excite surprise; but still less did he see any reason for desponding as to the eventual and speedy accomplishment of the measure; for he agreed entirely upon this point with the learned member opposite, that the success of Catholic Emancipation could never be prevented unless by the egregious folly of the Catholics themselves. If they would only be tranquil, firm, and resort to no other arms than those with which the constitution supplied them, the success of their cause was as certain as its justice. For the charge that the Catholics themselves were careless as to its accomplishment, he cared nothing; if the Catholics should come forward to-morrow, and state that they were indifferent about the measure, he should say that they were hypocrites, and did not deserve to be believed; he would prefer believing that they were false, to admitting that they were degraded. There was no security for the constitution—for the existence—of any country, in which five millions of the inhabitants were supine about gaining rights which belonged to them (hear, hear). Having, in an earlier part of the session, stated fully to the house the grounds upon which he supported the Catholic claims, he should only take leave to say a few words now as to the consistency of a Government's being divided upon so important a question. As far as precedents went, one of the hon. gents. who most vehemently objected to such a division, had himself declared, that upon the question of Parliamentary Reform—a subject scarcely less vital—he should be prepared to form part of an administration not agreed. He believed that if the Government had been formed entirely of individuals inimical to the Catholics, their cause would have made far less progress than it had done. With a divided Government, the Catholic bill had obtained a majority in the House of Commons. His rt. hon. friend (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had declared that if he thought his giving up office could promote the success of the measure, he should not hesitate a moment to relinquish it. For himself, he might say that he had been placed in one situation at least, in which his sincerity had been tried; and, certainly, he felt no difficulty in making the same declaration. His opinion was, however, decided, that such a course could only be prejudicial to the Catholic interests. The learned member for Winchester had observed upon an expression, certainly not of a favourable description, supposed to have been used in reference to his conduct by an illustrious person high in office. That comment, although the learned member did him the honour to place himself also within its bearing, was certainly of a nature which could not be suffered without pain, and that fact might perhaps seem to make some difference, as to the propriety of continuing to hold office, between his situation and that of some of his hon. friends who were near him. Under such circumstances, he might be pardoned, perhaps, for stating that he had been favoured with an interview with the noble personage in question. The result, however, was, on his part, the most perfect conviction that nothing like offence, or want of kindness, had ever been contemplated towards him. Under these circumstances, he should sit down by declaring that his zeal on behalf of the Catholic claims remained unabated, and that he thought he should best promote the interests of that question by retaining his office (cheers).

Mr. Canning hoped to induce the hon. member for Limerick not to press his motion; but, after all that had passed, it was impossible for him to sit still without troubling the house with a few words. With respect to the reference which had been made to divided Governments, he had never meant to say that it would not have been desirable to constitute an unanimous administration; but there was a wide difference, and such a difference as no wise, and perhaps he might say honest man could fail to see, between the question of forming a new Government, and of dissolving one already in existence. He concurred with his rt. hon. friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he would say, with the most perfect sincerity of heart, that if he thought his relinquishment of office could conduce to the settlement of the Catholic question, he would not hesitate one moment to make the sacrifice. Not that he did not see, without meaning to over-rate any advantage contingent upon his continuance, that his withdrawing himself from the Government would be attended with some public disadvantage; but he should think that the public good obtained outweighed that disadvantage. But his opinion was founded upon recent and anxious deliberation, that his relinquishment of office at present could only serve to bring on public evils of the most tremendous character, as well as to throw the prospects of the object which it was intended to serve still further back than ever. It was not likely that he should venture to make an assertion which was untrue before a great number of persons who would have the means of judging of its truth; and he did say, standing under those circumstances, that he was convinced that the course recommended to him by the learned member for Winchester would be fraught with calamity to the country. This only he would add, that he held himself as perfectly at liberty to discuss the subject in question in the cabinet as any other; but, at the same time, he reserved to himself the discretion of using that liberty at such times as he thought most expedient. With respect to the Catholic question, in its present extraordinary position, he felt some difficulty about stating his opinion; because, in whatever he said, he was liable to one of two accusations. If he said that he thought the question was not so forward in the opinions of the country as he could wish it to be, he should be charged with risking the creation of the evil which he deprecated: if he stated confidently that he thought it had made great progress, then he should be told that he excited hopes, which circumstances afterwards would not enable him to realize. In such a dilemma, he knew but one course, which was to speak the direct truth according to the best of his judgment, let the consequence be what it might. At the commencement of the present session, he had said that the minds of the people of England were not matured for the measure. This had been denied; and different minds, no doubt, would draw different conclusions; but, from all that had happened during the session, his opinion remained unchanged. He did, however, believe that in the higher and more enlightened classes of society, great progress had been made, and he believed that the resistance generally was passive rather than active; and that, where it had been goaded into violent motion, it was generally some friends of the cause who were to be thanked for that result. But, whatever was the fact as to England, in Ireland the difference which manifested itself was most striking. That measure, which had appeared originally almost in the shape of an appeal by one part of the population against another part, came now forward almost without dissent from any, and bid fair shortly to be recommended by all. Such being his view of the state of Ireland, he thought that the question must make its way. The ground on which the bill was resisted was untenable. If the argument proved any thing it proved too much—if Catholics could not be good subjects under a Protestant government, they could not be good subjects at all. Besides, he did not like that argument of "divided allegiance," or measuring men by a scale as it were of moral geometry. If we had but half the allegiance of the Catholics, why was it we had but half? Homer answered the question, who was a better judge of human nature than Euclid: "A man," he said, "is but half a man, unless he enjoys all his rights." In glancing, however, at what had passed in another place, he was bound to vindicate one noble friend of his (Lord Liverpool) from the charges which had been thrown out against him by the learned member (Mr. Brougham). The learned gent. seemed to think—a consideration which had given him (Mr. Canning) some pain—that the speech of that noble lord to whom he alluded had been measured after another speech which he had designated as a libel—measured to fall in with it. His noble friend was incapable of such a thought or act. If there was a man in England who would not suit his opinion to the view of any human creature, his noble friend was that man. Indeed, if the learned member had only looked to the whole contents of the speech in question, he would have seen the most glaring, the most perfect, discrepancies between it and the speech to which he endeavoured to assimilate it. Who, among all the persons who had spoken on the subject, had disposed so unceremoniously, yet so satisfactorily, of the idle objection of the coronation-oath to the removal of civil disabilities, as this very nobleman, who was represented as imitating the tone of a speech in which the objection of that coronation-oath formed the chief feature? When the learned gent. remembered the weight with which such an admission must come from an opponent like the noble lord, he should not have so unceremoniously condemned him. He would conclude by saying, that if he could sum up his feelings in a few words—and perhaps the hon. mover would not undervalue his feelings—he could assure him that the produc-

Sir F. Burdett said, that the speech of the noble lord, which had been so often alluded to in the course of this night's debate, had struck him as a most extraordinary effusion. He believed that no speech had ever been made by any public man which produced a more unexpected and more painful effect on the people of Ireland, than the one in question. They had been encouraged to hope that there was at least some mitigation of the hostility with which that noble lord had hitherto met the Catholic claims, and at the very moment when the country expected, if not his support of the question, at least a very mitigated opposition, he had adopted, for the first time, a tone of uncompromising violence, to which he had never before resorted upon any question. That speech, however, afforded no ground of despair on the general question. Whatever might be thought by some hon. members, that the present session was not favourable to the discussion of the Catholic question, he was of opinion that the discussion this session had advanced it more than that of any other. They were mistaken who thought that the general feeling of the country was against it. He knew not whether it arose from a more sanguine temperament, or from his anxiety for the advancement of the cause; but he certainly thought that he perceived a very different feeling with regard to this question among the public at large; not only among the enlightened and liberal classes, but even among that uninformed portion of the public, in which ignorance and a bigotted prejudice prevailed for a long period in this country. The proof of this was, that whenever the question had been brought before large bodies of the public, they had uniformly supported the liberal side, and opposed the intolerant. As a specimen of the feeling of the working classes in favour of the question, he might refer to a speech of a working man at the meeting at Manchester—a speech full of wisdom, sound sense, and good feeling, and in which the sentiments uttered by the speaker would have become a man in any rank or station (hear, hear). To him it was a subject of great pride, that such a specimen of the working people of England could be exhibited to the world. These, and similar considerations, afforded him great encouragement that ere long the question must be carried. The rt. hon. gent. (Mr. Canning) had given much more credit to the noble lord's concession about the coronation oath than it deserved. It was no very violent proof of the noble lord's independence of spirit to express a difference of opinion as to that single point, when the main purport and conclusion of his speech were in such perfect conformity with the model from which the rt. hon. gent. now attempted to persuade the house that he had in that instance magnanimously swerved. The royal person who had been alluded to, or rather, who must not be alluded to, however scrupulous he might be about the coronation oath, was not, he (Sir Francis) should suppose, very scrupulous about the reasons of those who were willing to come to the main point of supporting that side of the question, which he seemed to have taken so much to heart, and with respect to which he had in so extraordinary a manner pledged himself to all eternity that he would never have any difference of opinion. There was another part of the noble earl's conduct of which he thought the public had a right to complain. Why, he would ask, on a question of such vital importance, had that noble person kept his feelings and opinions in a state of such mystery? Or why, rather, had he held out hopes to persons most likely to be informed, with which hopes they had inspired the country, thus raising expectations which were not only not to be realized, but for which it afterwards appeared, from his violent and unstatesmanlike speech, that there was less foundation than ever? It was hard upon those persons who had stood forward in support of the Catholic claims, that they should have been allowed to remain in that state of misapprehension which led them to excite hopes, the disappointment of which might expose them to serious inconveniences, while the Prime Minister kept aloof in that equivocal state, in which he appeared at one moment to encourage expectation, which he at length determined not to realize. This was unjust towards the Catholic Deputies; it was unjust towards the Catholic Bishops and Clergy; it was hard, for instance, upon a man like Dr. Doyle, who had been induced by the ambiguous conduct of the Minister to express his concurrence in measures to which, but for the prospect held out at one time, he might not have given his assent. Was this conduct generous—was it even just? The conduct of the noble lord was the more to be regretted, when it was considered that this question, at all times one of great importance, had become, since a recent declaration, still more important, and more pressing than at any former period. No one could tell what might be the consequences of delay; he should be sorry to hint at what might, by possibility, be the consequences, and he was willing to indulge a hope, that the Catholics would adhere to the same prudence and forbearance which they had hitherto found so advantageous to their cause. At the same time, it was impossible not to feel some apprehensions as to the consequences which might result among a people of such quick sensibility, from hopes so strongly excited, and now so bitterly disappointed. He trusted they would look forward, as he did, to the enlightened liberality of England, and that they would continue to conciliate their Protestant brethren of Ireland. He did hope that when they next came before Parliament, backed, as he had no doubt they would be, by the majority of the Protestants of the country, their case would be sent from that house in such a shape as it would be impossible for the other house to resist (hear, hear). Some observations had been made about a divided Cabinet. It might perhaps be difficult to procure a Cabinet united on this subject, circumstanced as the Government was; but looking at the urgency of the question, he did not see how the Government could be carried on without some settlement of it. It had been attempted, in the course of the debate, to draw a parallel between the Catholic question and the question of Parliamentary Reform; but those questions, though both of great importance, stood on different grounds in point of urgency. It could not be said that Reform was a matter of immediate necessity; though, for his part, he could wish that the people of this country had somewhat of the same feelings as the Catholics of Ireland with respect to their particular grievances, and that the doors of that house were besieged by petitions for Reform. But who could tell what might happen if justice to the Catholics of Ireland were much longer delayed? In his opinion, having done so much for the repeal of the penal code, we should best consult the interests of the country by conceding the little which remained. It was impossible to go back, and it would be equally difficult to exterminate six millions of people (hear, hear); it was, therefore, better to go on, and notwithstanding the untoward result of the discussions this session, he looked forward with confident hope to the decision of the next (hear, hear.)

Marriage Acts.

TUESDAY, FEB. 8.—Dr. Lushington moved for a copy of the committal of four persons, W. Quigley, Cockayne, and Anne and Martha Lowten, to the gaol of Londonderry, in Nov. 1824, on an alleged violation of the Irish Marriage Acts. It appeared from the statement which was given to him, and which he had every reason to believe correct in all the main facts, that two men, professing the Popish religion, were married by a Catholic clergyman to two females of the Church of Scotland. On that event taking place, an information had been laid before certain magistrates of the county of Londonderry. On the receipt of that information, they issued summonses to the four married persons, and called upon them to give evidence as to the Catholic clergyman who married them. On their refusal, they were committed to the common gaol, there to remain without bail or mainprize (hear, hear), in pursuance of the statute. In that prison the husbands and wives were kept apart. That, at least, was no part of the statute (hear, hear). The only offence, it will be recollected, of which these persons were guilty, was, that they refused to give evidence of what the law called the illegality of the celebration of their marriage, and refused to betray the clergyman whom they solicited to perform it. He held in his hand an abstract of the various statutes passed from time to time by the Parliament of Ireland, to prevent the intermarriage of Protestants and Catholics, through the intervention of a clergyman of the latter persuasion. Such a catalogue was a melancholy illustration of the merciful spirit which actuated the legislature in that country (hear, hear). It showed the object at which they aimed, and that they were actuated by no regard to the principles of justice and law. These statutes were pregnant with injustice, and struck at the root of all moral feeling;—they were, besides, in violation of every principle of reason and law:—they were stimuli to disaffection and disturbance; and ought to be no longer permitted to operate (hear, hear). Though the severity of those enactments was calculated to render them inoperative, the legislature were never awakened to the real evil. Severity followed severity, and each succeeding act exceeded the malignity of its predecessor. The act of the 8th of Anne made the celebration of a marriage by a Catholic clergyman, between a Catholic and a Protestant, a capital felony, and in order to secure a conviction, it was expressly stipulated that if the party were known to be a Protestant at the time of the marriage, "it should be presumed, allowed, and concluded, to all intents and purposes," that the said priest, himself, knew the fact to have been so, and upon that assumption proof was to pass against him. Among all the absurd and oppressive enactments, he never met with such another as this: it was impossible to find one in which that first principle of reason and justice, that a man should be deemed innocent until the contrary were proved in due course of law, was so entirely abrogated. The preamble of the 12th Geo. I. c. 3, ran thus:—"Whereas clandestine marriages are mostly celebrated by Popish priests to the manifest ruin of several families, who are exposed to much inconvenience thereby, &c." To prevent this inconvenience the law went on to enact, that it should be lawful for any two justices of peace to summon before them such persons as were "suspected of being married by any Popish priest;" and on the appearance of the said persons, "to examine them upon oath," that is, to compel them to disclose the name of the clergyman who had so married them, and to whom they must themselves have necessarily applied to have their marriages celebrated—to betray the individual they had themselves induced to commit the act for their own purposes; and if either of the parties so summoned, refused to be bound over in a special recognizance to prosecute the clergyman who had married them, they should be committed to the county gaol where the offence was committed, for three years, without bail or mainprize (hear, hear). There were six or seven other acts relating to these marriages: the last act, that of 1793, avoided marriages so celebrated, and imposed a fine on the clergyman of 500l. A difference of legal opinion existed in Ireland, whether by this act the former Marriage Acts were repealed or not. If they were not repealed, there arose the anomaly, that the clergyman might be hanged by one act, and afterwards fined 500l. by another (a laugh). It became the bounden duty of that house to prevent the recurrence of such odious and repugnant occurrences, as that to which his present motion referred. With that view, he had felt it his duty to bring forward the subject, and move for the production of a copy of the committal of the imprisoned parties.

Sir George Hill warmly defended the conduct of the magistrates alluded to in this transaction, who were the most respectable and honourable individuals in that part of the country where they had resided, and than whom there were none more incapable of committing any unworthy or oppressive act, in either their magisterial or their private characters. The facts of the case were these:—In the last summer there was a Popish priest at Londonderry, who was remarkable for celebrating the marriages of Catholic males with Protestant females, and this had led to extraordinary uneasiness in the neighbourhood (a laugh from the Opposition). The Presbytery felt bound to notice the fact: they remonstrated with Mr. O'Flaherty, the priest, upon the illegality of his conduct; he pleaded ignorance of the law, and thought it only applied to the marriages of Protestants of the Church of England, and not to Presbyterians; he entreated forgiveness for the past, and promised that he would not again transgress, and there the matter with him ended. In the course of the last autumn, however, this priest had a curate, named O'Hagan, who celebrated similar marriages. On the 4th, 5th, or 6th of last November, whilst the magistrates alluded to were sitting at petty sessions, a complaint against O'Hagan was formally laid before them: they felt that the subject of complaint was unusual, and as the parents who complained had brought an attorney with them, it was necessary to proceed legally, and refer to the statute-book, where it was found that in this particular infringement of the law the magistrates were not invested with any discretion—that the enactment was imperative, and the proceeding explicitly defined.

Mr. Dawson thanked the learned doctor for the temperate manner in which he had introduced the subject, and particularly for his considerate and commendable delicacy in withholding the names of the particular magistrates. He entirely coincided in opinion, that the marriage-law in Ireland ought to be made clear and conclusive, and was aware that there was some difference of opinion among the Irish lawyers, whether or not the act of the 33d Geo. III. (inflicting the penalty of 500l. on the officiating priest) had repealed all the previous statutes. With respect to the particular case, he could state that O'Hagan knew of O'Flaherty's promise not to repeat the offence, and was so conscious of his own misconduct, when he married one of these young women, that he actually bound her over by a solemn pledge of secrecy not to mention the occurrence. The parties did afterwards give the evidence which led to their release from imprisonment, and O'Hagan fled the country like a man who knew he had to answer for a criminal offence.

Mr. North regretted that these marriages were not uncommon in Ireland; there were none, however, which carried worse consequences in their train; they were null and void by law, and the progeny of them bastardized—their ultimate consequences in nine out of every ten cases was the desertion, abandonment, and destitution of the unfortunate women who were the victims of them. On the subject of the law he denied that there was that difference of opinion which had been alluded to. It was perfectly understood by the profession in Ireland, that the 33d of the late King had repealed the previous statutory penalty, which made the crime a capital felony. Upon the policy of these statutes he did not mean to give any opinion, but reserved to himself hereafter the right of considering what penalty ought to attach to an offence certainly most injurious to the interests of society.

Dr. Lushington said, that as to the magistrates and their conduct, he could not help making the remark—that there never was a case in which the act of one of that body was impugned, without their being at once overwhelmed with the weight of the eulogiums flung upon the magistracy for the possession of every virtue (cheers). It was singular enough, that in this case, where the magistrates were represented to be popular with the Catholics before this act, they became the reverse afterwards, which was a conclusive proof of the impolicy of the statute that could lead to such a spirit of animosity.—The motion was agreed to.

Burials Bill.

LORDS, THURSDAY, JUNE 2.—The Earl of Radnor, after the clerk had read the act of last session which repeals the act of William III., and makes further provision for burials in Ireland, said that his objection to this act was founded altogether on a religious question. The act which he now proposed to repeal, was a protection for all sorts of heresies. The act seemed intended to enable every sect to disturb the Church. In order to correct this impropriety, he would submit to their lordships for a first reading a bill to repeal the act of last session, to be entitled, "an act for regulating interments in Ireland in a more decent and orderly manner."—The bill was read a first time.

The Earl of Liverpool said, that undoubtedly the noble lord had a right by the courtesy of the house to introduce any bill, and have it read a first time; but he should not consent to the farther progress of such a bill as that which had just been read. The noble lord had truly said that this was a religious question. It was so, and it had been most deliberately discussed last session. No measure had ever received more consideration from both sides of the house, than the act of last session, and its adoption had been followed by public quiet and peace on a subject which had previously been a source of disturbance. The act restored the right of burying in monasteries; but as some old monasteries had become private property, it was necessary to introduce a clause to protect that property. With regard to churchyards, it was not doubted that all sects, whether Catholics or Dissenters, had the right of burial in those of the parish in which they resided; but out of this there arose an embarrassing religious question—namely, whether the clergyman of the parish was on all occasions bound to perform the burial service of the Church of England. The performance of the rites of the Established Church was objected to by many classes of Dissenters, and more particularly by Roman Catholics. To obviate this difficulty, the first thing done was to take away all obligation on the clergyman to perform the burial service; and next to give to Roman Catholics the opportunity of reading their prayers in the church-yard. The Catholic clergymen claimed a right to say the prayers of their church over the dead. By the act, that was not granted indiscriminately; but it was provided that it might be done on an application being made to the curate or rector, and he granting permission. But it was not to be done unless he granted permission, and in case of his refusal he was to state his reasons in writing, and communicate the matter to his diocesan. It had happened with respect to this bill, as with many other measures, that it pleased the extremes of neither party; but it had attained its object, and those whom its operation immediately affected appeared to be perfectly satisfied with it. Quiet had followed its adoption, and it had every where been well received. He had allowed the first reading of the bill the noble earl had introduced to pass; but if ever a second reading should be proposed, he would certainly object to it; and being sorry that it should go forth to the world that this subject was again agitated, he would oppose the usual motion for printing the bill.

The Earl of Radnor thought that in fairness, the bill should be allowed to be printed, and signified that he would take the sense of the house on the question.

The Earl of Liverpool had not objected to the first reading, as that, according to the practice of the house, was allowed as a courtesy; but with respect to the question of printing, that was quite another matter, and he would certainly oppose it.

On the motion that the bill be printed, their lordships divided—

Church Establishment.

COMMONS, TUESDAY, FEB. 22.—Sir J. Newport moved for leave to bring in a bill, amending the law with respect to parish vestries in Ireland, and providing for the more effectual control, as well as due expenditure, of Irish parochial rates. The existing mode of regulating parish business in Ireland was objectionable upon two grounds; first, there was no control as to the levy of the rate; and next, there was no sufficient responsibility as to the disposal of the money when collected. A great deal of difficulty as to all church matters must so doubt continue to exist in Ireland, so long as the religious parties of that country remained in their present anomalous situation. In the reigns of William and Anne the Catholics of Ireland as well as the Protestants had the power of voting in vestries. It was not until the reign of George I. that that power had been taken away; and that by the same statute, which declared it felony for any Catholic priest to marry either a Protestant or a Papist, or two Protestants. One of the last acts of the expiring Parliament of Ireland had been to unite a variety of parishes, on different pretences, one to another. The extent of some had been so increased by that arrangement as to exceed sometimes twenty, or even five-and-twenty miles. One crying evil arising out of that course had been, that people residing at one end of a parish were constantly compelled to pay for works or repairs done to a church at another; while, to that very building, which was raised at their cost, it was impossible in the nature of things that they could ever have access. In the last session he had moved for returns of church-rates levied in Ireland within the last ten years. Those returns were now before the house: they were extremely voluminous; but he would not go farther in them than was absolutely necessary for his present purpose. A very few items selected from the account would be sufficient to show that even the statute law made to regulate the conduct of vestries in Ireland was every day evaded, or openly set at defiance. One statute had fixed the salary of parish clerks, and had declared that in no instance it should exceed a given amount. That same law made a distinction between the payment at churches where the service was weekly only, and those at which it took place every day. Now, he would show at once, not merely that the salary fixed for daily duty had been given where the duty was only done on Sunday, but that even the utmost amount allowed for daily duty had, in many instances, been exceeded. For example, in the accounts of the parish of Thurles, in the county of Tipperary, he found one item of 37*l.* 10*s.* for ornamental hangings within the church. Now this was a work of decoration, not of necessity; and nine-tenths of the rate for it, let the house observe, was paid by Catholics who had no interest in, nor any access to the church at all (hear, hear). In the county of Wexford, again, two parishes, ten miles distant from each other, had been united: here he found, among other curious arrangements, "Sexton and Beadle's salary," 10*l.*; raised, in the year 1814, to 30*l.*; and a note affixed, stating that this increase had been given "because the practice of ringing funeral bells was discontinued" (a laugh), "owing to the church having no bell" (much laughter). This was not a singular case; such items of "compensation" were very common. In the very next line of his list, he found "salary to parish clerk," so much—and—so much more, "compensation to the former clerk for having been removed" (hear, hear). In another instance, he found the charge of "20*l.* a year for an organist;" he knew of no right the vestry had to tax the parish for such a purpose. This very charge of 20*l.* stood afterwards, in the year 1805, increased to 50*l.* "in consequence of the corporation having withdrawn its 30*l.* a-year subscription, for want of funds" (hear, hear). The principle having thus begun, in the very next year there came a new item—"for winding up the clock;" that expense, as well as the pay of the organist, having got transferred from the corporation to the parish (laughter). But these measures, so far, had been moderate, the really doubtful ones were yet to come. Among the charges against the parish Castle Comer, in the county of Kilkenny, he found the following:—"To William Taylor, carpenter, for work done at the parish clerk's house, and at the school-house, 20*l.* 7*s.*—Interest on do. 2*l.* 2*s.* (a laugh). Now, who did the house think this William Taylor was? He was himself both parish clerk and schoolmaster (great laughter), receiving a salary of 10*l.* in the one capacity, and of 2*l.*, with a gratuity of 6*l.*, in another. In this same parish, in the same year, there was a charge of 37*l.* 8*s.* for church-robes—this to be paid by a population, nineteen twentieths of which, at least, were Catholic. In another case, the parish of Killeagh, in Queen's county, a subscription appeared, and an honourable one, towards repairing the church, of 20*l.* from the rector, and 50*l.* from the Marquis of Lansdown. With respect to a return from Tuam, where the cathedral was also the parish church, he must observe that the statute which authorized the Lord Lieutenant, in some cases, to unite a parish church with a cathedral church, had been so regarded the union at Tuam, entirely abused. The law said—"that whereas in certain dioceses of Ireland, the cathedral churches were so inconveniently situated that they could not be frequented for divine service, and were therefore suffered to fall into ruin and decay." Now this could not apply to Tuam Cathedral, which stood not "inconveniently," but in the middle of a town; but even where it did apply, he had very little doubt, that while the cathedrals went to decay, the dignitaries connected with them found means to collect and enjoy all the dues of their benefices. But the statute went on to say, that where this decay existed, and there seemed to be no probability of repair for want of funds, then the union with the parish church might take place, half all expenses of repair to be defrayed by the Economy fund of the cathedral, and the other half by the parish. Now, he repeated, the condition of Tuam cathedral could not justify this union at all; but still more, the expense of repair was now defrayed, not the half, but the whole of it, by the parish. It might be worth while to consider hereafter of the treatment to which the persons who had petitioned against this measure had been subjected; but at present he would go on to the expenses charged against that parish, almost every item of which was in violation of the statute. To begin, the salary of the parish clerk was 20 guineas, 20*l.* being the highest rate, in any case, allowed by law. There was a sexton at 10*l.*, with an addition to that allowance in 1818. But the most curious charge was the next;—"For twelve quarto prayer-books for the church, 12 guineas" (hear, hear). "For two, bound in morocco, for the communion," so much (hear, hear). "For eight smaller ones," so much more. Scarcely a Protestant went into the church but had a prayer-book at the cost of the parish (laughter). With respect to the collection of the assessment, a Catholic gentleman had offered to collect it for 20*l.* This proposal had been rejected, and it had been given to some one else at 30*l.* (hear, hear). The effect of all this was, that the parish rate, which had in 1812 been twopence farthing in the pound, was now increased nearly three times over; it was sevenpence. Could any man doubt that there was a necessity for control over proceedings like these, when four or five Protestants, the only people of that class in a parish, were taxing the whole parish in any way they pleased (hear, hear)? One more rate, as to another parish, into which, by itself alone, all possible sins and violations of law seemed to be collected. Against the parish of St. Peter, Drogheda, there was charged, "An organist, 50*l.* a year;" "A boy to assist the organist, 5*l.* a year;" "To the tuner of the organ, 10*l.*" The parish-clerk was paid 30*l.*—ten more than was allowed by the statute; the sexton had 24*l.*—raised in 1818 to 31*l.* Then, for rebuilding the house of the parish-clerk and sexton—in the year 1815—429*l.* 9*s.* (hear, hear). Had any body ever heard before of a parish building houses for a clerk and sexton? And this was not all, for in 1823, there was—"For improving the clerk's house, 33*l.*" (hear, hear). A further item of 16*l.* 11*s.* appeared for wax candles (hear, hear, and a laugh); And for wine for the sacrament, from the year 1812 to the present time, from 21*l.* to 36*l.* annually (much cheering, and laughter). The cases which he had cited were perhaps the more prominent ones; but the returns were full of instances of a similar description. Against one parish there was a charge for "wine for the communion"—in one year, two dozen, 5*l.* 18*s.* As the quality of this was not thought good enough, in the following year there were two dozen more of a better flavour; and for this there was charged 7*l.* 2*s.* Every gentleman who knew the price of wine in Ireland must be perfectly well aware that no wine of the first order, at least no port wine, could cost any such sum as this. The truth was, that no check whatever existed, either upon the price paid for the wine, or on its disposal. The parish of St. George, in Dublin, had been regulated a good deal by a special act of Parliament; but here, as in many other cases, the papers called for had been so long kept back, as to prevent the possibility of any inquiry last session as to its affairs. This course, indeed, was understood, and followed pretty generally: whenever papers were called for which were to illustrate any grievance, the return of those papers was so delayed as to make any measure for the current session quite impracticable.

But, in St. George's parish, the burden of the rates was producing the most serious mischief. Houses, in consequence of the assessments, remained without tenants; and as the dues went on all this while accumulating, when a house had been two or three years unoccupied, the amount of the back rate made it impossible to take it. Now, in St. George's parish, the building of the church, which had been estimated at 16,000*l.*, had gone on to 57,000*l.* (hear, hear). A great part of that sum had been raised upon interest, which was now a heavy burden upon the parishioners, and the trustees for the building had contrived so as to be exempt from every audit of their accounts except their own (hear, hear). The parish had never been able to get any account from them; nor had any return been made in compliance with his motion for papers before the house. The necessity of change must be obvious to every man. His wish was, that where vestries were held for building or repairing churches, or for choosing parish officers, they should not have power to go into any other matter; and that, at all vestries held for purposes of a general description, Catholics as well as Protestants should be entitled to vote. A further provision would give the power of traversing any rate, and of subsequent appeal.

Mr. Goulburn felt no disposition to oppose the bill; for, to satisfy all parties, the readiest course was investigation. The Established Church must be maintained in Ireland; and maintained, as to all expenses that were necessary, by the whole population, whether they belonged to it or not. But, as far as the correction of abuse could go, if abuse existed, the present measure should have his best assistance. With respect to the particular instances which had been quoted, he was not prepared at the present moment to go into them; but he had already looked through the returns, and, before any further discussion took place, would endeavour to attend to them more fully.

Leave given to bring in the bill.

THURSDAY, APRIL 14.—Sir J. Newport rose to move for leave to bring in a bill to limit the power of holding a plurality of benefices, and to repeal the statutes, granting to the archbishops and bishops the power of forming episcopal unions in Ireland. The only pretences held out to justify these unions were, contiguity, weight of debt, and inability to meet the expenses. He wished to draw consideration to this question, because it was one which involved the well-being of the Established Church in Ireland. It was right that the body of the people in that country who adhered to the established religion should have fair means of religious instruction. What he had to offer on this subject would be deduced from the actual statement of the archbishops and bishops of Ireland contained in the papers laid before the Government on the state of the Irish Church. The primate of Ireland stated, that the union of parishes in that country might rank amongst the greatest defects of the system by which it was governed. With the exception of the Bishop of Norwich, no such authority was delegated to the prelates of this country; although such a power would have been more properly allowed in England than in Ireland, because here it would be more directly controlled by the force of public opinion. There were several cases where the parishes thus united extended over large tracts of country, some of them being not less than eighteen miles distant from each other. It was impossible, where parishes were thus widely separated, that a clergyman could attend to the duties of both. In one union, three parishes were connected twenty-six miles long, and nine miles broad; in another, the tract comprised was forty miles long. The conduct of the archbishops and bishops had heretofore been very generally at variance with that which they ought to pursue; for though they made those unions, they must have seen the evils that arose from them. The emoluments derived from these unions were very great. He knew an instance where four parishes were thus united, the first of which produced 580*l.* a-year, the second 280*l.*; the third, 100*l.*; and the fourth, 720*l.*—making an annual revenue of upwards of 1,500*l.* a-year; and yet the duties were inefficiently performed. The incumbent of one of these unions, in the diocese of Kilmore, held 20,000 acres of land, besides 500 acres of glebe. The conduct of the present primate had gone a great way in reforming this abuse; but notwithstanding the meritorious conduct of the primate or of any other prelate, he thought the house itself ought to provide by law against the occurrence of the evil. He conceived that no faculty should be granted, allowing any individual to hold two livings, while one was sufficient for his maintenance. He then alluded to the opinions of the Bishops of Kilmore, Meath, and some others, in favour of his view of this subject; and concluded by moving for leave to bring in a bill to effect the purpose which he had stated in the commencement of his speech.

Mr. Goulburn did not mean to oppose the motion. If cases of abuse were made out in the Church of Ireland, he would not be backward in advising what course ought to be taken, for the purpose of checking them. He admitted that formerly considerable abuses existed, and that many livings were given to unworthy individuals for private reasons, but the present primate acted in a very contrary manner. He allowed no unions in his diocese. It was a great inconvenience that the same individual should be allowed to hold two livings, situated at extreme parts of the kingdom. But the primate had put an end to this, by issuing a canon similar to that which existed in England, forbidding persons to hold livings situate at a greater distance from each other than was allowed in this country. He was well pleased to find that no abuse cited by the honourable baronet occurred later than 1809—16 years ago—a circumstance which shewed the improved state of the Church.

Dr. Lushington conceived the proposed bill to be extremely necessary, because though some exemplary prelates did all they could to reform the Church, yet their successors might fall into error. Looking at the evidence lately laid before the house, he found, in one instance, a tract of ninety-seven square miles described as having but one resident incumbent on it. He hoped such a measure would be brought in, as would effectually prevent the enjoyment of pluralities, as he considered non-residence to be the great cause of the increase of clergymen in Ireland.—The motion was agreed to.

LORDS, TUESDAY, MAY 31.—Lord Chyden took the opportunity of a presentation of a petition praying for the erection of a Prote-

tant church in a certain parish in Ireland, to notice the practice of uniting different parishes in Ireland into one benefice. A census, undertaken by the priests, was going on in Ireland at present, which would show what the relative state of the Protestants and Catholics in the different parishes was. Much difference of opinion existed on this subject, and the noble earl (Liverpool) thought the Protestants more numerous than he believed they were; but the question would soon be settled. He thought that when the income of a parish was above 150*l.*, or at least when it amounted to 200*l.*, no union should be allowed. These unions were made from interested motives. In the County of Kilkenny no less than ten parishes were united, and extended over about thirty miles of the country. The evil of this system of uniting benefices was aggravated by the oppression of tithes collectors and proctors, and of courts in which an individual was judge in his own cause. He believed that nothing similar was to be found on this side of Constantinople.

Lord King had found on the table, a return which had been made to Parliament relative to the union of parishes. It was a very curious document, and might really be looked upon as "The Book of the Irish Church." His noble friend had taken notice of the union of ten parishes, but from the account he held in his hand, it appeared that in the diocese of Clonfert no less than eleven parishes were united in one benefice. In the diocese of Kildare, there were twenty-four single, and twenty-five united benefices. In another diocese, fourteen parishes had been united, and only six remained single; but Killaloe beat all the rest, for there 134 parishes were reduced into forty-two benefices. Their lordships had before now heard of the ratio ultima episcoporum, which was enforced with great vigour in Ireland. A bishop when he chose, came forward there, and proprio motu united two or three parishes, which made a pretty provision for a son or nephew. His noble friend had said that nothing similar to the ecclesiastical extortions of Ireland was to be found on this side of Constantinople. For his part, he doubted whether any parallel could be found even at Constantinople itself. Suppose a holy dervise, conversing on the subject with a Protestant priest of Ireland,—the rector of Skibbereen, for instance; the dervise might ask "How do you get money from your Catholics? Do you goad and squeeze them, as we do our Greeks?" The rector would probably answer "We don't spare our Catholics; but we have a far better way of managing the business than you, for you have nothing like our Bishop's Courts." His lordship concluded by reading from a paper a report of an action brought by an incumbent against the representatives of a preceding incumbent for dilapidation, by which it appeared, that it often happened that prayers were not read in the church for weeks in succession.

Lord Carbery observed, that great improvement had taken place in the Church of Ireland within the last twenty years. The document to which the noble lord had referred, contained only one side of the question. It was a return of the unions; but a return of those unions which had been dissolved ought also to be made. If the bishops united parishes, they could also dissolve the unions.

The Earl of Kingston believed the noble lord who spoke last, was mistaken in supposing that bishops could dissolve unions. That could not be done by the mere authority of the bishop of a diocese.

The Earl of Darnley remarked, that there was a return before the house of the united benefices which had been dissolved, and that they were very few in number.

COMMONS, MONDAY, MAY 9.—Sir J. Newport presented a petition from the inhabitants of Kilmoon, in the County of Cork, complaining of the oppressive conduct of tithe proctors.

Mr. Baring thought the statement in the petition called for the attention of the Sec. for Ireland. The real friends of the Church could not employ their time better than in providing a remedy for such evils. He suggested that some provision like that of the county courts' bill would be well calculated to effect this purpose.

Mr. Goulburn forbore to give any opinion upon the facts mentioned in the petition, but promised his attention to the subject. A bill was now before the house, which had been brought in by the government of Ireland, which had a direct tendency to the effect suggested by the hon. member (Mr. Baring).

Dr. Phillimore said, that no such case as that mentioned in this petition could have occurred in England, and the bill alluded to by his right hon. friend provided a summary remedy for all such cases in future in Ireland.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 18.—Mr. Brougham rose to present a petition from the Roman Catholic inhabitants of the parish of Aghadoc, praying that they might not be called upon to build a church for the Rev. Mr. Grierson, a Protestant clergyman. The learned gent. said he thought the petitioners' proposition was very reasonable, seeing the proportion which Catholics bore to Protestants in the parish of Aghadoc was as 300 to one.

TUESDAY, JUNE 14.—Mr. Hume, in rising to submit a motion relative to the Church Establishment in Ireland, said that he was fully aware of the importance of the question he was about to meet, and of the responsibility attaching to any individual who introduced propositions of this consequence into Parliament. But, being strongly impressed with the opinion that much of the evils which had so long afflicted Ireland arose from the present condition of its Church establishment, and that that establishment, so far from answering the purposes of its institution—the advancement of the welfare and happiness of the people—operated in a precisely contrary direction, he had determined to bring this important subject before the house. He would shortly state the grounds why the house ought to entertain his proposition, and, at an early period of next session, to inquire into the state of this establishment, with a view to effect such changes in it as the circumstances of the times and the country might seem to require. Having, in three preceding sessions, entered at length into the principles, and stated the details upon which that proposition was bottomed, he would not now go over the same matters again. Many of the facts that he had advanced on former occasions, and which were then most strongly contested, had been since conceded, and much of the argument with which he was then met had been since, as if it were by common consent, withdrawn: the main object of his motion, therefore, he could not help thinking, had made some progress since he last stated it from that place. He was as well aware as any man could be, of the necessity and importance of religious instruction in every community. He was satisfied, from his own experience in Scotland, of the benefits to be derived from a system, the pastors of which attended regularly to their duties from January to December. From a system like this, much benefit had always been, and ever would, be derived to the community among which it obtained. He did not object, therefore, to the Establishment as an establishment for affording religious instruction to the people, but he called upon Parliament, as it formerly adopted the Protestant profession as best calculated for the interest of the English people, and the Irish Reformed Church as best adapted for Ireland, to inquire whether, in regard to the latter country, circumstances had not since occurred which made it expedient for the legislature to revise what it had so done? If it should be found that the present Irish Church establishment was not in any respect adapted to the due discharge of its duties—or was larger than the state of that country, or the nature of its society, required—or was better paid than was necessary, was it too much to say that the house would not be performing their duty, if they did not alter its condition? Paley had described a church establishment to be “only a means towards an end;” and the same authority declared that “religious establishments could not be shown to form any essential part of Christianity, but were only the means of encouraging it; for it could not be proved that among the early Christians there was any religious establishment.” From this authority he inferred, that as Christians they were not bound to any particular established form of worship; but that it was competent to the legislature, as heretofore, if the establishment which it had formerly authorised should be found not to have answered the ends proposed, to alter it; that as Parliament had once determined for the Protestant, and at another time for the Catholic religion, as the religion of the State; so it might again change its determination. It was a favourite maxim with some, that with the established religion of any state, the state itself must fall. He thought a more dangerous maxim was never broached, either as it regarded the welfare of the government or of the church. The church in all ages had manifested its subserviency to the government, which the latter had recompensed by the gift of proportionate privileges and property. But he was of opinion that the government should always stand upon its own footing, independent of the church; for though the religious instructions of the latter might improve the morals, and therefore the happiness of the people, the close connexion of state and church had never benefited either the morals or welfare of a nation. After disclaiming all improper or unconstitutional intentions, which some might unjustly impute to him on the score of a motion of this kind, he proceeded to state, that in looking to something which took place in the time of William III., he really believed that at one period that monarch intended to make the Catholic religion the state religion of Ireland. In one of his letters to the Irish Government, preparatory to some great public measure, it was well known that he requested them to pass an act for the establishment of such a religion as might be most agreeable to the general wishes of the people. Circumstances intervened to prevent the accomplishment of this injunction, and matter of endless regret it must be that they should have done so; for had Ireland obtained the Catholic as her established religion, in the same way that Scotland had obtained the Presbyterian as hers, there was every reason to believe, looking to what had happened in Ireland within the last 120 years, that she would have enjoyed by this time a century of peace, happiness, and prosperity, instead of anarchy and misery—that she would now have been a flourishing nation, and England, instead of her jailer, as it were, would have been regarded as her benefactress. In what a condition was Scotland when it was attempted to force upon her a religion which was not more generally disliked by the Scotch than Protestantism now was by the great body of the Irish people! Did not bloodshed, violence, and insubordination prevail, till Presbyterianism was finally established as the religion of Scotland? It was not for him now to determine whether Catholicism, Protestantism, or Presbyterianism, the polytheism of the Hindoos, or the faith of the Mussulmans, would be the best system for this or that country. The question was, what the feelings, the peace, and the welfare of Ireland required for its established form of worship. This it would be the object of every good man, every friend to his country, to ascertain. No history could show so unbroken a series of discontents, misery, and violence, as the history of Ireland evinced ever since the Protestant religion had been there established as that of the state. He had been anxious to bring this subject on at an earlier period of the session; but had deferred the motion in deference to another which he considered of paramount importance—the proposition of his hon. friend (Sir F. Burdett) for the virtual emancipation of the Catholics. As the measure introduced by his hon. friend, however, had failed in a subsequent stage, he was only the more anxious to bring the question which he was now discussing under the serious consideration of the house. While the Church Establishment of Ireland remained on its present footing there could be no peace or happiness for Ireland. Some people made a great outcry about the danger of any proposals touching alterations in that Establishment: but their alarms, as Sir William Temple had well observed, were rather for the wealth, and power, and dignities of the Church Establishment, than for the safety of the Church. If the number or revenue of the existing Irish bishops and clergy of the existing Irish establishment were too large for the means, the circumstances, or the prosperity of the people, surely the system ought immediately to be revised. If the army, the navy, or any other public establishment, were too large, the house would consent to reduce them. Why distinguish in the case of the church? They talked of church property, but the only right in property was derived from the law, and the power which conferred upon the church the possessions it held, could, if the public good required it, take it away. This principle had been acted upon at the Reformation, and experience had proved its wisdom and usefulness. He denied, however, that a churchman had the same interest in the benefice he held as any other individual might have in a freehold estate which he had bought; because there was no right either of sale during his life, or disposition after his death, in a clergyman; and any provision which the legislature might make for the disposition of ecclesiastical benefices might be enforced with perfect justice, and he thought with great propriety, after the death of the incumbents. The original institution of these benefices had been with a view to provide for the education of the poor; but this end had not been accomplished. In Ireland, the number of Catholics, who could not of course, avail themselves of the advantages of education by Protestant clergymen, was nearly seven millions. The numbers of the Catholic population of Ireland, compared with the Protestants, were as seven to one; the one-seventh being composed of persons belonging to the Established Church and to dissenting sects. For this small proportion composing the Established Church, at the most one fourteenth of the whole people, the clergymen of various sorts exceeded 500. The amount of property in their hands was, as he thought he could convince the house, in every case too large. The bishoprics, the value of which might be accurately estimated as well from the papers on the table of the house as from the statistical account of Ireland published by Mr. Wakefield, were of an extent and value which no man could pretend to justify. That of Armagh appeared to contain 63,270 acres, and was of the annual value of 51,880*l.*; that of Clogher, 27,070 acres, produced annually 31,589*l.* What he would propose to do with these overgrown sees was what had been successfully practised before. It had at a former period been found expedient in Ireland to reduce the numbers of the clergy by uniting bishoprics, and parishes. He saw, therefore, no reason why the numbers should not again be doubled up (laughter). He thought that four bishoprics, instead of twenty-two, would be enough to conduct the spiritual affairs of the Protestants in Ireland. He thought that every man—he was sure every reasonable man—upon considering the amount of property held by the various bishops of Ireland, would agree with him that it was much too large to be left in the hands of any individuals performing such functions as they were called upon to perform. He did not mean to reflect personally upon any of the bishops; because he dared to say if he were one of them, he should be as glad as they were to retain the possession of their large incomes (a laugh). Still he was sure that one-hundredth part of the sums now paid would be an ample remuneration for as many bishops as were really necessary. A speech had been delivered by the Bishop of Limerick, in the House of Lords, which as the rt. rev. prelate had chosen to publish and to send into the world, he had a right to remark upon. The language of the bishop, who said that he (Mr. Hume) had used in his statement to the house last year language better suited for the table of the convicted felon on Ludgate-hill than for a member of Parliament, was, at least, somewhat harsh and angry. It must be admitted that there were angustiae terms, and although they came from a bishop were rather savouring of abuse (a laugh). But he had a graver objection against the bishop—that of his statements being untrue. The bishop charged him with having said there were 531 non-residents; and a learned gent. (Mr. Plunkett) said in the house, on the authority of the bishop, that there were only from twenty to thirty. This was, however, at the best, only an evasion of the fact, because he (Mr. Hume) called non-residents all clergymen who did not actually reside upon the livings they held; but the bishops, who looked at these things in a different point of view, thought that although a clergyman was not resident, yet if he had any other duties to perform, this circumstance excused his absence, and made him, as he called it, virtually resident. He was, however, prepared to substantiate his own statement, and as far as regarded the dioceses of Limerick, and of Ardferri and Aghadoe, to which alone it was necessary on this occasion to allude, he would read an extract from the parliamentary papers of 1824, by which it appeared that in Limerick there were 51 benefices and incumbents, of whom there were 21 non-residents; in Ardferri and Aghadoe, 44 benefices and incumbents, of whom there were 22 non-residents; making in the whole 95 benefices, of the incumbents of which 43 were non-residents, including 9 dignitaries of the see. But yet the Bishop of Limerick, in the pointed speech he had quoted, avowed, of his own knowledge, “that in his own diocese there was not one clergyman who (though non-resident) wantonly deserts his appointed sphere of duty.” In the bishop’s sense, indeed, there were few non-resident clergy in Ireland, for he explained further, that “no clergyman is accounted a non-resident who is employed in parochial duties in any part of the country” so that if an incumbent had three or ten benefices, and discharged the duties of one of them, he was not to be considered a non-resident on the other two or nine. His statement had also encountered another rt. rev. opponent, in the person of the Archbishop of Cashel, who, in his charge to his diocese in 1824, did not hesitate to contradict that statement as far as related to his see. He said that in Waterford every incumbent was resident, and that in Limerick only six incumbents could be questioned as to non-residence;—meaning, perhaps, to give to non-residence the same extensive explanation as the Bishop of Limerick. But the fact appeared to be, by the Parliamentary returns of the same year, that in Waterford there were 10 benefices and incumbents, of whom there were 3 non-residents; and in Limerick, 42 benefices and incumbents, of whom there were 20 non-residents; making in the total 52 incumbents, of whom 23 were absent. The reasons given for the non-residence of some of these persons were singular enough. One was supposed by the bishops to be reasonably exempt from residing on his living, because he was a surrogate elsewhere, and had the duties of that office to perform; another, because he resided at his deanery in Dublin, and so on. He should now dismiss this subject, to which he had only been induced to allude, because the Bishop of Limerick did not hesitate to charge him with having made incorrect statements, and said that if they were occasioned by the misrepresentations of others, he should regret them, but that if they were wilfully put forward, then he should find it painful to apply to them the epithet which they would deserve. This was a specimen of what was meant by the common expression of “telling a man in a genteel way that he lied.” If it were so, he must say that it came with a peculiarly ill grace from a right rev. person whose back was full of lies. He might excuse his misstatements in any large nious way he would—he might provide a salvo for his conscience by means of some new explanation of what non-residence meant, but still he would fail to persuade persons, who called things by their right names that residence meant any thing but an incumbent's living upon his benefice, and among that flock the care of whose souls he was intrusted with. He proceeded to observe, that the conduct of the clergy in collecting their tithes, was very oppressive. He had in his possession warrants which had been issued to levy a tithe of twopence-halfpenny. In the county of Clare there had been 153 trials for the recovery of tithes within a limited period, in Kilkenny 712, in Limerick 823, in Tipperary 819, in Waterford 347, and in Tyrone 317. When cases of this description came on in the Consistorial Courts, how could justice be expected from a court which might be considered as a party? Indeed he was desirous of calling attention to the constitution of Consistorial Courts. It was of the first importance that the judges who had to decide upon tithe causes should be impartial, but how could that be, when clergymen were allowed to act as judges? It was, in his opinion, extremely impolitic to permit clergymen to exercise any judicial functions. By doing so, they only brought themselves into contempt. A bench where a majority of clergymen presided was commonly ridiculed as a black bench. It was quite preposterous that the present ecclesiastical system, comprehending an establishment of 22 bishops, and 1200 or 1300 livings, should subsist in a country where the proportion of Catholics to Protestants was, in many parishes, 100 to 1, and in some not a single Protestant was to be found. Suppose the Protestants were to disappear altogether from the face of Ireland,—a supposition, which was far from improbable,—he would then put it to his Majesty's Government, whether they would in that case be prepared to continue the present system? Such a proceeding, he apprehended, would be too preposterous to be tolerated by that house, or by the country. The Report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the state of education in Ireland, developed a tissue of disgraceful proceedings which called loudly for the interference of that house. The Bishops, who took an oath, on their institution, to support the Parochial Schools, had entirely neglected their duties. If, as he contended, the Church of Ireland answered no one beneficial purpose, it became the duty of that house to alter the existing system. He concluded by moving the following resolutions:—"That the property now in the possession of the Established Church in Ireland is public property, under the control of the legislature, and applicable to such purposes as in its wisdom it may deem beneficial for the best interests of religion, and of the community at large, due regard being had to the rights of every person in the actual enjoyment of any part of such property." "That this house will early in the next session inquire whether the establishment of the Church of Ireland be not greater than is commensurate with its services, both with regard to the number of persons employed, and the income which they receive."

Mr. Canning said, that however much he might be inclined to find fault with the hon. member for the tone of his speech, and the proposition which he had brought forward, he could not say of him that he had gone about his business in a covert way. He must do the hon. member the justice to say, that he had plainly and freely stated the object he had in view, which had been imputed to others on former occasions, as the necessary result of their arguments, but which he did not recollect any other individual to have boldly avowed and placed in the front of the battle. Before he submitted to the house a very few observations, he would request the clerk to read the article of the act of Union which related to the Church Establishment in Ireland. (The clerk then read the fifth article of the act of Union, which declared that the Churches of England and Ireland should be united in one Protestant episcopalian church, to be subject to the same laws, and that arrangement should be taken to be a fundamental part of the Union). Mr. Canning resumed.—It was an advantage that in coming to the consideration of the question, the house was placed in no circumstances of uncertainty; the sense of the legislature on the subject was not to be gathered from statutes, the construction of which might be doubtful, or which might be ineffective from disuse; but they had a clear authority, only 25 years old, to compare with the hon. member's resolution, and to help them in coming to a decision, as to whether it was possible to pass that resolution consistently with the law laid down in that statute, and, what was more, consistently with the compact which that statute was intended to record and enforce. The compact, made at the Union, might be broken; but until that was done, it became Parliament to act with good faith on their part. Parliament could not, without a violation, which would lead to the apprehension of violations of all kinds, concur in the resolution of the hon. member, which went to put out of the purview of the settlement made at the Union the whole of the property of the Church of Ireland, and to declare that it was a thing with which Parliament had a right to deal as it thought fit. The difficulty of the hon. mover's case was, that it went directly against all that hitherto had been considered as established. If the house should agree to the hon. member's resolution, there was nothing to prevent them from seizing upon the property of corporations. Then, again, why was the house to stop with the tithes of the Church? Why not, also, possess themselves of the lay tithes (hear, hear)? In short, the proposition of the hon. member was so monstrous, so likely to lead to the most alarming consequences, that he was sure it was quite impossible that the house could for a moment hesitate as to the course they should pursue regarding it. The hon. member had in the course of his speech remarked that the session had been wasted in fruitless attempts to carry the Catholic question. The greatest enemy of that question could not have devised a sarer means of procuring its defeat than by causing to be inserted on the journals of that house a resolution denouncing the spoliation of the Protestant church property next session (hear, hear). It was the fear of such a proceeding which originated much of the opposition to the Catholic claims. He was therefore rather pleased that the hon. gent. had afforded the house an opportunity of showing how they would meet any such proposition. He was confident that the vote to which they were about to come would tranquillize any fears which might be entertained on the subject. He had never heard a principle so base propounded for considration — that house; and he believed that the hon. member would find few supporters, either in that house, or in the country (hear, hear).

Sir F. Burdett said, that the rt. hon. gent. had resorted to that species of rhetoric which was least effective in dealing with facts; but he had not made out the proposition which he had laboured to establish; namely, that there was any thing in the proposition of his hon. friend at variance with the articles of Union. It was to the tithes, and not to the religion, that the rt. hon. gent. should have addressed his argument; not one word of which was to be found in the articles of Union (hear, hear). For the Union itself, every body knew what it had been — a gross cheat, a scandalous piece of corruption, supported by unprincipled violence — one parliament selling the country — another parliament buying it; and the wrong upheld, and made good, by the assistance of military power. But, take the Union Act to have been a fair measure, still it was not a law of the Medes or of the Persians; and what reason was there that it should not be revised, if such a course were desirable for the advantage of the public? Such a principle was repugnant to all common sense. He denied that the discussion of this question had any connexion with the consideration of the Catholic claims. The Catholics of Ireland, on the contrary, were content to submit to this most grievous inconvenience. By the opposition that was made to every attempt at inquiry, the Church of Ireland was placed in a very awkward predicament, for it was held forth as the obstacle to every improvement in the condition of the Irish people. If the Church were not held up as the obstacle to doing justice to the Irish, it would stand on a more secure foundation, and incur less risk of being destroyed. With the first proposition of his hon. friend, he entirely agreed; but he thought it perfectly harmless. The same thing might, with equal propriety, be said of private property; both were equally sacred, and ought equally to be regulated by the legislature for the public good. He saw no harm, therefore, no danger, and no difficulty, in putting the first resolution on record. As to the second resolution, he thought it of much more importance. There was a necessity for investigating the state of the Irish Church, and he did not know that after such an investigation, that Church would not appear to more advantage than at present, though the rt. hon. gent. seemed to think it impossible that inquiry could be beneficial to it, and he seemed to despair of its success were it once subjected to the test of examination. He gave no opinion on the materials of that inquiry; he would not say one word about the details, but he protested against the mode in which the question was met, and in which all inquiry was stopped by a reference to the Act of Union. He meant to support the motion of his hon. friend.

Mr. Peel differed from the hon. bart. as to his construction of the articles of the Union. There were also other articles besides the one which his rt. hon. friend had read, which recognized the number of bishops belonging to the Church. By the Act of Parliament for regulating the number of Irish peers, which was incorporated with the Act of Union, it was settled that the bishops were to sit in the house successively, four at a time, and the order of succession was regularly pointed out through all the number of bishops who at present formed part of the Irish Church establishment. Thus the Church was recognised as it now existed. The hon. bart. had used as an argument for allowing the first resolution to be put on the journals, that the same thing might be said of private property. But did the hon. bart. really mean that private property might be taken by the legislature, and dealt with for the public good? If the hon. bart. did not mean this, what purpose would it answer to put an abstract proposition, which was never to be carried into effect, on the journals?

Mr. Brougham did not mean to enter into the general question, but he wished to say a few words, both to guard himself from its being supposed that he differed from his hon. friend, and to show how much beyond accuracy those who maintained that the church property was inviolable, had pushed their principle, and to show with what limitations that principle should be adopted. As to what had been stated by the hon. bart. that the legislature might make the same declaration as to private property which it was proposed to make as to church property, he fully agreed. The legislature had the power of disposing even of private property when it was necessary for the safety of the state. But God forbid that he should be found contending that the Church had the same power over its property that individuals had over theirs. He admitted the existence of a Church known to the law as a corporate body having rights, and to which wrongs might be done which would be both unjust and inexpedient. But he contended that both the mode of establishing church property and the mode of dealing with it, were very different both in argument and in practice — and this the house would recollect had been a ways recognized — from the mode of establishing and dealing with private property. He would first say that the property of the Church must be regarded, in the strict sense of the word, as public property, if the Church were considered not as to the individuals composing it, but as a large body of persons. Another material practical difference between church property and private property was, that the private individual might do what he liked with his property. He carried it about with him; no body had any control over it, except the legislature, as stated by the hon. bart., and of this he had no right to complain, for he gave his assent, or was supposed to give his assent to its measures. His private property was inseparably attached to his person: he might transfer it where he pleased, he might sell it, burn it, break it up into parcels, in short do with it whatever he liked, without any control, except that imposed by settlements, and this was the act of a person disposing of property which he held in fee. He might bequeath his property by will, or he might allow it to go to his eldest son, to his nearest of blood, or to any body he pleased. But to whom, he would ask, could the parson leave his property — to the next succeeding parson, a person whom he probably never saw, and who might be his mortal enemy? He had no power to dispose of this property; it must go to his successor. The control, therefore, which the Church and which individuals had over their property, could not be called the same. The next point he would mention should be the consequences of the legislature meddling with private property, and with the property of the Church. By taking away the property of an individual, he was deprived of his means of providing for his family and children. But if the legislature were to say to the priest of some parish, containing 500 Catholics and one Protestant, "After you are dead there shall be no longer any parson in this parish," who would be injured by this? A parson who never enjoyed it. Was there in this case the same injury inflicted as in the other? In the one case you deprive a wife and children of the means of subsistence, they must starve after the father's death; but in the other there is nobody to suffer but an unknown, and perhaps unborn parson. There was no analogy whatever between the two cases. The last difference he would mention, and it was an important one, was, that private property was held on no conditions whatever, there was no duty imposed on annexed to the enjoyment of the right; but the Church consisted of 2,000 office-bearers clothed with a sacred character; indeed, extremely useful to the state—a body of men set apart for a particular service, but who received their property on condition of performing those services, fulfilling these duties, and who might be stipendiaries, or who might be paid by salaries, instead of tithes and land, as they were in most of the countries of Europe. But it had suited the policy of this country to pay them by tithes. As well might the pay of the army, or the property of the church, be called inviolable and private property. The army was a corporate body, larger, indeed, and more numerous than he wished it to be—it was a great public body—it had Chelsea Hospital, and the navy had Greenwich Hospital, richly endowed with land, for the use of the navy under certain conditions; but was it ever supposed that either of those bodies could regard their pay or the property of these hospitals as their's, and to be held inviolably sacred? In the opinion that the property of the Church was conferred by the state for the performance of certain services, and that the legislature might deal with it, when it was necessary, for the benefit both of the church and the state, he agreed with the hon. member for Westminster. After shewing that church property might be disposed of for the benefit of the country, he would proceed to inquire into what the legislature had done with regard to church property. Without going back to the period of the reformation—without adverting to the appropriation of the property of monasteries—without even saying any thing of the abolition of tithes in Scotland; where tithes had formerly existed till they were abolished by the Act of Charles the First, the Martyr, the seed of the church, an Act for which he was more thanked in Scotland than for any thing he had done in England, for here he had done many things for which he had suffered, and, many people thought, very justly. But, passing by all these remote times and examples, he would ask, what had been done with church property in Ireland? Had the house forgotten that the Parliament of Ireland passed an act depriving the Church of Ireland of all the title of esilement, and that this act was incorporated with the Union? By this act, the Church was deprived of all the tithes from grass land, to the benefit of the more opulent classes, and to the injury of the poorer classes. When the rt. hon. Sec. pointed out the circumstances which led to the Union, he should not have forgotten, that unless this spoliation of the Irish Church had been incorporated with the Union, it would not have been carried. He was surprised that the rt. hon. Sec. should refer to the Union for the inviolability of church property, when this spoliation was recorded in that Union, and when he paid so little regard to the promises held forth at the Union, that the Catholics should enjoy the same privileges as the rest of their countrymen, and that Catholic Emancipation should be granted. Were not these pledges given to the Catholics of Ireland by the Marquis Cornwallis, a nobleman notorious for good faith—pledges in which the then Sec. for Ireland concurred? It was true they were given in private, but being so given to leading public characters, they were as binding as any public declarations. And yet these pledges, without which the Union could never have been accomplished, remained for the last twenty-five years unredemmed (hear, hear). But what said the very article of Union to which the rt. hon. Sec. (Canning) adverted, and on which he laid such particular stress? It was a provision to maintain the faith and discipline of the Protestant Establishment of Ireland. The faith, he trusted, the Established Church would continue to maintain as steadfastly as they did their wealth (a laugh). But what had faith to do with money? Much had been said of the compact of the Union between Great Britain and Ireland, and its inviolability. Yet, who that looked at the previous Union between Scotland and England, but must be convinced that it was incidental to such treaties or engagements to be subjected to the future consideration of the legislature? In the Scottish compact, though many of the provisions were left open to the future deliberation of the United Parliament, yet there was one on which, from many considerations of local circumstances, from feudal attachments, from personal feelings, the compact of Union was precise and strict—it was the institution of heritable jurisdictions, which, though guarded by such barriers from interference, was, forty years after, abolished by the enactment of the legislature—abolished, because they were felt to be more oppressive to the vassal than beneficial to the lord. The language of the statute of repeal was, that they were worse than useless—that they were pernicious. He was free to admit, that with regard to those religious feelings, which were always intermixed with respect to the church property, he would proceed with delicacy; but though that might afford an argument against any precipitate course, it offered none against an inquiry which merely sought for information. Taking the state of the Church in Ireland—viewing the state of the population, who, though obliged to support it, received no benefit from it—in a statesmanlike view, it was most monstrous to say that such a system should never undergo legislative revision. As to the claims of the inviolability of the property, he would ask, was any man so romantic as to expect that any arrangement as to the question of tithes would satisfy every individual clergyman? And yet if all were not satisfied, it was a spoliation of property as to the individual, as much as if the whole were discontinued. They were all agreed that that would be a most extravagant length to which any opposition to the relief of the tithe system could be pushed. He had seen some estimates of the value of the glebe lands of Ireland. Some were too professedly accurate to be correct; but he had seen one given in a pamphlet under the mongrel title of Philo-Justitia, which stated that property to be 160,000*l.* a year, independently of the renewal of leases. That estimate he thought to be correct. Was it not natural, therefore, to require information whether or not some future arrangement might not be made by Parliament calculated to secure the stability of the Church, by removing the very natural dislike which the great population of Ireland must feel towards such an establishment? That establishment stood on very different grounds from the church of this country. In this country, down to the reign of Elizabeth, the tithes were applied to four different purposes—the remuneration of the bishop; the allowance to the parson; the repairs of the church; and the support of the poor (hear, hear). In an evil hour the statute of Elizabeth, by throwing on the people the whole relief of the poor, had interfered with that distribution. But he would appeal, as a lawyer, to his learned friend, the Solicitor-General, whether by a variety of statutes, tithes were not directly made applicable ad sustentationem pauperum. He merely threw out these views of the subject as proper questions to be hereafter considered. He should recommend his hon. friend to withdraw his first resolution, which, though true, did not bear on the question, and to take the sense of the house on the second (hear, hear).

The house then divided on the second resolution—Ayes, 37—Noes 126—Majority 89.

Charter Schools.

THURSDAY, JAN. 9.—Sir John Newport said, that this question regarded the propriety of taking some legal measure against a set of men who had in the discharge of their functions, done every thing that was unjust, oppressive, and unwarrantable. Upon the management of those institutions which he was going to advert to, it had been his fate now, for twenty-one years past, to address the house on a variety of occasions. In every case wherein he had exposed instances of the most gross mismanagement, and of the most flagrant perversions of the public bounty, as connected with the charter-schools of Ireland, he had been combated by gentlemen on the other side, either with evasive promises or direct denials. In the meanwhile the existence of the evils complained of was perfectly notorious; and some idea of their magnitude might be formed when he stated, that since the Union the public had at different times bestowed upon the support of the charter-schools of Ireland, sums of money to the incredible amount of nearly 600,000*l.* (hear, hear). When the house adverted to the reports which had been, from time to time, made to them on this subject, how would hon. gentls. on the other side be able to make out those assertions of immaculate purity and honest management which they had so loudly advanced in favour of those who immediately presided over those charter-schools? Unfortunately, it was no unusual thing for Parliament to hear similar language about such matters. Many years ago, even when the attention of the philanthropic Howard, whose diffusive benevolence extended to the whole of Europe, and indeed of the world, was directed to the charter-schools of Ireland, promises of amendment were held out, and the best hopes were excited. But what was the result of those promises?

The schools in question, so far from being ameliorated, were deteriorated. In 1806, it appeared by one of the reports, that the charter-schools of Ireland were discovered to be, as they were in the time of Mr. Howard, exceedingly ineffective for almost all the excellent purposes of their institution. These schools were originally founded and endowed with lands. In consequence of a petition from the archbishop, bishops, and many of the dignified clergy, and most distinguished members of the laity of Ireland to George II. the first of these schools was founded in 1734; and seven others were established in the three following years. The plan of founding these institutions carried with it so powerful a recommendation to the patronage of the public, that one individual, a Dutchman, was said to have subscribed as much as 46,000*l.* three per cents. towards their support; another person about 20,000*l.*, and several other private characters very large sums; so that the rental of these schools, in consequence, now amounted to upwards of 7000*l.* per annum. In 1808, a report was made to Parliament, signed by the archbishop of Dublin and other distinguished personages, who had visited these schools, on the subject. In 1817, Mr. Thackeray was appointed to examine into and report upon their condition; and afterwards Mr. Lee. The latter gentleman contrasted the condition of the children at the schools on the foundation of Erasmus Smith, and of the Association for discountenancing Vice, &c. with that of the children at the charter-schools. The former children, though clothed in rags, and fed on the scanty fare of the Irish cabin, were vastly superior in health, vivacity, and intelligence to the abundantly fed, well clad, well lodged children at the charter-schools. With regard to the school at Sligo, the report stated that the commissioners found that the master was a man of violent temper, whose habitual practice was to seize the boys by the throat when he punished them, and strike them over the head and eyes with a whip or with his fist, whilst his passion lasted. On Sundays they were employed in writing specimens of penmanship to be laid before the Committee of Fifteen, in order that their time during the week might be devoted to the profit of the master, in weaving. The boys were deterred from complaining to the Committee by the dread of still greater enormities, as one little boy had been severely punished for having done so. The report from Stradbally stated, that on the first inquiries of the commissioners the boys answered that they were treated very well, although examined separately, and in the absence of any member of the establishment. On the second visit they at first returned the same answer; but being assured of protection, if they had any complaints to offer, they all came forward and said that they were very cruelly treated, but that they were afraid to speak; for that having once complained to the Catechist, the boys who had done so had been "half killed" in consequence. On being asked why they had not stated this on the first visit of the commissioners, they said that they had taken them for "common visitors." It was proved that about three weeks before the first visit, one boy had been flogged with a leather strap nine times in one day, his clothes being taken down each time, and that he received in the whole nearly 100 lashes; all for "a sum in long division." On the same day another boy received 67 lashes, on a similar account; and another boy, only 13 years old, had received 17 stripes with a rope. The day before the second visit, eight boys had been so severely punished that their persons were found by one of the commissioners in a shocking state of laceration and contusion. The offence with regard to two of the boys, was "looking at two police-men playing at ball in the Boy's Ball-alley. The cruel treatment of the other six remained unexplained, unless by the suggestion of the master, who stated, that "he believed the usher might have been actuated in the punishment by his feelings as to what the boys might have said of him on the former visit of the commissioners." These severe punishments were all inflicted by the usher in the absence of the master, and without his knowledge. His absence was excused latterly, by his ill-health; but a better reason seemed to be, that he was fully occupied in the management of three farms, containing together 130 acres, of which only 29 belonged to the society. One farm of nearly 60 acres was two miles and a half distant from the school, and the boys were occasionally taken there to work. The commissioners were particularly struck with the appearance of sullenness and terror which marked the deportment of the children of this school, contrasted with the free and lively air which generally characterized those who are to be seen in day schools. What was said regarding the proficiency of the boys in education was extremely curious and lamentable:—"On examining the boys, they were found able to repeat the Catechism and the answers to it correctly, but attached little or no meaning to the words they repeated. The two head classes consisted of twenty boys, of 13, 14, and 15 years of age; 17 of them declared that they had never heard of St. Paul, and half of them had no idea whether the word 'Europe,' meant a man, a place, or a thing (a laugh); and only three boys in the school could name the four quarters of the world. Two boys only appeared ever to have heard of Job, and only one could give any account of his history." The school of Castledermot also deserved notice. "In that school," said the commissioners, "we found two boys had recently been severely punished by the master. They stated that they had been set to work in the garden, and having had but little breakfast, they were hungry, and had eaten a raw cabbage: that the master, who appeared to be a man of violent passions, caught them, and flogged them for this offence, severely; that one of them received 16 stripes in the usual manner, and six blows with a stick on the head, which continued cut and bruised when the school was visited by the commissioners. The other boy had eloped in consequence of the beating." The house would observe, that there was left by the late Bishop Pocock, a bequest for the establishment of a weaving school; and the building a place, to be attached to it, for the purpose of affording the scholars religious instruction. Now, by the last reports it appeared, that out of 21 scholars in this establishment, there were only 13 who could read; only six copy-books among the whole number of boys; that the master could not teach, and that there was no usher (hear, hear, and a laugh). Several of these scholars, however, were grown up young men. This was at Newport, in the vicinity of which there was such anxiety for instruction among the peasantry, that at a cabin only two miles distant,

96 of their children met constantly to be taught. At another place, a young man had taken a stable for the purpose of teaching the poor, and so crowded was the floor of this place, that the children were absolutely obliged to betake themselves to the manger (a laugh). At the charter school of Clonmel, there were only two scholars and no books; and for a master, one was a cripple, but who had a salary of 50l. per annum, and 24 acres of land, at a rental of 25s. per acre—the very next adjoining land, letting commonly at the time of the report at 8 guineas, and now at 6 guineas per acre. Not only were the objects of these charities perverted; but the secretary in effect prevented all complaints from reaching the committee, by refusing to present memorials from complainants. There was an understanding, indeed, between the registrar and the masters of these schools, who made him presents, and advanced monies without interest. In the observations which he had addressed to the house, he did not mean to include all the parochial schools of Ireland, nor to impute blame to the whole parochial clergy of Ireland, but to those who had the superintendence of the charter-schools. He concluded by moving, "That a humble address be presented to his Majesty, expressive of the deep sense of regret and indignation with which the house had perused the details of the unwarrantable cruelties practised on the children in the several charter-schools of Ireland, as contained in the reports of the commissioners of education; and praying that his Majesty would be graciously pleased to direct his law officers in that part of the United Kingdom to institute criminal prosecutions against the abettors of those dreadful outrages, as far as they might be amenable to the laws for the same (hear, hear)."

Mr. Goulburn said, there was not a sentiment of regret or detestation, with respect to the acts described, which was to be found either in the report, or in the speech of the rt. hon. bart. in which he did not entirely participate. But the question was, whether it would not be better to leave the adoption of that plan which would be most effectual to correct the evils complained of to those whose official duty it was to inquire into them; and if they neglected that sacred duty, then to call for the authority of that house to apply a proper remedy. The report had only been before the house five or six days. No opportunity, therefore, had been afforded to examine the documents on which it was founded, nor to communicate with the Government of Ireland as to the mode which that Government might deem most advisable to adopt. In every page of the report reference was made to the appendix, and the commissioners distinctly stated that the real state of the schools could not be understood, except by a careful perusal of the documents contained in that appendix. He recommended, therefore, as an individual member of Parliament, that they ought to wait until those documents were forthcoming. If, however, there appeared to be a general feeling in the house, that this resolution should be agreed to, before the Government took any step for the purpose of bringing to punishment, as far as they were amenable to law, the individuals accused, he would not raise his voice against it, although he thought it better to leave the subject with Government. The defects of the system on which the charter-schools of Ireland were conducted were so clearly pointed out by this report, that he had no doubt that the noble lord who was at the head of the Government of Ireland, and the members of this commission, would as early as possible attend to and correct them; care being taken to preserve the interests of the unhappy individuals placed in those schools, in the alternative of their being new-modelled or wholly given up.

Mr. S. Rice thought it was impossible but that a general feeling must exist in favour of the motion. If the motion went to criminate a particular individual—the schoolmaster of Sligo, or of any other place—that would form some reason for saying “Let us wait for the evidence.” But all the house were called on to confirm by their vote was, that a prima facie case had been made out, on competent authority, which demanded the adoption of such measures as the law advisers of the Crown might deem necessary, under all the circumstances that had been brought to view. The document before the house was sufficient for that purpose—not for the purpose of deciding on the conduct of any man, or set of men, but for the purpose of calling for the adoption of legal proceedings. He was not willing to leave this question to the executive government. The commission itself was a measure forced from the executive government by the voice of that house. This charter-school system was a specimen of the exclusive Protestant system of Ireland; and therefore, on that point, it was more proper that it should be considered by the house and the public, than it even was with reference to the individuals who were accused on this occasion. The charter-school system had constantly been recommended, both before and since the Union, as essentially Protestant, as absolutely necessary for the support of the Protestant Church in Ireland. In the year 1763, an address of the Lord Lieutenant set forth “that the charter-schools and provincial nurseries tended greatly to promote industry and the Protestant religion in Ireland;” and since the Union, those schools had been defended on the same principle; and when gentlemen got up and said a word against them, they were accused with being hostile to the Church of Ireland. The truth was, that those schools were nothing more than traps for Roman Catholics. It was by their operation that an attempt was made to separate the father and child, and they had led to the grossest abuses. When the rt. hon. gent. called on them to take no steps on this occasion, was he aware that a report had been made in 1787, with respect to those schools, by Mr. Howard, and that the cases then adduced were as strong as those now brought forward? In consequence of that report, the vote for charter-schools had been diminished; but steps had not been taken against those who had misconducted themselves; and, until that was done, justice would not be satisfied (hear, hear). In 1817, Mr. Thackeray made a report on this subject, and the cases then disclosed were more atrocious than those now brought forward. The house, however, did not interfere—the general incorporation did not interfere—and the system went on as usual. No less than 1,000,000*l.* had been squandered on these schools, of which 600,000*l.* had been voted since the Union; a sum, which, if properly applied, would have educated the whole people of Ireland. This immense waste was sanctioned for the purpose of keeping up a exclusive system of monopoly and bigotry (hear, hear). At the proper time he would move, that any sum which might be granted, should be placed in the hands of Government, and not in those of the governors of the charter-schools.

Mr. Peel denied that the commission had been forced upon the Government by the voice of that house. He had himself moved for it, and every individual composing it had been selected on account of his fitness for the office. One of these gentlemen, Mr. Glascock, he never saw, but he had signalized himself by the strict performance of his duties on a commission in Scotland; and he was appointed in consequence. It was thought desirable that there should be a Roman Catholic on the commission, and therefore Mr. Blake, a gentleman of abilities, was appointed. Mr. Grant, another member, he had never seen in his life; and as for his hon. friend, Mr. F. Lewis, he had, by his exertions, in the course of an investigation, relative to abuses in the revenue of Ireland, proved that he was calculated for this situation. Two inquiries presented themselves on this occasion: one was, the policy of continuing the present system of charter-schools; the other related to the course to be pursued in punishing those persons who were concerned in the abuses noticed in the report. Now he had no hesitation in saying, from the facts stated in the report, and from the recorded opinion of the commissioners, that this system did not admit of correction; and that the legislature ought, as soon as possible, to extinguish it altogether (hear, hear). Not two days had elapsed, after the report was received, before an instruction was sent to those schools, not to admit a single additional member, but to reduce the establishments as much as possible. The directions thus given were, he conceived, a practical condemnation of the system. Such a gradual and progressive reduction would be made in the annual votes for the children, as would, at no remote period, put an end entirely to this gratuitous system of education in charter-schools. That ministers were not wrong in pursuing the system up to this point might be inferred from the fact, that the commission appointed, in 1806, made a report, in which those schools were favourably spoken of. If prosecutions must follow the present report, he would not hazard a comment with respect to those whose conduct must be investigated in another place. But if he abstained from doing so, it was not because he did not participate in the strong feelings which were manifested against those who were said to have behaved so unworthily. If it were judicially proved that such cruelties were practised as had been described, the dismissal of the guilty individual would not be sufficient punishment. They ought to be punished, not vindictively, but in such a manner as would deter others from committing similar offences in future. He had not the least idea of screening or palliating those who had been guilty of such conduct, and he would at once vote for the motion, if he thought that his opposition would be viewed as indicating a desire to save those persons from punishment. What, however, he would contend for was, that if they were to be sent to trial, they should, not merely for their own sakes, but for the sake of justice, be sent to a perfectly fair trial. To be tried at the instance of the House of Commons was generally considered in itself a disadvantage; but it became infinitely worse, if expressions of condemnation were mixed up with the address to the Crown. He hoped the rt. hon. bart. would leave out those words of his resolution, which assumed the guilt of the parties. If he did not, he should be obliged to oppose it on a principle of justice.

Sir F. Burdett merely rose to say, that he was perfectly satisfied with the manner in which the rt. hon. Sec. (Peel) had treated the question.

Mr. F. Lewis thought the house ought not hastily to decide upon the merits or demerits of these individuals. The allegations contained in the report on which they were expected to give a settled opinion at that moment, were founded on thirty documents, not one of which had been laid before the house.

Mr. J. P. Grant said, that in order to do justice, it was not sufficient that the parties should have been noticed as they had been by the Board of Commissioners, but it was necessary that they should be visited with more severe punishment, if the facts set forth in the report were true. It appeared to him surprising that the horrors thus brought to light had remained so long unnoticed. In 1787, a report was made from a committee, setting forth certain malpractices which prevailed in the charter-schools. Under these circumstances, he thought it incumbent on the house to express their opinions on the subject, not only as it regarded the schoolmasters, but also as it regarded those persons whose business it was to superintend the schools.

Mr. C. Grant said, that he had always entertained a strong opinion that the system of the charter-schools must ultimately work out its own condemnation. He did not certainly suppose that such enormities as were detailed in the report were in existence, because the system was so strictly under the superintendence of the clergy and the most eminent men in Ireland. But there were evils inherent in the system, such as those of separation from parent and child, and proselytism under suspicious circumstances. At length, however, there was but one opinion entertained respecting the merits of the system. That which had so long been considered the bulwark of the Protestant Establishment, was now acknowledged to be the greatest stigma which attached to it. He was not sorry for that, because he was of opinion, that the more the Protestant religion was relieved from such incumbrances, the better it would be for it.

Mr. J. Smith thought that the schoolmasters, bad as they were, were not the most guilty persons; those who had been overlooked—the inspectors of the schools, deserved that character.

Mr. F. Lewis said, that the reason why the inspectors of the schools remained in ignorance of the proceedings brought to light by the committee was, that they were deceived by the false statements of the masters of the schools.

The resolution, praying merely "that prosecutions might be instituted by the law officers of the Crown, against those persons designated in the report, as having been guilty of certain cruelties, as far as they were amenable to the laws," was then put, and agreed to without a division.

Justices of the Peace.

TUESDAY, FEB. 22.—Sir H. Parnell moved for leave to bring in a bill to regulate the office of Justice of Peace in Ireland. He did not intend to enter on this occasion into any detail as to the conduct of the magistracy of that country, but he thought that some measure was necessary to follow up and enforce the excellent regulations respecting the magistrates which had been introduced by the Marquis Wellesley. One of the great evils which that noble lord had tried to remedy was, that of magistrates acting in their private houses, instead of holding courts of petty sessions—a practice from which the most injurious consequences had proceeded. Independently of this, he thought it necessary that the number of magistrates should be restricted, so as to get rid of many at present in the commission who were unfit for that situation. He was anxious that the leave for bringing in the bill might be a sort of pledge that something further should be done on this subject; but what the nature of the precise remedy should be, he would leave in the hands of the committee appointed to bring in the bill.

Mr. Goulburn would not oppose the motion, but he begged that his assent on this occasion might not be considered as a pledge to support the measure when introduced. This was a subject which he could assure the house had been under the consideration of the Irish government. Persons had been sent into the different counties with instructions to make inquiries on this subject. Their reports had been submitted to the judges, and the reason why no measure had been introduced upon them was, that it was not considered expedient at the present time. But he could assure the house, that where any cases had occurred which called for the interference of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, he had discharged the difficult and invidious task in a manner likely to be highly beneficial to the interests of justice.

Sir J. Newport begged to suggest in the proposed bill the substitution of Lieutenants and Deputy-Lieutenants, instead of the Governors and Sub-Governors of counties in Ireland. He wished to see the plan assimilated to that of England, where the Lords Lieutenants of counties were answerable to the Home Office. In Ireland the power was subdivided among a variety of hands without having any regular responsibility.

Mr. L. Foster thought that if the proposed bill sanctioned the introduction of a paid officer as an assistant to the magistrates at petty sessions, that officer not being a magistrate, it would have a most injurious effect, in inducing the magistrates to withdraw themselves from attendance on that court.

Petition of Bernard Coile.

THURSDAY, MAY 23.—Mr. J. Smith, in the absence of Sir James M'Intosh, presented a petition from Mr. Bernard Coile, complaining of great sufferings and oppression endured by him about 1790, and afterwards in 1803 and 1804, in Ireland. This petition, which was mentioned during the last session, but deferred to give time for inquiry, alleged that the petitioner, being persecuted by the Orange faction as a reputed Catholic, had on several occasions been improperly arrested and committed to prison; and then went on to give some extraordinary descriptions of the treatment which he had suffered in his confinement. One of the paragraphs containing these accusations ran thus, Mr. Coile being then in gaol in Dublin:—"Two sentinels were placed under the windows of your petitioner, with orders given, in petitioner's hearing, to prevent his speaking, or being spoken to by any person; and to fire on the parties, should the attempt be made. Your petitioner's health at this time was in a most delicate state; but life itself became hourly endangered by the brutal scenes and treatment which he was compelled either to witness or endure. On one occasion, after the execution and beheading of some unfortunate prisoners, the hangman, with his knife reeking with the blood of the unhappy culprits, entered the kitchen where petitioner's dinner was preparing, and with his bloody knife cut the vegetables preparing for petitioner's use. This incident had such an effect on petitioner, that for several weeks no solid food would remain on his stomach." Another charge was to this effect:—"Within the space of a few weeks, twenty-one persons were executed at Newgate and other streets in the city, whose heads and bodies were brought into the gaol, stripped, and laid opposite your petitioner's door. In that state of nudity the bodies lay until disposed of to the surviving relatives, who, being for the most part poor, were unable to make up the purchase-money of the corpse until it fell into a state of putrefaction under petitioner's view. When the hangman's harvest was reaped, he having received the sum of five guineas for the execution of each person, he was placed with a female companion beside your petitioner's room, as a retaliation for his insolence in daring to complain of such heinousness." After this, Mr. Coile was removed to Kilmainsham gaol, where he again speaks of the hardships to which he was subjected:—"In this place, for the completion of his misery, it was his fate to be placed under the superintendence of one Trevor, still living; who, in conjunction with a magistrate named Bell, immediately on coming under their inspection, deprived petitioner amongst other matters of a seal of Irish gold, bearing the motto 'Eris go Bragh.' Trevor removed your petitioner to the felons' side of the prison, and placed him in a cell, nine feet by six, which at that moment was tenanted by a man of the name of Doyle, labouring under a malignant fever, for the purpose, as your petitioner believes, of infecting petitioner with the distemper; and at the same time he was loaded with fifty-six pounds weight of iron on his body and limbs; and in order to cover such murderous designs, it was intimated in certain newspapers of the day, that your petitioner was insane." The petitioner concluded by declaring, that both his health and his fortune, amounting at one time to 40,000*l.*, had been destroyed by the persecutions which he had suffered; and prayed investigation and reparation from the house.

Mr. Goulden contended, that the case was not one for the interference of Parliament. The grievances complained of were thirty years old, and almost all the persons stated to have been concerned in them were dead. If Mr. Coile had been injured, the law had been open to him, and he ought to have availed himself of it at an earlier period. A commission, upon the motion of Mr. Sheridan, had sat in the year 1808, for the investigation of cases like the present; but before that commission the petitioner had not thought fit to prosecute his claim. He concluded by protesting against the general principle of bringing charges of this kind against public officers, after such a lapse of time, when so many opportunities had occurred of preserving them before.

Mr. Abercrombie would admit, that after such a length of time, it would be difficult to enter upon such complaints as the present. At the same time he must say, that after having minutely examined a great many of the publications of the period in question, he felt convinced that no man could be treated with greater oppression than Mr. Coile had been (cheers). He was satisfied that the cause of the severity exercised towards him was his having prosecuted to conviction a magistrate, one Greer, in whose favour the Government of that day most improperly interfered to screen him from punishment (hear, hear). Without at all pledging himself for the accuracy of all the facts which Mr. Coile stated, he thought there was abundant proof that he had been most cruelly dealt with (hear, hear).

Mr. Peel said that an inquiry had been instituted some time ago, when some of the petitioner's charges had been gone into, and disproved.

Mr. C. H. Hutchinson conceived that the proofs were undeniable of the cruelty exercised towards the petitioner, and he called on the rt. hon. Sec. for Ireland to contradict, if he could, the facts which the petition contained. He knew several instances in which respectable individuals had been at that period taken into custody, and kept imprisoned, some in hulks, and others in prisons on land, for many weeks, and then discharged without trial or any other explanation of the conduct pursued towards them, than that Government suspected them. He thought it would not redound to the credit of Ministers to allow this case to go without serious inquiry.

Mr. John Smith said, that the whole seventeen state prisoners confined at that period concurred in one unanimous statement of the cruelty of Dr. Trevor's conduct; and he would ask the rt. hon. gent. whether twenty witnesses could not be produced to speak to this transaction?

The petition was ordered to be printed.

Law of Landlord and Tenant.

Sir Henry Parnell rose to bring in a bill to amend the present state of the law between landlord and tenant in Ireland; and trusted that he should show the faults of the existing system so clearly as to have little to apprehend in the way of opposition. He agreed entirely in all that had been urged against the practice of subdividing farms. This practice had a direct tendency to increase the existing mass of population, and therefore to deteriorate its condition. The value of labour in Ireland was already far too low. It was scarcely possible for the agricultural labourer to sustain himself at an average rate of less than 1*s.* per day; and yet the present value of his work, according to the report of the Committee of Inquiry, scarcely amounted to 4*d.* It was admitted that the population of Ireland had increased in a greater proportion than her capital; and one of the difficulties of her present situation, was that of finding employment for this increased population. The great difference between the situation of Ireland and that of other countries was, that the farmers who possessed large or even small portions of land, were in the habit of bequeathing them at their death, in subdivisions amongst their children. This was one cause of early marriages; and connected with their living on potatoes and the cheap mode in which that kind of food might be procured, it rendered the population of Ireland the most numerous, for its size, as well as the most wretched of any country in Europe. This practice of sub-letting and subdividing lands was in many other respects productive of very great inconvenience to the country: but he would not now go into the detail. He would, if the house gave him leave, bring in his bill, and let the whole subject be afterwards fully examined before the committee up stairs.

Sir J. Newport said the bill was not to interfere with any bargains or contracts for property, but to give due effect to those already in existence. He had the testimony of many gentlemen to prove that the greatest difficulty was found in the enforcing the clauses of leases, to prevent the subdivision and under-letting of land; and he could give many instances where land, let some twenty or twenty-five years ago to one or two individuals, by several bequests and demises, was now so subdivided, and had got into so many hands, as to be very materially deteriorated in value.

Provision for the Poor.

LORDS, FRIDAY, MARCH 18.—Lord Carbery moved, that an humble address be presented to his Majesty, to lay before their lordships an account of the number of parishes in Ireland, with the amount of the funds applicable to the relief of the poor, with several other items relative to the same subject.

Lord Clifden seconded the motion, as he thought it was of importance that some relief should be given to the poor of Ireland, or multitudes must perish.

Earl Darnley said, though he should be averse to see the English system of poor laws adopted in Ireland, yet he was persuaded something ought to be done for the relief of the impotent, helpless, and aged.

COMMONS, TUESDAY, MARCH 22.—Mr. Grattan, in rising to ask for leave to bring in a bill for the relief of the poor in Ireland, said, that the object of his measure was to leave it optional in parishes to assemble in vestry to appoint a committee to investigate the state of their several parishes, to receive reports from such committee, and to collect subscriptions to relieve distress, in case the committee should be of opinion that distress existed. If the subscriptions should not be equal to the relief of the distress which they were intended to obviate, his plan was to enable the vestry to assess the parish to a certain degree. As the bill was only an experimental measure, he designed to limit its duration to a given time, in the hope that during that interval some other plan might be devised to enable the poor of Ireland to support themselves. His bill had no resemblance to the poor law of England; though he must say, that if some system to relieve the poor had existed in Ireland in the years 1816 and 1822, all those evils which the country so much deplored might have been avoided. For his own part, he did not expect that any permanent tranquillity would be found in Ireland until it had the benefit of some parochial system.

Mr. Goulburn had no intention of opposing this measure in its present stage. It was a subject which required serious attention; for the points to which the hon. gent. had so briefly alluded were of paramount importance.

Sir H. Parnell deprecated the introduction of the English system of poor laws into Ireland, which would soon swallow up the whole rent of the country.

Mr. Fitzgerald contended, that if a system of poor laws were introduced into Ireland, it would perpetuate its poverty and degrade its population for ever. He regretted that his hon. friend had not deferred the introduction of his bill till the committee on the state of Ireland had brought in its report.

Sir J. Macintosh said, that it was his deliberate opinion that the poor laws were the only curse which had not been inflicted on Ireland; and he trusted that the house would not consent to inflict it upon that country after the experience it had had of their lamentable consequences in England.

Mr. Baring was of opinion that the objection to the poor laws rose more out of the abuse than the use of them. He declined giving any opinion on the hon. gent.'s bill, because he did not know what the hon. gent. meant by it.

Mr. M. Fitzgerald said, that although he doubted whether Ireland could ever be placed in a fit condition to receive a system of poor laws, the house would be wanting both in humanity and good sense, if it shut its eyes to the condition of the Irish poor, most of whom were at the present moment thrown upon the State for support. It was absolutely necessary that something should be done to meet their pressing wants.

Mr. Monck had formerly been hostile to the poor laws, but declared that he had recently seen cause to alter his opinion. Had it not been for the poor laws, he believed that the peasantry of England would, during the late winters, have been quite as turbulent as the peasantry of Ireland had been.

Mr. Bennett was of opinion, that if the poor laws were introduced into Ireland manufactures would be established, and capital would flow into it. He was therefore glad that this bill was introduced as an experiment, and trusted that the hon. gent. who had proposed it would persevere with it.

Leave granted to bring in the bill.

Emigration from Ireland.

FRIDAY, APRIL 15.—Mr. W. Horton rose to propose that a certain sum should be granted to his Majesty for the removal of emigrants from the south of Ireland to the Cape of Good Hope and Canada. It was not the intention of ministers to propose a renewal of this grant on any future occasion. He stated that the principle on which the system of emigration from the south of Ireland was conducted was a sound one. The error of all former systems was, that the emigrant, on his arrival at the colony, was left without any means of imme-

State support. Under the present system that error was avoided; and every emigrant might, on his arrival, be sure, with the exercise of common industry, of procuring a livelihood. Government had received the most flattering accounts of the success which had attended the present system so late as up to last February. Under these circumstances he felt justified in proposing the present vote. The undertaking was merely in the nature of an experiment, which might, in its operation, effect a partial benefit to Ireland.

Mr. Grattan was of opinion, that Parliament ought to be fully informed of what had been the result of the emigration which had already taken place, before they voted any more money.

Mr. Abercrombie disapproved of the principle of exporting the people of Ireland instead of finding employment for them at home. He did not, however, object to the plan as an experiment, but he thought it unwise that Government should bear the whole expense attendant upon the removal of the emigrants.

Mr. Hume opposed the grant, and was not at all satisfied as to the way in which the former sums voted had been disposed of. Believing that to agree to this vote would not only be useless but unjust, he should oppose it; and he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer would act in contradiction to his professions if he persisted in thus adding to the public burdens.

Mr. J. Smith said, that notwithstanding the opposition of his hon. friend, he should support the grant of 30,000*l.* on the simple ground that he should thereby rescue a certain number of his fellow subjects from hopeless misery.

The vote was then agreed to.

Miscellaneous Estimates.

FRIDAY, MARCH 18.—Mr. Goulburn having moved a sum of 21,615*l.* on account, for the Protestant charter-schools; 7,106*l.* on account, to the Society for discountenancing Vice in Ireland; 22,000*l.* on account, to the Society for educating the poor in Ireland; 34,478*l.* on account, to the Dublin Foundling Hospital; 19,750*l.* on account, to the House of Industry, Asylum, and hospitals attached; 5,640*l.* to the Richmond Lunatic Asylum, both in Dublin; 7,500*l.* to the Hibernian Society, for the support of soldiers' children; 1,500*l.* to the Hibernian Marine Society; 1,761*l.* for the female Orphan House, Dublin; 2,734*l.* for the Westmorland Lock Hospital; 2,885*l.* for the Lying-in-Hospital; 1,663*l.* for Dr. Steven's Hospital; 3,692*l.* for the Fever Hospital; 400*l.* for the Hospital of Inebriety, all in Dublin, &c. &c. and 722*l.* to Commissioners for Charitable Donations,

Mr. Hume objected to the principle of voting away such large sums to charitable institutions in Ireland. He admitted that they included grants for the purposes of education, to the principle of which, if properly applied, he did not object; but many of the other grants he thought ought not to be sanctioned. We had no institutions similar to some of those now before the committee in this island, and he did not see why the public should be taxed to support them in Ireland. A great many of them ought to be reduced altogether, and others put upon a proper footing.

Mr. Grattan admitted that the funds had increased since the Union; but a great portion of them was for education. The charitable grants did not exceed 220,000*l.*

Mr. Monck contended, that the support given by Government to charitable institutions generated more mischief than it relieved. If they were to give 100,000*l.*, for instance, to the Foundling Hospital, instead of 30,400*l.*, they would do nothing more than give a bonus to incontinency and to the propagation of illegitimate children (a laugh). The house was now proceeding in a wrong course, and that the best thing it could do would be to abandon it as soon as possible.

Mr. Goulburn, on being urged by Mr. Hume, said, that he would willingly consent to any advisable reduction, but he would not pledge himself to make any annual reduction: the amount of the grant must be always commensurate with its necessity.

Mr. C. Grant was of opinion, that though the principle of some of these grants was objectionable, the reduction of them ought to be gradual. If the house thought it proper to interfere with the charitable institutions of Ireland, he trusted that it would take care, first of all, that its bounty was equally divided amongst men of all religious persuasions in Ireland; and next, that it did not collect in Dublin all the pauperism and profligacy of Ireland.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that before hon. members condemned these grants to the different schools and hospitals in Dublin so loudly, they ought to consider of what avail they were to that metropolis. They were most of them established before the Union, and were supported by the various noblemen and gentry who at that time were in the habit of residing part of the year in Dublin. As the Union had withdrawn from them great part of that support, the Government thought themselves bound in a certain degree to supply it. In London these institutions abounded, but were so well supported by voluntary contributions, that it was unnecessary for Government to give them any assistance. But as far as any evil arose from such a mode of expending money, it was the same whether the money came from the purse of the public, or from that of individuals. He would not withdraw these grants upon any abstract objections, because he knew that by doing so, he should leave many persons in a state of absolute destitution.

Mr. S. Rice contended that the efforts made by individuals to relieve private distress in Ireland were equal to those made by any individuals in any European country. Though Ireland had no poor rates—and long might she continue without them (hear, hear)—her poor were supported by dispensations of charity, which did honour to the country.

The grants were then agreed to.

Mr. Goulburn moved the resolution of granting 19,938*l.* 9*s.* 2½*d.* to defray the expenses of the Irish linen board.

Mr. Hume strongly objected to this vote, in consequence of its principle being in direct variance from that recently recognized and acted upon in commercial affairs. If this board were continued, they would be called upon for similar establishments to superintend other branches of manufacture.

Mr. Goulburn reminded the hon. gent. that the linen manufacture was of the greatest importance to Ireland, and this board was calculated to extend its value. He observed, also, that it gave employment to the poor, an object much insisted upon by hon. gents. opposite.

Mr. Peel reminded the committee, that this question involved a consideration of feeling as well as of policy, and ought not therefore to be viewed on abstract commercial principles. They had discouraged the Irish woollen, and substituted that of linen; he hoped, therefore, they would not precipitately withdraw from it this kind of support.

Mr. Gordon complained that the money for salaries for the Irish linen board went chiefly to the retainers of ministers.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer adverted to the reduction of the linen bounties, to show that Government had not been asleep at their posts. Ireland was unlike countries which were prepared to receive the best principles of political economy. It would be imprudent to withdraw suddenly those aids which Ireland had been accustomed to receive.

Mr. J. Smith did not expect that the principles of political economy could be enforced in such a country as Ireland, and should therefore support the grant. His hon. friend (Mr. Hume) had stated, that out of seventy-two individuals connected with this board, there was not one Catholic. He hoped that that assertion might not turn out to be entirely accurate. There would never be prosperity in Ireland until there was an end of religious animosity.

For the motion, 76; against it, 17.—Majority, 59.

MONDAY, MAY 30.—On the resolution for granting £5,000. for the completion of public works,

Mr. Hume objected that the last grant had been made with an understanding that Government had solemnly bound themselves to discontinue this expense at the earliest possible period.

Mr. Goulburn said, that the works in question had been undertaken when the country laboured under the deepest distress for want of the means of employment for the population. The roads and buildings were of considerable usefulness and beauty in themselves; but they had a stronger recommendation on a moral account. By them the labouring poor had been taught how to make the most of their industry, by working at piece work, and the upper classes had been taught the happy consequences which resulted from the habit of paying those employed in their service adequately. These works were particularly useful at that time of the year when the wages of agricultural labour failed the poor classes.

Mr. Greville thought that a stop ought to be put to the expenses of public works in many of those counties of Ireland wherein they had been for a long time carrying on; and other counties which had not yet felt the benefit of such works should be admitted, in their turn, to participate in them.

Mr. Peel was of opinion that the execution of public works was one of the most legitimate objects to which the public money could be applied.

Mr. C. H. Hutchinson concurred with those who thought that the employment afforded by these public works to the poor and labouring classes had done much to secure the peace and tranquillity of the south of Ireland. On the same account he recommended a perseverance in the same beneficial system.

Mr. Hume thought, on the contrary, that the plan of giving a share of the public money to one particular class of persons, as an inducement for them to labour on public works, was highly objectionable. Upwards of 1,000,000.

had been appropriated to these purposes in Ireland already; and as for any certain good that it had done, it was his opinion that it might as well have been thrown away.

The resolution was then agreed to.

Banking Companies.

TUESDAY, MARCH 15.—Sir Geo. Hill moved for leave to bring in a bill for the regulation of copartnerships in Ireland, which he described as a measure necessary to give protection to the capital now rapidly flowing into Ireland from this country.

Mr. Dawson did not wish to do any thing injurious to the Bank of Ireland. But that company owed duties to the country, in the fulfilment of which, during times of urgent distress, they had shown themselves backward. He alluded not only to their tardiness in lowering discounts, but also to their backwardness in not enlarging the circulation at a pressing juncture, when that accommodation was required. He anticipated great advantages to the productive powers, the commercial wealth, and the revenue of Ireland, by the establishment of a provincial banking company. Some such measure as that proposed was absolutely necessary, for although past experience had shown how direful were the hazards of private banking in Ireland, Provincial banking was, nevertheless, rapidly going on, to meet the necessities of commerce.

Sir H. Parnell agreed in censuring the indifference of the Bank of Ireland to the distresses which some time ago prevailed in the south of Ireland, and which they might with ease have prevented. He complained of the inequality of the existing law upon the subject as regarded both England and Ireland.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer had bestowed his full share of attention upon the subject of this bill, to which he promised all the support which he could conscientiously give. He did not agree with the suggestion of his hon. friend (Mr. Dawson), who seemed to think that the charter of the Bank of Ireland might be infringed upon because of some real or supposed impropriety in their past management. On the contrary, he thought that the contract with the Bank of Ireland ought to be strictly kept. If the company had done any thing contrary to the purposes for which their charter was granted, that would be another case. It could never be contended, that because the legislature might happen to be hampered with an obligation, that they should therefore be at liberty to violate it (hear, hear.) The principles, however, that had been advanced, would, if fully acted upon, lead to a violation of the Bank of Ireland's charter, by implication at least, although they might not in specific terms infringe upon its absolute expressed conditions. His hon. friend had been, he thought, a little severe on this body. They might, to be sure, have been in some degree illiberal; but that was a fault which they committed in common with most other commercial bodies, who generally looked after their own advantage, with rather more anxiety than they manifested for the concerns of others. Such a fault, however, could never appear to Parliament of sufficient weight to justify an attack upon a chartered company of this nature. If, indeed, it could be shown that the Bank of Ireland had, in any way, violated any duties, the performance of which on its part, was stipulated in the conditions of its charter, that fact might furnish a proper ground for such an attack. Whatever the house might ultimately desire to do, he was very sure they would not forget that it was the weakest and most impolitic thing in the world to seek to effect a public benefit by any act of positive injustice (hear)—by any act, which, while it would be oppressive and unjust to private individuals, could never be justified as a general measure on grounds of public feeling (hear).

Mr. Spring Rice, acquiesced in thinking, that if there were any thing in the terms of the charter of the Bank of Ireland to preclude the introduction of this or any similar bill, that would be of itself a valid objection to the present motion. But when the st. hon. gent. adverted, as he rather seemed to do, to considerations of an equitable nature in favour of the Bank, he must beg leave to quote a principle, that he had often heard contended for by hon. friends of his in the legal profession; that whenever a party set up an equitable construction, he must come into court with clean hands, by showing that he had done his best to fulfil the expressed condition of the contract. But up to a very late period, what had been the conduct of the Bank of Ireland? It had refused these advances or accommodations, however unexceptionable the security tendered, unless the parties concerned happened to be engaged in the trade of Dublin itself. If they belonged to Cork or Belfast, for example, or any of the southern districts, however respectable they might be, parties must establish an agency in Dublin before they could obtain any such advances. Now the Bank of Ireland did no business at all of this kind under 5 per cent.; the charge of the Dublin agency was about 1 per cent. more; and with the postages, brokerage, &c., the accommodation to such parties could only be obtained at the rate of nearly 7 per cent. It was the jealousy which the Bank of Ireland felt at the introduction of English capital and capitalists into Ireland, that alone induced it to take any adverse steps to such a measure as this. As to English capital, he did not augur all the benefits which the hon. gent. anticipated from its introduction, so much as he looked forward to the happiest results from the circumstance of that English capital being to be managed by English capitalists (hear, hear). That circumstance would introduce into Ireland those habits of good faith, regularity, and punctuality in business which its commercial transactions at present stood so much in want of. Upon this principle it was that he felt chiefly induced to vote for the measure.

Mr. Trant, in supporting the motion, stated a fact that had occurred not long ago, that went very far to prove how necessary some measure of this nature had become. A relation of his had a sum of a few hundred pounds to remit to England. He happened to reside about a hundred miles from Dublin; and there being no private bank between him and the capital, through which he could remit the money, he was absolutely obliged to travel with it in his pocket.

Mr. M. Fitzgerald said, that in the time of the most extreme pecuniary distress and depreciation in Ireland, a very few years since, the Bank of Ireland appeared to be wholly insensible to the distresses of Munster and Connaught, and limited its aid within the circumscribed limit which had been spoken of. The disadvantages under which the trade of the south of Ireland laboured, were much increased by the Bank's refusing to discount the provincial paper, unless accepted by some resident in Dublin. The commercial intercourse between Munster and Dublin was, in consequence, very limited. The chief trade of Munster was with England. He warmly supported the proposed measure.

Mr. Sneyd asserted that no private bank whatever, but the Bank of Ireland alone, had relieved the distresses of the south of Ireland.

Currency Assimilation.

THURSDAY, MAY, 12.—In a committee on the Currency Acts, Mr. Wallace proposed a series of resolutions with a view to assimilate the currencies of England and Ireland. He entered into a review of the state of the currency in the two countries for a long series of years, in which he pointed out many of the practical disadvantages of a want of assimilation in both. His object was to remedy these inconveniences, by equalizing the real and nominal value of money in England and Ireland. With this view, he proposed that after a certain period, all pecuniary contracts should be understood to be made as for English money. The bill, however, would not affect existing contracts in Ireland, which should be taken at twelve-thirtieths of English currency. The Bank of Ireland notes were now issuable for three years, and re-issuable at any time within that term for a similar period—so as, in fact, to include a term of six years. He proposed that they should not be re-issued after being once paid into the Bank; but he intended to allow for the stamps on the old notes as for spoiled stamps. The new notes issued in their place would have, to prevent mistakes, some distinguishing marks to denote that they were for such an amount, British currency. To prevent any mistakes, or confusion that might arise in reckoning the copper coins of Ireland, thirteen pence of which at present represented the value of a shilling, British currency, he proposed to have an entirely new copper coinage, which would bring the twelve pence to the value of one shilling British; and in order that no person might plead ignorance of the act, he would propose the adoption of some measure which would give it the utmost publicity. He should so arrange the details of the measure, as not to affect the forty shilling freeholds in Ireland.

The resolutions were agreed to without dissent.†

Butter Trade.

TUESDAY, MARCH 15.—Sir H. Parnell said, he should have contented himself with merely moving for all copies of memorials that had been presented to the Treasury, relating to this trade, if the extraordinary interest which this subject had excited in that part of Ireland with which he was connected, had not appeared to require a few observations upon the matter. The butter-trade formed an export of the antual value of about 3,000,000*l.*, or 700,000 casks of butter (hear, hear). This trade was principally carried on by a great number of small farmers and merchants. In the year 1812, the trade was unfortunately put under a number of very vexatious and mischievous regulations, specified in an act of Parliament then passed. Other acts had been made before of a prejudicial nature in themselves, but they had not been enforced. In 1812 a bill was introduced—notwithstanding his utmost opposition, and the necessity he felt himself under of repeatedly dividing the house upon it, which subjected the butter trade to a whole series of such vexatious regulations, of which the principal ones were these: that every cask of butter should be sold in a public market;—that a public officer, called a taster, should taste all the butters brought to market (a laugh), and mark their respective qualities. The result of this arrangement was, that if the taster chose to mark a cask “second quality,” he diminished its value as much as ten shillings per cwt. If he marked it “third quality,” he reduced it five shillings per cwt. more. Now gentlemen would observe how serious a difference this must make in the price of a cask, which on the average was about four pounds sterling. They would see, too, what a dangerous power this was to vest in any officer, whose office, too, hardly any respectable person could be found to take. No less than 700,000 casks must annually undergo this operation of tasting (a laugh). It was impossible for him to describe to the house the extent to which corruption and practical oppression took place under a system thus requiring every cask of butter to be publicly tasted by the tasters (a laugh). Upon this tasting there was a fee of two pence per cask, which two pence the merchant or factor deducted from the proceeds in his account-sales, and undertook to recover again of the buyer. But under various pretences of weighing, branding, &c., this charge occasionally rose to five pence, seven pence, eleven pence, and even as high as five-and-twenty pence per cask (hear)—a loss which the poor farmer, on whose account it was sold, had to sustain. There was an officer, also, appointed under the act, to mark and brand on the casks their capacity and weight. But he had discovered, from various sources of information, that it frequently happened that the officer, whose duty was to brand the casks, accepted bribes from interested parties, and left his brands in the hands of the coopers themselves (hear). In short, both in this manner, and in respect to the weighing in the market, the greatest corruption prevailed in the markets in Ireland. He trusted therefore, that the treasury had already made up their minds as to what course they would take in respect to this important subject, after the memorial which had been already presented to them, and especially after the notice which had been given by the hon. member for London to introduce a bill for the better regulation of this trade.

Mr. Charles Grant thought the hon. bart. had stated quite enough to convince the house, that the present regulations of this important trade had led only to fraud and collusion. They had been, as might have been expected, discovered to be quite inefficient for the purposes which they were intended to effect, and had been productive of much mischief that had never been anticipated. He could not help thinking that these regulations were of a piece with the system of marking and branding the Irish linens, which had been so utterly ineffectual to advance the welfare of that trade (hear).

Mr. Hume expressed his entire concurrence in what had fallen from the rt. hon. gent. Since the repeal of the laws about branding the linens of Scotland, its trade in that manufacture had very much improved (hear, hear); and he wished the linen manufacturers of Ireland could be prevailed upon to try a similar experiment, which he was sure would be attended with results equally beneficial.

Mr. Dawson hoped, that in the interference with the trading interest of Ireland, the linen trade, which was going on in an extremely gratifying manner, would be suffered to remain as it was.

Mr. M. Fitzgerald argued, that there was an absolute necessity for an alteration in the act of 1812. By one of its clauses, butter could not be sent to the Cork market, except in a firkin which had been made in Cork. The consequence was, that the whole province of Munster must have firkins manufactured in Cork, if it were intended that the butter manufactured in the different districts should be sent to the Cork market.

Sir H. Parnell contended that it was essentially necessary to go into an inquiry on this subject. He should fail in doing his duty if he did not impress on ministers the necessity of granting relief to hundreds, nay thousands of people in Ireland who were oppressed by the present system. Those persons in Cork, Limerick, and Dublin, who supported the present system, were interested individuals, who derived large incomes from weighing butter. As interested parties, their opinion ought to be received very cautiously. The existing measure was carried by the Chief Sec. for Ireland for 1812. It was an act of Government; and Government having imposed on the country this extensive system of corruption and oppression, it was the duty of his majesty's ministers to remove immediately this obnoxious measure (hear, hear).

The motion was then agreed to.—The subject was again mentioned on FRIDAY, APRIL 22, when Sir G. Hill was of opinion that no new measure should be adopted respecting this trade without a serious and extended inquiry.

Sir J. Newport had no objection to inquiry; but in his opinion it ought not to take place till the commencement of the next session. If the examination were now set on foot, it would have a great effect on the exportation of butter. Day after day the price of that article would be influenced by the evidence given, or the statements made before the house.

Sir H. Parnell said, that the corrupt practices carried on under the Butter Act were a most severe infliction on poor and industrious people. And he could see no reason why inquiry should not commence now. This was but the 22d of April, and on the 12th day of May last year, a committee was appointed to inquire into the whole state of Ireland.

Mr. C. Grant was quite ready to go into inquiry on the subject.

SCOTLAND.

LORDS, MONDAY, FEB. 7.—The Lord Chancellor called to their lordships' recollection a bill for regulating the judicature of Scotland, which had passed that house in the course of the last session. Before that bill was brought in, a commission of inquiry had been appointed. The commissioners were selected from among the persons best qualified and able to give information on the subject. A report was made by the commission to the house, and a bill conformable to the recommendations of the report was introduced and passed, and sent down to the other house, where it received considerable amendments in consequence of some Scotch publications on the subject. It was not thought consistent with their lordships' dignity to adopt the amendments made on such authority, and the bill was lost. He intended, therefore, to bring in a new bill in precisely the same form as that of the last session, and if any further light could be thrown on the subject, that bill might undergo alterations when before their lordships' committee.—On the following Monday his lordship brought in a bill, which was a copy of the bill of last session. It was read a first time.

THURSDAY, FEB. 24.—The Lord Chancellor moved the second reading of the bill, and after stating the grounds of the measure in nearly the same terms as upon a former occasion, observed, that if their lordships should find the nature of jury trial so completely understood as to warrant a change, they would have to consider whether it ought to be farther extended, or remain in its present state. It was important for their lordships to consider whether the bill should be perpetual or temporary: if temporary, sufficient time should be allowed to make a fair experiment of jury trial. In proposing the second reading of the bill this day, it was his intention to move its commitment on Monday next.

The bill was then read a second time and was ordered to be committed on Monday.

FRIDAY, MARCH 4.—The Lord Chancellor having moved that the bill be committed,

The Earl of Lauderdale proposed a clause, the object of which was to cause all the acts of sederunt of the Court of Session to be presented to both houses of Parliament.

The clause being inserted, the bill was reported and ordered to be printed.

MONDAY, FEB. 28.—Lord Melville rose, pursuant to the notice he had given of his intention to introduce a bill for better regulating the mode of choosing juries in Scotland. It would be in the recollection of their lordships, that on more than one occasion when a bill for altering the present manner of choosing Scotch juries was formerly before the house, he had objected to it on account of the complexity and inefficiency of the proposed remedy. The machinery of the bill brought from the Commons was very inconvenient, even more inconvenient than that now in use. At that time he had stated that he would, with the concurrence and assistance of persons in the northern parts of the united kingdom, well informed on the subject, undertake to prepare a bill, having the same object as that which had been rejected. This bill he had now the honour to tender to their lordships. As to the alterations, in the first place, their lordships were aware that at the Union the law of high treason was assimilated throughout Great Britain; but though the law on this subject was the same in Scotland as in England, it had been found difficult to render the mode of choosing the jury exactly alike. In England assizes were held in each county, but in Scotland the circuits were held for districts, consisting generally of four counties. He therefore meant to propose, that in cases of high treason the lists of grand and petty jurors should be returned from districts, and not from counties. In the second place, it was to be recollected, in regard to ordinary trials, that the assize in Scotland was not at all regulated in the same manner as in England. The prisoner received a list of the names from which his jury was struck fifteen days before trial; and he proposed, in addition to this, to make the mode of selecting the jury more conformable to the practice of this country; the choosing of juries, which was now left to the judge, he proposed to effect by ballot, leaving both to the prisoner and the prosecutor an equal right of challenge.

The bill was then read the first time.

COMMONS, MONDAY, APRIL 18.—On the motion for the second reading of the Scotch Juries bill, in this house,

Mr. Kennedy said, that the bill before the house was for the purpose of effecting an alteration in the existing law, which he had advocated for the last five years. He could not, however, fail to remark the inconsistencies of the learned lord opposite, who had so frequently opposed the measure, he was himself now about to introduce. Late as was the period at which it was introduced, he hailed it with great satisfaction.

Mr. Hume recommended that some clause should be introduced to simplify and reduce the amount of qualification for special jurors, and for employing them on criminal as well as civil trials.

The Lord Advocate said that the main object of the bill, which had been framed with great trouble and care, was to provide an impartial jury for all cases which should come on to be tried. With reference to the various classes of society, and the interests which were connected with them, it would be obviously impossible to do away with the difference between common and special juries; but their attendance and impartiality had been amply secured by the provisions of the bill. He claimed on behalf of the persons by whom this bill had been prepared, credit for the fair and honest manner in which it was brought forward.

Mr. Abercrombie said, that the credit of this measure, whatever it might be, and he was disposed to think very highly of it, belonged wholly to his hon. friend (Mr. Kennedy). His hon. friend, when he first proposed it, was called a dangerous innovator; and yet now the Lord Advocate was found to go much further than his hon. friend had intended. He had now in his possession a letter of the Lord Advocate addressed to the Scotch freeholders, in which they were warned against the object of this measure. He therefore wished that the people of Scotland might learn from the circumstances that attended it that the Scotch freeholders did not represent the interests of that people, but that if the people would persevere in a good cause, without being alarmed either by the denunciation of the learned lord, or of those members who were supposed to represent the interests of the landholders of Scotland, they must ultimately succeed. He had no doubt that very great benefits would result to Scotland from the present bill.

The bill was then read a second time, and ordered to be committed on Friday next.

Partnership Societies.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 22.—The Lord Advocate moved the third reading of the Partnership Societies bill.

Mr. J. P. Grant, alluding to the very thin state of the house, wished the third reading to be postponed.

The Lord Advocate was very sorry to press the measure, but he was obliged to go down to Scotland on the morrow (a laugh).

Mr. J. P. Grant contended that the bill had been brought in, without any thing like due consideration: its preamble recited that to be true, which, in fact, was manifestly false; and declared that to be law which the decision of the House of Lords in a recent case had declared not to be law. Without meaning to employ unnecessarily strong language, he would venture to say that if this bill should pass, it would hold up this house to absolute ridicule. Now the bill set forth, that by the law of Scotland, partnerships or commercial associations of individuals might sue and be sued in respect of debts, bonds, &c. in the name of the firm; but when he last addressed the house, he had showed that so far from this being the case, decisions of the courts of session in Scotland had repeatedly held that such partnerships could neither sue nor be sued. Indeed, the following part of the preamble stated "that doubts had arisen, &c." and the ground of those doubts was described to be that the House of Lords would not entertain any question on appeal in cases wherein the parties had sued in the names of the partnership.

The Lord Advocate begged the learned gent. would understand that he was called to Scotland by public duty, not by private convenience. He must contend that by the well-known law of Scotland, as it had existed for upwards of 100 years, partnerships might sue and be sued by their secretary; and by an act of the Scottish Parliament in 1691, that was expressly stated and provided. Authority, too, was given by the same law to record bills of exchange, in further extension of the principle that partnerships might sue and be sued. The records of Parliament would show innumerable instances of appeals carried on in the names of such joint partnerships. He would further observe to his learned friend, that this was not a declaratory but a prospective bill. As to the case before the House of Lords which had been alluded to, no decision had yet been come to in respect of it, and therefore it could prove nothing, for his learned friend's argument. The measure was one of the utmost importance to the commercial interest of Scotland; and he would take upon himself to say they would be excessively alarmed if they heard that the question had been made any matter of doubt.

Mr. Thomas Wilson, though not connected with the country in question, readily supported the bill; and he was so convinced of its beneficial tendency, that he should be glad to see a similar measure introduced into our own commercial law.

Mr. Scarlett would be sorry to see any such thing introduced into the law of England; for it would lead in its operation to a great deal of fraud (bear). For if all partners in a partnership were able to sue or be sued in the name of the firm, what would be the condition of a defendant, who having been proceeded against by all of them, should have judgment in his favour? How would he be able to recover his costs? It was to be hoped, therefore, no such measure would be engrafted upon the law of England. As to the bill itself, he must be allowed to say that it was clearly a declaratory bill.

Mr. Baring was sorry that the matter did not appear to have been more digested before its introduction in this shape. The learned lord had intimated that in Scotland it was absolutely necessary, and could not be dispensed with; a learned friend of his had just declared, that he should be sorry to have it introduced into the law of England, because it would be productive of fraud; and that observation was cheered by the learned Attorney-General. Now if, as he himself believed, this would be a beneficial measure for one part of the empire, why would it not also for another? He concurred with his hon. friend (Mr. Wilson) in wishing to see a similar provision introduced into our law. This was another instance in which lawyers had shown that they were not the best judges of what laws would be most beneficial for merchants (a laugh). In Ireland an old law existed, authorising individuals to form partnerships with a limited responsibility; but in England the matter remained in a state of doubt and difficulty, which he had no doubt the lawyers considered to be the perfection of all law (a laugh). Against the present bill, however, he was disposed to vote, for one of the reasons that seemed to have induced his hon. friend (Mr. Wilson) to support it—namely, that it did not apply to all parts of the united kingdom.

The Attorney-General said, it had been considered by those who introduced this bill, that they were proceeding upon what was law, and had been considered to be law in Scotland for 100 years and upwards. At the suggestion of some commercial men, he himself had lately entertained some thoughts of proposing a similar measure in respect to England; but when he came to look more carefully at its necessary operation in this country, and to consider how wide a difference the very existence of such a court as the Court of Chancery made between the two kingdoms in respect of the expediency of such a law (which court Scotland did not possess), he was convinced that it was not advisable to introduce any such measure into the law of England. The present bill was not declaratory; it did not establish any new principle; but was brought in for the purpose only of removing any doubts about that which was already law in Scotland.

The bill was then read a third time and passed.

Scotch Peers.

LORDS, MONDAY, MARCH 7.—Lord Melville rose, pursuant to the notice he had given, to propose to their lordships an important measure respecting the privileges of some of their own body. There was no necessity for him to state what the law was with regard to peers in this country, as that must be well known to their lordships. In Scotland, however, the law was different. The Scotch peers had, as peers, the same privileges as peers of the United Kingdom, but their situation was affected by the act of union. Subsequently to this, an act had passed, regulating the forms of proceeding in trials of peers, but this act was ambiguous. Some other act, later than this, had made an alteration in the law relative to high treason. The law of England as to treason had been extended to Scotland, but without the machinery of the English law it was inapplicable and ineffective. The trials for high treason which took place in 1715 and 1745 were had, he believed, on impeachments by the house of Commons. Though, in case of treason, the law might now be sufficiently clear, for ordinary cases no provision had been made; Parliament had not stated what the law was, and he wished to have a Committee appointed to find out what it was; and if they thought it necessary, to propose some measure to their lordships. His lordship concluded by moving for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the law as it applied to Peers of Scotland.

Lord Holland wished the inquiry to be extended to offences which were not political. From all he had heard and read on the subject, he was convinced that the laws of Scotland very much required to be looked into by their lordships.

Trials in Scotland.

COMMONS, THURSDAY, MAY 5.—Mr. J. P. Grant moved for leave to bring in a bill to alter and amend the existing law respecting wrongous imprisonment, and delays of trials in Scotland. The learned gent. said it must be evident that it would be better that all the laws on this subject should be comprehended in one act, rather than spread, as they now were, in a variety of acts over the whole statute book. It was allowed by every body, that the Scotch law was extremely defective on these points. Nothing could be more absurd, than that the inhabitants of one end of the country should live under one system of laws, so vitally affecting their interests, while the inhabitants of the other end should live under a different system. He could assure the learned lord opposite (the Lord Advocate) that it was not his intention to interfere with the office of Lord Advocate. His objects were principally these:—first, to throw greater responsibility on the magistrates in granting warrants for the apprehension of criminals; next, to give an enlarged power to the judges of the criminal courts, for the better protection of the liberty of the subject; also, to remove doubts and difficulties where they existed; and lastly, to place the poor man on the same footing as the rich, with respect to trials. The learned gentleman then proceeded to explain to the house the insufficiency of the present law, and the absolute necessity of its amendment. He added, that if the house should allow the bill to be brought in, he would propose that a distant day should be appointed for its second reading, in order that it should in the mean time be printed and sent down to Scotland, for the purpose of being submitted to the law authorities of that country for their opinion.

The Lord Advocate said he did not mean to oppose the bringing in the bill, but at the same time he thought that great caution should be observed in interfering with a law which had existed for upwards of one hundred years, and which might be considered the habeas corpus act of Scotland. The learned lord then proceeded to call the attention of the house to the advantages of the present law, and contended that the act of 1701 afforded a greater protection to the people of Scotland against wrongous imprisonment, than was afforded to the people of England by the habeas corpus act. He hoped, however, that his learned friend would bring in his bill rather for the amendment than the repeal of the present law, as the word "repeal" might excite some alarm among the people of Scotland. The changes which the bill of his learned friend would introduce into the law of Scotland would cause all the criminals of that country to be tried in Edinburgh, and would so create an annual expense of 15,000*l.* or 20,000*l.*, without conferring any benefit on the public.

Mr. Grant said, that he would comply with the suggestions which had been made to him, and would alter the title of his bill from "a bill to repeal," to "a bill to amend," the act of 1701.

Leave was then given to bring in the bill.

Shooting and Stabbing Bill.

MONDAY, JUNE 20.—On the motion for the third reading of the above bill,

Mr. J. P. Grant said, he had no objection to the extension of Lord Ellenborough's act to Scotland; but the bill now before the house went a great deal farther, and created, in the last clause, quite a new law. It enacted, that if any one threw vitriolic acid on the person of another, that act should be deemed a capital offence. This provision was introduced in consequence of certain proceedings that had recently taken place in Scotland. Vitriolic acid, it appeared, had been thrown on the clothes, and sometimes on the persons, of individuals, who refused to join the workmen in their unlawful proceedings. It was undoubtedly fit that this practice should be put down; but the way to put it down was not by enacting a penalty at which the minds of the public revolted, and swelling, on account of local outrages, the list of capital punishments in a code, already the most sanguinary in Europe. In legislating on matters of this kind, the house ought always to endeavour to carry the public mind along with them. There was, too, a strange anomaly in this bill. By Lord Ellenborough's act it was provided, that if A. fired a pistol with intent to kill or maim B. and in doing so missed his object, and killed or maimed C. he should be subjected to the penalty of death, just as if he had succeeded in his original intention. But here, if A. threw vitriolic acid on B. and deprived C. of sight, he was not liable to the penalty, since it was only the act coupled with the intent, and not the intent alone, that was punished; he believed that this was the first time in the criminal legislation of any country that the intention to commit a crime was only made punishable provided that intention took effect. He should therefore move the third reading this day six months.

The Lord Advocates said, there was no man more unwilling than he was to extend the penal code of the country; and he was sure, if gentlemen connected with Glasgow were then present, they would state the fact, that for three years past he had refused all applications to resort to the present measure. But the scenes which had occurred in the west of Scotland for a considerable time compelled him, however reluctantly, to legislate on this subject; and he felt perfectly convinced that he could not devise an adequate remedy for this evil if this clause were not introduced. Much information would be found on this subject in the evidence given before the committee on the combination laws. He then held in his hand two certificates from Dr. Corkendale, of Glasgow, detailing the deplorable state to which two workmen had been reduced, who were taken to the infirmary in consequence of vitriolic acid having been thrown in their faces. Several persons were tried for this offence, and sentenced to transportation, but that punishment had not the effect of diminishing the crime. He could assure the house that he had been recommended to introduce this measure, not only by the magistrates, but by the workmen themselves. Every clause of Lord Killenborough's act applied to this case. If a man were cut in the slightest degree with a sharp instrument, he was liable to the penalty of death for the act; and surely there could be no comparison between a slight injury of that kind, and the misery which an individual must suffer when vitriolic acid was thrown in his face. The man who inflicted a wound, might have had the knife in his hand, by chance at the moment; but when vitriolic acid was flung on an individual, it must have been purchased for that diabolical purpose. If this clause were thrown out, he would withdraw the bill altogether. In cases of shooting and stabbing, the probability was, that the person injured, or some passing individual, could give evidence as to the hand that inflicted the wound; but where vitriolic acid was made use of, such precautions were taken as rendered it extremely difficult to procure evidence. It did not however follow, that though the offence was capital, that capital punishment would always follow its commission. His learned friend must know that a discretionary power was left in the hands of the judge. Neither was it intended that this should be a permanent measure. It was meant to confine it to five years, at the expiration of which time he hoped the necessity for it would have ceased.

Mr. Peel felt that it was due to the moral character of the people that the bill should be temporary.

Mr. Hume said, that the forbearance shown by the learned lord when he was called on to legislate on this subject did him the greatest credit (hear); and any hon. member who looked to the evidence taken before the committee on the combination laws, would see that the best possible results had been attained by that forbearance (hear).

Mr. J. P. Grant said, as this was to be a temporary measure, he was willing to withdraw his opposition. The bill was then read a third time, and passed.

FOREIGN DEPENDENCIES.

Colonial Trade Bill.

COMMONS, MONDAY, MARCH 21.—The house having resolved itself into a committee to consider of the Acts 3rd Geo. IV. cap. 44 and 45, on the American and West India Trade,

Mr. Huskisson said, although the resolutions with which he should conclude his speech were in strict accordance with the recommendation in His Majesty's speech, and with the disposition of the house, in respect to the removal of restrictions upon commerce; he was afraid that it would be necessary for him to trespass, more at length than he could wish, upon the indulgence of the committee. Considering the many important interests that might be affected, the alarms that might possibly be excited, the predilections that might be awakened, the prejudices that might be roused, by the measures he was about to propose, he was sure the committee would forgive him, if he dwelt upon explanations and statements, which might, otherwise, appear to be uncalled for. He could assure the committee that if he were about to recommend alterations at variance with the ancient sentiments of this country, in respect to colonial policy and trade, it was not because he considered the views of our ancestors as necessarily erroneous, or that innovation must necessarily be improvement; but it was because the circumstances and state of the world, in which he had to examine colonial interests, had changed; and it became them as practical statesmen, to deal with those interests with a reference to that change. It is only in that sense, and with that qualification, that he desired to be looked upon as an innovator. He was not anxious to give effect to new principles, where circumstances did not call for their application; feeling, as he did, from no small experience in public business—and every day confirmed that feeling—how much, in the vast and complex interests of this country, all general theories, however incontrovertible in the abstract, required to be weighed with a calm circumspection, to be directed by a temperate discretion, and to be adapted to all the existing relations of society, with a careful hand, and a due regard to the establishments and institutions which had grown up under those relations. It was under these impressions, that he intended this evening to request the attention of the committee to the system of our commercial policy in respect to our colonies. It must be well known to every gentleman that the long established policy of all the European powers possessing colonies in the New World, and of this country among the rest, was that of an entire and rigid exclusion of those colonies from all commercial intercourse, except with the mother country. To uphold this exclusion, and to forbid all such intercourse, seemed of the very essence of colonization. In the strict and even inhospitable enforcement of this principle Spain, with the largest colonial possessions in the world, shewed herself the most determined, and most exclusive. But without being equally jealous, other powers were not less tenacious of the principle. He could not give a stronger proof of this, than by reminding the committee, that this exclusive intercourse was held to be a part of the international law of Europe. In our prize courts it had been commonly referred to, and acted upon, as the rule of the Seven-years' War. Under this rule, the colony of a belligerent could not claim to carry on trade through the intervention of a neutral, because that neutral was not permitted to participate in such trade in time of peace. But although this had been the long-established basis of the colonial system, vast inroads had been made upon that system within the last fifteen years. Let the committee look at the Brazils, that immense country, which was held by Portugal under a strict exclusion, till the migration of the Royal Family from Lisbon to Rio de Janeiro, in 1808. Let them look at the large and fertile Island of St. Domingo; to the present state of those extended regions on the continent of America, lately, as colonies of Spain, shut out from all intercourse with the rest of the world. Again, let them look at Cuba, and the Islands which had continued their allegiance to the Spanish crown, the trade with which was now open. Considering this almost general revolution in the system of colonial commerce, and its influence upon the commerce of our own colonies, upon the commerce of rival nations, upon the views, feelings, and speculations of the mercantile part of the community, and of our own colonial population, was it not enough, of itself, to warrant at least, the inquiry, whether so great a change in the colonial system of other nations did not call for some change on our part? He would not examine how far this inquiry was now become necessary, in consequence of our pretensions to participate in the commerce of these foreign colonies, and by the fact of our so participating; or how far fairness and justice, and that duty, which power, above all, owed to weakness, required that we should reciprocate the benefits which we exacted. These considerations, however important, did not perhaps immediately belong to the discussion, viewed as a commercial question; but there was another inquiry which, in that point of view at least, it became them not to neglect. Had the colonies, of which the trade had been thrown open, benefited by this enlargement of their intercourse? Were they likely to benefit still more? Rivals in the same productions, competitors in the same markets, could we, in the long run, with our system of monopoly, stand against their freedom of trade? If we could not, were we not risking the good will and attachment of our colonies, as well as the interests of our commerce? Was perseverance in such a system politically wise, or practically safe? Was the great change, begun half a century ago, and still in progress, in the political and commercial state of the vast continent of America, from the Gulph of St. Lawrence to Cape Horn, to lead to no change in our mode of administering the extensive possessions, both continental and insular, which remained under our dominion and protection in that quarter of the globe? Did the immense and rapidly growing commerce and navigation of the United States of America, suggest no matter for consideration, in reference to our own commercial and naval interests? These were important questions, which, in the department allotted to him in the public service, he had asked himself, as a minister of the crown, and which he now felt it his duty to recommend to the serious consideration of the committee. Recollecting that, for centuries, it had been a settled maxim of policy, in all great states having dependencies, to make the interests of those dependencies subservient to the interests or the supposed interests, of the parent state; there was, perhaps, no country where the consequences of perseverance in such a system, on the one hand, and of its relaxation on the other, could be so forcibly illustrated as in our own. In the first place let them look at Ireland, till the year 1782 a dependency of Great Britain, in the sense which he had described. It was so not only in fact, but in law, and under the express provision of a statute, entitled, "An Act for the better securing the dependency of the kingdom of Ireland upon the crown of Great Britain &c." The many other causes which contributed to keep that fertile island in a state of misery and depression he should pass by; but it was a well-known fact, that till 1780, the agriculture, the internal industry, the manufactures, the commerce, the navigation of Ireland, were all held in the most rigid state of subserviency to the supposed interests of Great Britain. In 1778, indeed, it was proposed in the British Parliament, so far to relax this exclusive system, as to allow Ireland to import sugar directly from our West India colonies, for her own use; and, in payment for such sugar, to export her own produce and manufactures (woollens excepted) to those colonies; and further, to allow her to export glass, and some other articles of her own manufacture, directly to foreign parts. What was the reception which those proposals met with in the House of Commons, and on the part of the trading and manufacturing interests of the country? In that house, the opponents of those limited concessions, enumerating the boons which had already been conferred upon Ireland, declared, that to grant any more would be fatal to the commerce and manufactures of England. And what were those mighty boons, beyond which they could not, with safety to themselves, venture to be liberal to others? Why, that we already allowed the Irish to send their beef and butter to our colonies—a permission, however, only granted from year to year, since the breaking out of the American war;—and that we further permitted them to clothe, with articles of their own manufacture, the troops on the Irish establishment, paid and provided by that country, but then serving with our army in North America. The merchants and manufacturers, the ship-owners, the country gentlemen—all took the alarm. All were to be ruined, if the proposed participation were granted to a country almost without a debt, not paying the same taxes with ourselves,—a country in which so many of the population were without employment, and where, from these causes, wages were so much lower, and provisions so much cheaper, than in England. Resting upon these and other grounds, petitions poured in from all quarters, and the house was deterred from proceeding with the proposed measures in that session. He had had the curiosity to look back to some of the leading petitions on that occasion. The merchants of Glasgow prayed, "that neither the present, nor any future advantage should be granted to Ireland, which might, in the least degree, operate to the disadvantage of Great Britain." He quoted this sentence to show the doctrine then universally assumed—that in commerce one country could not be liberal to another; without sacrificing its own interests; and, accordingly, the good people of Glasgow, in those days, maintained, that they had an hereditary right to the sugar trade, and claimed its exclusive possession, for the people of Great Britain, as a property in which Ireland never could be allowed the smallest participation. The language of Manchester was still more decided in reprobating the proposed concession. With the loyal people of that town, it appeared to involve almost a question of allegiance. Liverpool, also, did not hesitate to predict, that, by the adoption of the proposals, "That town and port would speedily be reduced to their original insignificance." In the year 1778, a more limited concession to Ireland was proposed in the British House of Commons. It went no further than to allow the Irish to bring sugar directly from our colonies, limiting the supply to their own consumption; but even this measure was negatived upon a division. Towards the close of that year, the events of the war in North America, and the state of things in Ireland, produced a different feeling in the British Parliament. State necessity, acting under a sense of political danger, yielded, without grace, that which good sense and good feeling had before recommended in vain: and in 1782, under the like pressure, these concessions, fortunately wise in themselves, were rendered irrevocable by the repeal of the statute of the 6th Geo. I. He would not detain the committee with further details of the measures by which, since that period, all the remaining restraints on the commerce, the agriculture, and the industry of Ireland had been gradually removed, up to the termination of the Union duties in the course of last year, and the placing of her commercial intercourse with Great Britain upon the footing of a coasting trade. But he would ask any man, the most devoted to the tenets of the old school of commerce, whether this relaxation, which it was so confidently predicted would be fatal to all the great interests of Great Britain, had not contributed at least as much to augment her wealth and power in agriculture, in shipping, in commerce, and in manufactures, as it had to promote, in all those branches, the advancement of Ireland? He would ask his constituents at Liverpool, to look back to the fears which agitated the generation which preceded them—to compare with the predictions of those fears the present life and bustle of their commerce—to estimate how much of its unparalleled prosperity, unparalleled in the rapidity of its growth, was due to the freedom of commercial intercourse with that country, from the first earnest of which their predecessors anticipated nothing short of annihilation? If from Ireland they turned their eyes to those provinces, which, little more than forty years ago, ceased to be colonial dependencies of Great Britain,—whatever they might think of the proceedings which induced them to resort to arms against the mother country,—whatever feelings might have existed, at any time, of humiliation and regret, that, by the issue of that war, those fine provinces were, for ever, wrested from his Majesty's crown, he would ask any man, whether the disavowance of the United States from the British empire, viewed as a mere question of commerce, had been an injury to this country—whether their emancipation from the commercial thralldom of the colonial system had really been prejudicial to the trade and industry of Great Britain? If the answer must be, that it had not been prejudicial, was there no useful admonition to be derived from this example?—Let them contemplate the possibility of another set of provinces, emancipated from commercial thralldom, but firmly maintaining their political connexion:—their commercial marine a part of our commercial marine—their seamen a part of our seamen—their population a part of our strength:—let them consider whether it would not be worth while to attempt a course which promised, both to those provinces and to the mother country, all the commercial benefits of a free trade together with all the political advantages of our continuing parts of one great empire, and enjoying alike, under the sway and protection of the same sovereign, all the rights and privileges of British subjects. From all the experience which could be collected from the conduct of this country, in respect to Ireland, and to its colonies; from all that he witnessed of what was passing in the colonies of other States; he came clearly to this conclusion, that so far as the colonies themselves were concerned, their prosperity was cramped and impeded by the old system of exclusion and monopoly; and he felt equally warranted in his next inference, that whatever tended to increase the prosperity of the colonies, could not fail, in the long run, to advance in an equal degree, the general interests of the parent state. Requesting the committee to bear in mind these general inferences, he would now state how far we had already relaxed the old rigour of colonial exclusion, and how much further he proposed to proceed in this career. By the acts which had been read (3 Geo. IV. c. 44 and 45), were permitted, first, an intercourse between any countries in America and our Colonies, in the ships of those countries, or in British ships; but the first of those acts required, that the intercourse, at least in the foreign vessel, should be direct from the colony to the country to which the vessel belonged, and it limited very much the articles which could be imported into the colony, according to schedules in which the articles were enumerated; and secondly, a direct trade from the colonies, in articles of their growth or production, to the ports of foreign Europe; but this trade was strictly confined to British ships, which might also carry from those ports, direct to the colonies, certain enumerated articles of foreign growth. The committee would perceive that, in allowing the countries of America to trade with our colonies in their own vessels, we had, in fact, conceded to the navigation of the United States a privilege which was not granted to any state in Europe; and this privilege, though nominally extended to all the countries of America, was really a boon to the United States alone, as the other countries had as yet scarcely any commercial marine. What had hitherto been the return made by the United States for this indulgence? In the first session of their Congress, which followed the opening of this trade by our act of Parliament, they passed a law, imposing alien duties in their ports upon all British ships which might trade between those ports and our colonies, to be levied until the productions of the United States should be admitted into our colonies, upon the same terms and duties as the like productions of any other country, meaning thereby, the like productions not of any other foreign country, but of our own country, or of our own provinces in North America. This was a pretension unheard of in the commercial relations of independent states. It was just as reasonable as it would be, on our part, to require that sugar or rum, from our West India islands, should be admitted at New York upon the same terms and duties as the like articles, the growth and production of Louisiana, or any other of the twenty-four separate States which now constituted the Federal Union. Whatever might have been the arguments used to induce the American Congress to adopt this course, their real reason for making the attempt was, an impression on their part, that we had yielded this intercourse to necessity, and that as our colonies could not subsist without it, they might prescribe the conditions under which it should be carried on. To meet this unexpected proceeding on the part of the United States, we were driven to one of these two courses—either again to prohibit the intercourse with them altogether, or to retaliate the alien duties imposed upon British shipping, by subjecting to the like duties American ships entering the ports of our colonies. Neither of these expedients were in themselves desirable, but we preferred the latter; first, as the mildest, and because the American Government manifested a disposition to negotiate upon the subject; and secondly, because a more comprehensive measure, for giving a wider opening to the intercourse of other countries, with our colonies, was in contemplation; such a measure, as if adopted, must take away all pretext, on the part of the United States, for continuing those alien duties, and shew them, that if they did not choose to trade with our colonies upon equal terms with other countries, the colonies could do without their trade altogether. After this explanation of the mode in which the permission given to the United States to trade in their own ships with our colonies had been received by the Government of that country, he would ask the committee, independently of all general considerations, why should we refuse the like indulgence to the ships of European States? Were we more jealous of the navigation of Denmark, Sweden, Russia, Holland, or the Hanse Towns, than of that of the United States? Was it fair or politic to grant to the one what we withheld from the other? He thought that every man who understood the political interests of England, as connected with the maintenance of her naval power, must be satisfied that this could not be a wise policy; and that it would be expedient to permit the same latitude of trade to the ships of other countries, as was now allowed to those of the United States. But he went further; he was prepared to open the commerce of our colonies to all friendly states, upon the same principle,—though of course with some difference in the detail of its modifications—upon which they were at liberty to trade with Jersey or with Ireland. With the exception of some articles which it would be necessary to prohibit, such as fire-arms and ammunition of war generally, and sugar, rum, &c. in the sugar colonies, he proposed to admit a free intercourse between all our colonies and other countries, either in British ships, or in the ships of those countries, allowing the latter to import all articles, the growth, produce, or manufacture of the country to which the ship belonged, and to export from such colonies all articles whatever of their growth, produce, or manufacture, either to the country from which such ship came, or to any other part of the world, the United Kingdom, and all its dependencies excepted. All intercourse between the mother country and the colonies, whether direct or circuitous, and all intercourse of the colonies with each other, would be considered as a coasting trade, to be reserved entirely and absolutely to ourselves. By this arrangement, the foundation of our navigation laws would be preserved, whilst the colonies would enjoy a free trade with foreign countries, without breaking in upon the great principles of those laws, in respect to foreign trade—that the cargo must be the produce of the country to which the ship belonged, leaving the national character of the ship to be determined by the rules which applied in like cases in this country. He proposed that the importation of foreign goods into the colonies should be made subject to moderate duties, but such as might be found sufficient for the fair protection of our own productions of the like nature. The duties already established by the acts to which he had referred, it was proposed to leave as they were, and to establish a further scale of ad valorem duties, varying from  $\frac{1}{4}$  to 30 per cent. upon all articles, the importation of which, from foreign countries, had hitherto been prohibited. Those duties would, of course, form part of the revenues of the respective colonies in which they might be collected, upon the same principle, and subject to the same system of appropriation by the Legislatures of those colonies, as the duties already collected, under the acts of the 3rd of the king. It was for the colonies that the benefit of these arrangements were intended; the duties would form a revenue which would be theirs, and would be carried to their account. They could, therefore, have no jealousy of the new system as one likely to trench upon their constitutional privileges in those respects. With the further view of encouraging our own trade and that of the colonies with South America, he also proposed to extend to certain ports in those colonies the benefits and regulations of our Warehousing System, as it was now established in this country, by allowing goods from all parts of the world to be bonded, and deposited in warehouses without payment of duty, till proper opportunities of selling or exporting them to advantage should occur. Looking at the present state of the countries lately belonging to Spain, this system must be attended with extraordinary advantages. The wants of those countries were numerous; they embraced almost every object of European assortment; but in the present state of society, from the want of capital, and individual credit, and from other causes, these wants were best supplied, as it were, in retail, and by small deliveries frequently renewed. A large cargo went directly from England to any of their ports, was not easily disposed of; it glutted the market. It was desirable, therefore, that the warehousing system should be established in the ports of our colonies with which these countries could most easily and frequently communicate. The Americans had found the benefit of this mode of carrying on traffic with the late Spanish provinces from New Orleans, a port which now engrossed a considerable portion of this trade, though not so conveniently situated for the purpose, as some of the ports which we possessed in the Gulf of Mexico. It was not to be dissembled that this was a great change in our colonial system. Should it be adopted by Parliament, it would operate somewhat differently in our sugar islands, and in those extensive continental possessions, the provinces of British North America. By opening to our sugar colonies a trade with all other countries, we should afford them, in the increased competition and economy of a direct trade, a better chance of supplying their wants on reasonable terms, and of finding a demand for their surplus productions. We should accomplish, he verily believed, though not perhaps at first, the establishment of a new course of trade, as well as of a more extended system of commission and agency in those colonies. Mercantile houses would be formed in the principal ports, both to supply the wants of the colonies, and to watch, for their own speculations in the general markets of the world, the fluctuations of demand and price in those articles which the West Indies supplied. Every step in this change would contribute to introduce a greater proportion and a better description of white population, and gradually, he should hope, to diffuse a new spirit of enterprise, not only in commerce but in agriculture,—to stimulate endeavours to raise other productions—indigo and silk for instance—besides sugar, which would increase the cultivation and wealth of those colonies. On the part of the mother country, it would be wise to give every degree of proper encouragement to those new sources of improvement. They would not only add to the value of property in that part of the world, but they would gradually meliorate the moral condition of society, and, by consequence, the internal security of those possessions. It was under these impressions that he should propose, in revising other duties of customs, with a view to the relief of trade, considerably to reduce the duties payable in this country upon many of the minor productions of the West Indies, such as were generally raised by the negroes and people of colour for their own account, or by small white proprietors residing on the spot; in the hope that such a reduction, by increasing the consumption, would contribute to increase the cultivation of those articles, as well as the comforts of those classes by whom they were raised.—These, it might be objected, were but vague and speculative improvements, which might never be realized. It might be so; and if he were called upon to point out the precise mode and course of operation by which the benefits of this new system had to make their way in the West Indies, he had no hesitation to avow, that he could do no such thing. But he would remind the committee that in 1813, when upon the renewal of the East India Company's charter, their monopoly was greatly relaxed, the wisest and most experienced men in that trade could not point out precisely, what new channels of commerce could be opened in the East Indies. Nay they denied that any new channels could be explored by the private trader, or that any benefits could accrue to India from the relaxation of the former monopoly. But new channels had been explored, new benefits had been explored; proving, as the history of all modern commerce proves, that whenever a free scope was given to capital, to industry, to the stirring intelligence and active spirit of adventure, which so strongly marked the present times, new roads were in fact opened to enterprise, and new facilities afforded to the interchange of the productions of the different regions of the earth—that interchange, of which the advantages must be reciprocal, and of which the extension to new countries was, perhaps, the surest harbinger of their improvement and civilization. He could not doubt, therefore, that the West Indies, in the course of no very great number of years, would add a new proof to those examples which Ireland and the United States had already afforded, which so many other parts of the world were now about to afford of this great commercial and political truth—that an open trade, especially to a rich and thriving country, is more valuable than any monopoly, however exclusive, which the state may be able, either to enforce against its own colonies, or to establish in its intercourse with other parts of the world. If this principle were true in its application to the West Indies, mere plantations, sugar gardens, as it were, tilled by slaves for the benefit of masters resident in Great Britain; in how much greater a degree must it be true in its application to our North American provinces, where a wider field was open, and a more natural and happier state of society prevailed? There existed, not a mere plantation, but an immense country. There was a white population, all free, prosecuting their various pursuits and avocations of life, for their own benefit and happiness, many of them born in the country, and almost all looking to it as their home, and as the home of those by whom they were to be succeeded; a population, taking all the provinces, not short, perhaps, of a million of people, and their numbers rapidly increasing. With the fertility of the soil in many of the districts, with their natural productions, their harbours, and extent of coast, both upon the ocean and their internal lakes, with their fisheries and other advantages, he could not doubt, that without any other encouragement than freedom of trade and a lenient administration, these provinces would, henceforward, make rapid strides towards prosperity;—that connecting their prosperity with the liberal treatment of the mother country, they would neither look with envy at the growth of other states on the same Continent, nor wish for the dissolution of old, and the formation of new political connexions. With a tariff of duties, accounted for to their own treasury, and moreover far lighter than those paid by their neighbours—with a trade as free, with their shipping in possession of greater privileges, themselves in the enjoyment of the same civil rights, they would not be easily moved to acts by which all these advantages might be placed in jeopardy. Such a course was not in human nature. At any rate, let the parent state fulfil its duties with kindness and liberality. This was true wisdom, affording us, on the one hand, the best chance of perpetuating a solid and useful connexion, and on the other the best hope if—which God avert!—in the progress of human events, that connexion be ever to be dissolved, that the separation might not be embittered by acrimony and bloodshed; and the certain consolation that, however brought about, it would not have been hastened or provoked by vexatious interference or oppressive pretensions on our part. By extending to our North American colonies this participation of the commercial facilities and privileges which we enjoyed, we should unite the mutual interests, and draw closer the bonds of harmony and good understanding between ourselves and those valuable dependencies. But viewed as a question of commerce merely, he had no difficulty in stating that, without these changes, they would not be able to stand the competition of the United States. To illustrate this position he would observe, that the fisheries employed a considerable part of the population of Nova Scotia. They also afforded employment to the citizens of the neighbouring districts of the United States. In all that related to the procuring the fish, and preparing them for a foreign market, the two parties were perhaps upon an equality. But let them be followed to that market, he would suppose, for instance, the Brazils, which was one of the most extensive. Each party, it was true, had there an equal facility for selling his cargo; but the cargo once disposed of, the inequality commenced. The citizen of the United States could take, in return, any of the productions of the Brazils, and proceed with them either to his own country, or to any other part of the world; and, in the latter case, bartering them away again for the productions of some other country, finally, return with another cargo to his own. Not so the Nova Scotian. Many of the staple productions of Brazil, sugar for instance, were not admissible in the British provinces of North America. He might take these productions, it was true, to the ports of foreign Europe, with as much facility as his neighbour; but then again, if he procured a loading in those ports, he could not return home with his cargo, because it was not admissible in his own country, except directly from Great Britain. Now, it was this difference in the mode of transacting the same business, which often made the profit or loss of the adventure: and from which, among other disadvantages, it was his wish to relieve the king's subjects in North America.—Another essential relief applicable to our colonies and their trade, would be found in the abolition of the large fees now levied at <sup>most</sup> all our colonial ports. Those fees, which frequently amounted to more than the public duties, both on the ship and cargo, were levied for the benefit of certain public officers. There were in many of the islands, a fee for the governor, another for his secretary, a fee to the naval officer, to the officers of the revenue, and to several others. If a ship proceeded from one port to another, as was frequently the case, owing to the state of the markets, these fees were levied at every port. Some of the officers to whom those fees were paid, would be no longer necessary, when the commerce of the colonies would be so nearly assimilated to that of the mother country. To the officers who were to be continued, it was proposed to give salaries, as in this country, to be paid out of the duties which they would have to collect. The details of this improvement, and the mode of carrying it into execution, appertained of course to the Treasury, and the Colonial department.—It only remained for him to state two further alterations, of a more local and specific nature. The one related to the Mauritius, and the other to Canada. The duty on Mauritius sugar, on its importation into this country, was 10s. per cwt. more than the duty on British plantation sugar. Last session he proposed resolutions for equalizing those duties; but it was then objected, that the commerce of the Mauritius was not under the same restrictions as existed in the West Indies, and that the inhabitants of that colony preferred freedom of trade to equality of duty. Upon this objection the resolutions were abandoned; but now that trade would be equally free to all, there could be no valid reason why the Mauritius sugar should not be admitted at the same rate as that of the West Indies. This island was cultivated in the same manner as the West India islands. He knew of no advantage it had over them; whilst its greater distance, by increasing the expense of freight, and its frequent exposure to hurricanes, would seem to place it under some natural disadvantages. From this diminution of duty, which appeared to him, in all fairness, due to the Mauritius, he did not apprehend that any serious prejudice could accrue to the West India planter, as the quantity of sugar grown in that island was not considerable: and, of course, what was sent to Europe must equally influence the price of this article in the general market, whether it found its way to this country or to the continent. The measure which he had to propose in respect to Canada, appeared to him no more than an act of common justice to that colony. It was simply this: to admit, at all times, the corn of that country into our consumption, upon the payment of a fixed and moderate duty. When it was considered that corn was the staple of that colony, he could not conceive a greater act of injustice, than to have declared to a part of our own empire, as much entitled to protection as another part of it, that against that staple the markets of this country were closed. How were the Canadians to pay for the supplies which they drew from this country? Was it fitting, that, when they made their remittances in this staple, they should do so, without being able to know whether it could be received here? Whether it was to remain in warehouse, unavailable and unproductive, and at a ruinous expense, for five or six years, depending for its admission into our market upon the fraction of a half-penny, according to the average price in our markets for a few preceding weeks—that average, influenced by the conflicting tricks and artifices of the home-grower and the home-dealer; the result of which could not be known in Canada for many months afterwards? When this subject was considered by the British agriculturist, it was impossible that he could view the indulgence proposed with jealousy or apprehension. That indulgence was, to allow the free import of Canadian wheat, at all times, upon the payment of a duty of five shillings a quarter. In addition to the protection of this duty, the British grower would have that of the freight from Quebec to England, which was not less than from 12s. to 15s. more. The greatest quantity of wheat which Canada could now supply, might be estimated at not more than 50,000 quarters, but even if the importation were double that quantity, and were it to increase more rapidly than he considered probable, such an addition was not likely to keep pace with the growing demand of our population; and whether or not, he should still maintain, that the principle of the measure was one to which no fair or impartial man could possibly refuse his assent (hear, hear). He concluded by moving, "That it is expedient to amend, 1st, Several acts of the 3d and 4th Geo. IV. for regulating the trade between British America and the West Indies, and other parts of the world; 2d, An act of the 4th Geo. IV. for regulating the warehousing of goods; and 3d, That the duties imposed by the first-mentioned acts shall cease, and certain others be substituted in lieu thereof."

Mr. C. R. Ellis said, that he had heard the intimation, with respect to the intended alteration in the duty on sugar imported from the Mauritius, with some degree of surprise. Considering what passed when that measure was brought before the house last year, and the manner in which it was abandoned, he certainly did not expect it to have been introduced on this occasion; and he must request his rt. hon. friend, before he brought in his bill, to lay before the house the petition of the inhabitants of the Mauritius against placing them on the footing of a West India colony. The restrictions which were intended to be removed, had long pressed on the interests of the West India colonies, perhaps more than that of any other part of the colonies of Great Britain. When those restrictions were first proposed, they did not press very hard on the colonies, which were then in full possession of the home-market. Many alterations had, however, been since made, and, as our colonial possessions had been much extended, it was impossible to keep the trade of those colonies entirely to ourselves. It, therefore, became necessary to alter the colonial code. Those bills to which his rt. hon. friend had alluded, and on which he meant to legislate, were in consequence introduced; the one allowing a direct trade in British ships from the colonies to Europe, and the other for facilitating the intercourse between the colonies and America. He had expected much benefit from those measures, but in that he had been disappointed. British merchants did not avail themselves of the permission to trade direct between the colonies and Europe; and the West India planters found it impossible to overcome the difficulties of their situation, and to divert an old established system of commerce into new channels. He believed that not a single ship-load of colonial produce was sent direct to the continent of Europe. The reciprocity measure, with respect to America, was also inoperative. He hoped, however, in consequence of the opening of the trade now projected, that foreign countries would take their commodities to the West Indies, and exchange them there for the produce of the colonies. But the plan of his rt. hon. friend was limited by the principle of reciprocity. That principle of course confined it to those countries that would be disposed to adopt an equally liberal policy. Some of the states of Europe might, therefore, be excluded. They might be unwilling to alter their present colonial system. A very good commercial treaty had been negotiated, for instance, with Denmark; but at the foot of it was placed an intimation, that it did not extend to the colonial trade of that country. His rt. hon. friend's scheme was also connected with certain protecting duties. What the effect of them would be he could not say, but that must depend on their correct application to particular articles. After the experience this country had had of the effect produced by protecting duties, with reference to the produce of Canada, and in checking the intercourse with the United States of America, he trusted his rt. hon. friend would not be altogether so sanguine in the success of the present measure. He should be sorry to say any thing ungracious on this occasion; he would not make any objections to the alteration proposed by his rt. hon. friend, which was unobjectionable in principle, and which, he was sure, was intended to do good. He would much rather look at the other side of the picture. With respect to the West India islands, their geographical situation adapted them peculiarly for a convenient entrepôt for all our manufactures. Vessels often proceeded to those islands from England almost in ballast, which, under the new system, need no longer be the case. Commerce, it was well known, would attract around it every species of industry; and this beneficial alteration in the colonial code might be the means of creating a white population, and of extending cultivation to many other articles besides those now produced in the West Indies (hear, hear).

Mr. Baring said, that, looking at the proposition as a whole, viewing it with that liberal feeling which it deserved, he was quite sure, that the more it was considered, the more satisfaction it would give (hear, hear). He was one of those who would not willingly injure the West India interest; but he thought that, when the hon. gent. (Mr. Ellis) expressed a belief that the introduction of sugar from the Mauritius would injure the West India planters, he was in error. He saw no reason for excluding the Mauritius from the operation of the rt. hon. gent.'s system. It was a colony belonging to this country; the cultivation of sugar was carried on as it was in the West Indies, and the cultivators at the Mauritius had a right to claim the boon on the same grounds that it was extended to other colonies. He was extremely anxious to see the further development of the rt. hon. gent.'s plan with respect to the proposed alterations as to the European part of the system, and particularly that which related to the importation of corn. He did not wish to see the protection which it had been found necessary to afford to the agricultural interests reduced below that which they had enjoyed before the present restrictive measures were adopted; although it must ever be a matter of regret to all persons who were well acquainted with the subject, that any such protection had been granted. Still he should be sorry to take away, on any principles of political economy, however he might be convinced of their soundness, that protection which had now been so long enjoyed, and had grown to be so much a part of the system, that the persons interested in it would have a fair right to claim its continuance. But it was not, he apprehended, at all probable that any large quantity of corn could be imported to this country from Canada. He was desirous of knowing whether the rt. hon. gent. intended to equalize the duties of Upper and Lower Canada. From their natural situation, all the import and export trade must be carried on through Lower Canada: the people of Upper Canada were therefore at their mercy, and must pay any duty which they chose to put upon the importation of goods. He was sure this would not escape the attention of the rt. hon. gent. He rejoiced in the opportunity of expressing the satisfaction he experienced from the detail of the rt. hon. gent.'s plans, which he had no doubt would be as beneficial to the country as they were enlightened and liberal.

Sir F. Burdett rose for the purpose of expressing the gratification he felt at the new and liberal view which was taken by his Majesty's ministers, of subjects which involved the most important interests of the country. He hoped that they would not suffer any timidity to deter them from carrying the principles which they had avowed into full execution. He was sure that there was no reason for any such apprehension, and he did not doubt that upon this subject, the general opinion and confidence of the country was with them. He trusted that the principles would be acted upon to the greatest practicable extent in the colonies, and that they would be allowed the full enjoyment of all the advantages which could be derived from their own labour, and ingenuity, and enterprise; not fettered by restrictions which curtailed those advantages, but left at full liberty to pursue their own works in their own colonies, and to send their produce to this country as they might think fit. Every body knew the disadvantages which the West India proprietors laboured under in being compelled to send their sugars to the British market in a raw state. Upon no sound principles of commercial policy could such restrictions be maintained, and he hoped that in future all the benefits to which they were fairly entitled, would be ensured to the colonists. With respect to the importation of corn from Lower Canada, that measure, he believed, would be almost universally approved of. The real principles of national policy were now better understood than they had been at some former periods, and those persons who were most interested in this subject, had now found that their interests required no monopoly, nor any other advantages excepting such as they would of necessity enjoy from the command of the home-market, and their not being subject to the expense of freight and other charges to which foreign corn was inevitably liable. He hoped that the same principle would be applied, not only to the corn of Canada, but of every other country, and that a free trade in corn would be established with all Europe. Unless this were done, he was convinced it was impossible that the trade of the country could be extended in the manner it ought to be; for it could in no way be advantageous to the country that the interests of any class of men should be bolstered up by exclusive privileges. The public mind was now too much enlightened, and saw too clearly the general interests of the country, to permit any of those obstacles which prejudice or misapprehension might in other times have given rise to, to impede the completion of the rt. hon. gent.'s project.

Dr. Lushington said, that since the Mauritius was to be placed on a footing with the West India islands, he would ask upon what principle the same advantages were still denied to the East Indies? He put this question, not, as it might be pretended, from a wicked intent to reduce the West Indies, but upon the obvious and undoubted principles of political economy. When he and those who thought with him on this subject expressed their desire to alleviate the wretched condition of the slaves in the West Indies, it was said, that the measures which they proposed would have the effect of increasing the distress which was already too burdensome upon the proprietors. He was, however, inclined to believe that the distress of those proprietors was chiefly to be attributed to their residence in this country; and that the misery of their slaves was another consequence of the same cause. These absentee cultivated their West India estates by means of agents, who were actuated solely by the desire of procuring large crops for the immediate benefit of the proprietor, without any regard to the ultimate condition of the estate. The difference between the condition of slaves on the estates of resident proprietors, and those who were under the control of their agents, was a sufficient proof of the truth of this statement. Whenever any attempt was made to improve the condition of the unfortunate beings who formed the population of the former colonies, it was invariably opposed by those gentlemen in the house who were connected with the West Indies, and who did not scruple to assign motives to those by whom such attempts were made, which, to say the least of them, were wholly unfounded (hear, hear, from Mr. Gordon). His hon. friend, who so loudly cried "hear," on a former occasion when this subject had been brought before the house, got up with so much vehemence, that he seemed ready to devour all who were near him. He did this, because, being himself a large West India proprietor, he could not endure to hear any thing which even seemed to interfere with the state of things in the colonies, and to alleviate the sufferings of the slave population. He could not help doubting the judgment, although he could not suspect the heart of his hon. friend, when he found him opposing a measure which was calculated to do away with an immense mass of evil which disgraced our West India colonies. For his own part, and for those who thought with him on this subject, he repudiated with disgust and indignation the imputation that they were actuated by any feeling of hostility towards the West India proprietors. On the contrary, he thought they were entitled to the benefit which was about to be conferred upon them, and he hoped it would be as useful and as advantageous to them as it was expected to be. Notwithstanding the contumely with which they had treated the British Parliament, he hoped that the spirit of animosity by which they seemed to be influenced would subside—that they would listen with a patient ear to the admonitions of the legislature, and not drive it to the adoption of those measures which were called for upon every principle of justice.

Mr. Gordon rose for the purpose of replying to the observations of the learned gent.—observations which the usage of Parliament hardly justified him in using. He did not know to what particular occasion the learned gent. alluded, but in his own name and in that of all the other West India proprietors in that house, he threw back the assertion that they had endeavoured, by their influence in Parliament, or elsewhere, to interpose any obstacle to the amelioration of the condition of the slave population of the colonies. It was very easy for a person like the learned gent., who was in the constant habit of addressing public assemblies, to throw out insinuations against him and other hon. gentlemen, who might find it difficult to reply with equal fluency to a charge so unjustly made. He had, however, felt it due to himself to seize the first opportunity of denying altogether the truth of that charge, and of vindicating himself from the imputation which had been cast upon him (hear, hear).

Mr. Cust Grant repelled the charge of the learned gent. respecting absentees. He had reason to know that the persons who managed their estates by means of agents were not wanting in attention to the condition of the negro population, and that they were not by any means anxious to procure greater crops than their estates could fairly produce.

The resolutions were then agreed to.

A bill founded on these resolutions was subsequently introduced, entitled, "A Bill for further regulating the trade of His Majesty's possessions in America and the West Indies, and for the warehousing of goods therein."

MONDAY, JUNE 6.—On the motion for the third reading of the bill, some complaint was made that its provisions were at variance with the principles in Mr. Huskisson's speech *.

Mr. Huskisson denied the alleged inconsistency, and observed, that there was not a single article which, under this bill, might be imported into the West Indies, on paying a certain duty, that was not obliged to pay a duty on entering the United Kingdom. If, therefore, he placed the colonies on a footing with the United Kingdom, he could see no fair ground for complaint. He contended that he had redeemed his pledge, when, with respect to all matters of commerce, he placed the colonies in as favourable a situation as that in which Great Britain stood in her intercourse with Ireland.

LORDS, THURSDAY, JUNE 14.—Earl Bathurst, in moving the second reading of the Colonial Trade bill, stated the object of the measure, which had already been explained in the debates in the House of Commons. After describing the dispute which had arisen with the United States on the subject of trade with the British colonies, he observed, that in all former measures for regulating the colonial trade, prohibition was the rule, and admission the exception; whereas, in the present bill, admission formed the rule, and prohibition the exception. Besides the regulation of the colonial trade, the extension of the warehousing system was another object of this bill. There were certain articles which after regulation could not be exported without paying a duty imposed for the protection of British trade; but it was not thought necessary that this protection should any longer exist. Warehouses might therefore be established on a more extensive system than the former state of the law authorized. Their lordships would observe that this was a complete abandonment of what had hitherto been regarded as the English colonial system; but it was an alteration which the changes in the political and commercial relations of other nations with respect to this country required. It could no longer be said that we placed our colonies in a worse situation with respect to trade, than the United States. The colonies would now not only enjoy the same advantages as the United States, but colonial vessels would be entitled to all the advantages of British ships. They might now trade between one colonial port and another; they might trade between any port of the colonies and this country; they might trade to other countries; and they might trade from one port to another in this country. In short, the colonies were now placed in the same situation with respect to trade as if they formed parts of the mother country. The changes which Europe and the new world had undergone had naturally produced this change in our colonial system. Whether the states of America which had recently separated from their European connexion would make the same stupendous progress with those which had set them the example, remained to be seen. They were still exposed to warfare, and the contest in which they were engaged might be continued; but in the midst of that warfare they presented to other countries the advantages which were to be derived from neutral trade.

The Marquis of Lawnsdown said, that he felt great satisfaction at seeing this measure brought forward—not merely because he had long entertained the opinions which it was at last proposed to sanction by the authority of parliament, but because it did so happen that he himself had endeavoured to carry the same principle into practice. He had, not in that, but in the other House of Parliament, recommended a more liberal intercourse between our colonies and America; and now, after the lapse of no less than 19 years, that course was about to be adopted. The measure which he recommended was, indeed, compared with the present, weak and partial; but, feeble and inefficient as it was, it experienced an uncommon degree of hostility. It was the subject of repeated divisions in Parliament, and out of doors became a watchword for clamour and opprobrium. The friends and present supporters of the noble earl (Bathurst) cried it down, not only because, as they said, it was favourable to neutrals, but because it evidently led to that freedom of intercourse which Ministers now took credit to themselves for establishing. Nothing was then more alarming than that which was now, in the opinion of the noble earl, most just and politic. "Oh, new, and dreadful thought! To let the colonies trade with other powers of Europe! What an abomination!"—were the exclamations with which his proposition had been met. Now, however, the noble earl at last came forward to lay the axe to the root of that system which had been hitherto so pertinaciously maintained. Their lordships must now perceive that if they wished to retain the colonies, the best way would be to render them, as far as possible, capable of engaging in every kind of trade, and susceptible of every advantage which would be open to them as parts of this country. He was aware, that upon whatever principle they proceeded with respect to the colonies, it was still possible that a crisis would arrive, that a separation might take place; but it was their duty to try to avert that event, and to endeavour to retard it to a distant period. At the same time, while they were sensible that it could not be prevented, they ought to make provision that when it did occur, it should take place with circumstances as little painful, with a contest as little bitter, and leave behind it recollections as little disagreeable as possible.

The Earl of Liverpool said, that with regard to the measure which had been introduced on on this subject, when the noble lord (the Marquis of Lansdown) was Chancellor of the Exchequer, he had felt it his duty to oppose it, because he thought that the time and circumstances in which it was brought forward were unfavourable to its adoption. Now, however, circumstances were much changed. South America had nearly effected its entire independence; and when that was once established he admitted that our colonies ceased to exist as such, but should for the purposes of commerce be considered and treated as integral parts of Great Britain, as much as London, or Liverpool, or any other town in this country. By treating them on that footing, we secured their attachment; and if at any future time they should be separated from us, their separation would thereby be rendered much less dangerous. The bill before their lordships could not be looked upon as an infringement of the navigation laws. It allowed foreign ships to bring to the colonies only the produce of their respective countries, and take back to their own countries the commodities of the colonies; but it did not in any case admit such ships to any part of the carrying trade, so as to take the produce of the colonies between nations to which such ships did not belong.

The bill was ordered to be committed on Thursday.

Waste Lands in Canada and Van Dieman's Land.

COMMONS, THURSDAY, MAR. 15.—Mr. W. Horton moved for leave to bring in a bill for the sale and improvement of waste lands in the province of Upper Canada. It would, he thought, be universally admitted, that nothing could be more desirable than to facilitate, by a proper application of capital, the colonization of the waste lands in Canada; and for the particular purpose now recommended, it was intended that certain grants should be made to an incorporated Company upon a valuation of the particular lands required by them in the development of their local plans. The arrangements were to be carried into effect by two commissioners appointed by the Crown, and two by the Company, with conjoint power to decide in such doubtful cases as came before them respecting the purchase of the lands; and the basis of the general value was to be taken from that recognized in the purchase of the other adjacent waste lands. The Company were to agree to pay the Government 20,000*l.* a-year upon being put in possession of particular lands; and the amount so paid was, in the first instance, to be applied to the local expenditure of the colony, which had hitherto been defrayed by the Treasury at home. The commissioners had proceeded to the colony, but sufficient time had not elapsed to allow of their making a report. The details of the measure, however, would be more intelligible when the bill was printed and presented to the house in due form.

Mr. W. Smith rose to suggest that proper precautions should be taken to prevent the Indian tribes on the borders of the new incorporation from being prejudiced by the settlers. In New Brunswick and Nova-Scotia, great injustice had been done to the Indians, which he hoped would be avoided in the present instance.

Mr. W. Horton had the most perfect confidence that no danger of the kind would be incurred on the present occasion.

Mr. Hume expressed his regret that five years ago, when he had strongly recommended a change in the colonial system, some proposition of this kind had not been made. He had said then that emigration to Upper Canada was checked by many oppressive circumstances, and especially by the enormous fees demanded of the emigrants. He could now support the arguments which he had used five years ago by the official returns since received from Canada, which showed that of 39,000 emigrants who had gone out thither, only 100 families had been able to obtain a footing on the waste lands; so that the great bulk were deprived of the benefit held out to them in the first instance. If the present bill were calculated to amend the vices and errors which were the reproach of the hon. gentleman's predecessor in office, it should have his approbation. For the last fourteen years the colonial system had been a disgrace to the government; so much so, that if the House of Commons were in a state of tolerable purity, he would not hesitate to impeach Lord Bathurst for a breach of duty, and to move an address to the King for his dismissal from the colonial office. The mal-administration of the noble lord was not confined to Upper Canada, it extended to the Ionian Islands, the Cape of Good Hope, and the other settlements. Let them look, for instance, at the Cape, where the most glaring injustice was daily endured—whence British subjects were transported to Botany Bay, under circumstances of aggravated oppression, and where complaints were daily made, which called loudly for redress. Respecting the present bill, he was anxious to know whether it was intended to grant to the new company all the Crown reserves and church returns without qualification? Did they mean to sell the land, and leave the new purchasers to retail it at their own prices? If they did, they were likely to create a private monopoly, as injurious as the previous system. This should be explained in the first instance.

Mr. M. Fitzgerald said, that he could not concur in what his hon. friend had said respecting the abuses under the late system of emigration; for he knew that many of those who had emigrated from the south of Ireland, a part of the country with which he was acquainted, had written in the highest terms of their treatment, by the Government agent; and, as a member of a committee, he could further speak from official documents of the improved condition of the new settlers within the last two or three years.

Mr. Gordon defended the character of Lord Bathurst from the severe and harsh attack of the hon. gent., which was the more singular, from its being made at the same moment he approved of this bill. His great complaint appeared to be, that this bill had not been brought forward five years ago, without knowing whether there was at the time he spoke of, either capital or private enterprise to promote such an undertaking. The appointment of official heads of colonies belonged to the Government generally, and Lord Bathurst had no right to be rendered particularly responsible for individual errors, if they had arisen in such appointments; at all events, he was sure the noble lord carefully attended to all the details of colonial business.

Mr. Bright approved of the plan. He thought, however, that it ought to receive the sanction of the local authorities, before it was decided upon by Parliament, and recommended some precautions against the danger of a monopoly of the land by the company.

Mr. Baring said, that upon the general question he was of opinion that they could not look upon these colonies as likely to remain permanently in their present relative situation with this country. They were chiefly agricultural, like ourselves; and all experience showed that no colony would long retain that peculiar relation with its mother country, when the productions of both were similar. The question then arose, and it was a very important one, how far it might be wise and dignified for a country like Great Britain to do early and liberally that which she might be compelled to do a few years hence, in a very different manner. It was time for Government to consider at what period of maturity they would be fairly and honourably ready to allow the colonies the benefit of a separate system. He admitted that this was a bold but a pressing consideration, which in the nature of things ought to govern the principle of the projected arrangements. The object of the present bill was partly to encourage colonization by locating emigrants upon these waste lands—to invest certain privileges in the hands of a particular company, who were to pay a large sum for these waste lands. To indemnify themselves, the company would raise the price upon the emigrants; how then, would this encourage colonization in the way held out? He would rather, he confessed, have the whole put under the management of the local legislature, who would be best prepared to meet and grapple with any contingent difficulties. It was the way, too, to give them that confidence in themselves which might hereafter enable them to support our empire, and repel the attacks which might be made upon it, at no great distance of time. A further means of preventing the new company from holding their monopoly without making any attempt to clear and cultivate their lands, would be to provide that all the lands which should remain unsettled after a certain number of years, should revert to the crown.

Mr. W. Horton replied. In Upper Canada there was an indefinite extent of lands, capable, under cultivation, of absorbing the largest population contemplated by any gentleman in the house. The object was to bring considerable portions of this land into immediate cultivation by the capital of a company, under regulations dictated by this government. As to the security proposed for bringing the lands into cultivation within a certain time, that was already taken. This was no measure of monopoly. There were abundant allotments of the lands in the possession of private individuals. Government was not to be charged with inducing emigration. The states of Canada were not in want of population. Labour could not command a price as in the United States; but capital was most materially necessary, and this measure would facilitate the transfer of it. He must revert for a minute to the general charge made against the Colonial Department by an hon. gent. (Mr. Home): he could not separate the parties implicated—the charge was against the whole establishment. Why did not the hon. gent. make it more specifically against some one member of administration, as he was bound to do, rather than indulge in vague clamour and idle declamation? He claimed, on the contrary, for the Colonial Department, and the noble lord at the head of it, a full proportion of that approbation with which the anxious labours of all departments in the Government were rewarded, in their zeal to remove obstacles and embarrassments laid upon the colonial and mercantile interests by the supposed wisdom of our ancestors. At any rate, he wished that the hon. gent. would give him by a specific charge, a specific opportunity for justification.

Mr. Hume: It was hard for him to be charged with idle declamation and indefinite abuse, for the house could not forget that season after season, for the last five years, he had brought forward specific motions on the conduct of the colonial governors, and the neglect of the colonial office.—Leave given to bring in the bill.

Mr. W. Horton then obtained leave to bring in a bill similar to the foregoing, for the enclosure and cultivation of waste lands in Van Diemen's Land.

Mauritius Trade Bill.

TUESDAY, MAY 17.—Mr. Haskisson moved that the house should resolve itself into a committee, on the Customs' Consolidation bill. The object of the resolution he was about to propose was to put the colony of the Mauritius on the same footing as those of the West India Islands, and that the same duties on goods imported and exported should be paid in the one as in the other settlement. In reply to several complaints respecting the Mauritius Slave Trade, he observed that the returns on that subject would soon be printed, and that an opportunity would occur on the General Consolidation bill for discussing this point; but he thought there was no occasion for postponing the resolution which he now submitted, as some hon. members wished to do.

Sir R. Fergusson said, the papers that were ordered to be printed contained the most convincing proofs, that since early in the year 1820, no slave-trade had been carried on in the Mauritius. In regard to the rumours on this subject, they were common to the West India Islands for many years after the abolition; but he felt satisfied that there was no more truth in them respecting the Mauritius, than there was with regard to the West India Islands. He had no hesitation in vouching, in the most solemn manner, that there had been no slave-trade in the Mauritius for the last five years at least; and in making this assertion, it was most gratifying to him to be borne out by the most satisfactory letters, both public and private, to the Secretary of State, from his gallant and hon. successor, who would disdain to lend his authority to the fancied existence of such pracfices, merely for the purpose of obtaining the credit of having suppressed them, and he therefore hoped that a measure equally called for by justice and good policy, would no longer be deferred, and that the inhabitants of the Mauritius, after all their losses, and the disappointment of their just hopes and expectations—more especially in this house last year, when the bill for the relief of the Mauritius had undergone two readings—would not be debarred another day from the full benefit of the proposed measure.—In reply to an observation of Dr. Lushington's, respecting the landing of some slaves from a French vessel at the Mauritius, he observed that the case alluded to was that of a French vessel from Mozambique, which intended, as it was thought, to make a depot of slaves for Bourbon in one of the uninhabited islands of the Archipelago, to the north-east of Madagascar; but there was no landing, and the vessel was intercepted close to one of those uninhabited islands, by the exertions of Capt. Moresby. He put it to the candour of the learned gent. whether this could be construed into a slave-trading with the Mauritius.

The resolutions were then agreed to, and a bill founded upon them was afterwards introduced.

FRIDAY, JUNE 3.—Mr. W. Horton moved the second reading of the Mauritius Trade bill.

Mr. Bernal observed, that by this measure it was proposed to place the Mauritius sugar on the same footing with that of the West India colonies. It was contended that this measure would not injure the West India planter—first, because the distance of the West Indies from this country was so much less than that of the Mauritius; and next, because the quantity of sugar grown in the latter colony was inconsiderable. But he wished to hear better arguments in favour of a departure from the present system. It appeared from papers on the table that an illicit trade in slaves had been carried on in the Mauritius up to the year 1821. Now, this being an admitted fact, he could see no reason for granting the benefit now proposed. Such a measure was very hard towards the colonists of the West India Islands, who had done their utmost to discourage the slave-trade, and who had appeared most anxious to cultivate their estates by the labour of Creole slaves. The importation of slaves into the Mauritius had continued for a period of ten or twelve years in despite of its prohibition by law. Even at the present moment an armed vessel was constantly cruising in the straits of the Seychelles, which lay to the east of the island, in order to prevent that traffic. This circumstance proved their anxiety to prosecute the trade; and formed a reason for not granting the boon which would be conferred by passing this bill. Another reason for not treating those persons as they treated the colonists of the West Indies was, that the former being considered as coming under the protection of the East India Company's charter, had enjoyed all the benefits of a free port for four or five years. But they were not content with that; they turned round to government and said, "We wish ourselves to be placed on a footing with the West India Islands." He must, however, say that he could not conceive why sugars should be suffered to come from the Mauritius on the same footing as from the West Indies, when East India sugars generally were prohibited. These were points which called for the serious attention of the house; and he called on the rt. hon. gentleman to explain on what ground he introduced this measure.

Mr. W. Horton said, that at the time of the capture of this island, it was stipulated that it should be placed on the same footing with the other colonies of Great Britain; and the present measure was no more than the fulfilment of that stipulation. The circumstance of the Mauritius being within the limits of the East India Company's charter, was merely an accident, of which he conceived advantage ought not to be taken, for the purpose of imposing the East India rate of duty on the sugars of the Mauritius, especially when it was considered that those limits extended to the Straits of Magellan. Its claim to a remission of the duties was to be decided on the plain question—whether or not its situation entitled it to all the privileges of the other colonies. Cogent reasons might be alleged in defence of the imputed inconsistency of the present and former pretensions of the island, with respect to freedom of trade. In consequence of the order in council of 1816, connected with several local circumstances, the inhabitants found it necessary to abandon the free port, and, as they had a right to do, to adopt the alternative which was embodied in the measure now before the house. The hon. gent. had stated that slaves had been introduced into the Mauritius, and that it would be unjust to those who had opposed the slave-trade if any favour were shown to men who supported it. This assertion must be decided by facts; and if the hon. gent. would look at the papers, he would find that, for years, the trade had not existed; and that even prior to 1821, it was not carried on to any great extent. An armed ship certainly was stationed in Seychelles-straits; not, however, for the prevention of the slave trade in the Mauritius, but for the prevention of the slave trade generally.

Mr. R. Ellis said, this question had been settled at the period of the peace; and if some special cause were not assigned for the proposed alteration, he conceived that the decision which had then been come to ought to be abided by. The hon. gent. then referred to the papers before the house, and also to the correspondence contained in the reports of the African Society, for the purpose of showing that the slave trade was carried on to a great extent in the Mauritius; Sir R. Farquhar's success in extirpating the Mauritius slave trade, was not owing to the co-operation of the inhabitants, but to his treaties with the native princes. What, he asked, would be the effect of this measure on the West India planters, who had abstained from that illegal traffic, when they saw the inhabitants of the Isle of France, who wise in their day and generation, had carried on the trade in spite of law, rewarded by Government at their expense? It could not be other than injurious; and for this, as well as other reasons, he should oppose the bill.

Mr. Huskisson said that in the last session it had been proposed to reduce the duty on Mauritius sugar; but the answer of the West India interest had then been, that the Mauritius enjoyed commercial advantages in which the West India islands did not participate. That plea was now taken away; the restrictions which had operated upon the West India islands, and which did not affect the Mauritius, had been removed; and both interests being now, as regarded commercial advantage, on a footing, a new ground of objection must be taken to the reduction of the Mauritius duty. Accordingly, the opposition at present made to this reduction was of a different description—it was alleged that the colony of the Mauritius had carried on an illicit commerce in slaves. But this allegation, as it applied to an existing trade, was not supported by fact. Prior to 1820, some smuggling of slaves had taken place; but, according to the best evidence before the house, that practice continued no longer. Then the Mauritius must be judged, not according to what it had been, but according to what it was. Now he must say that, from all he could collect from Mauritius, that the proprietors all resided on their estates and that their slaves were consequently treated with more indulgence than in any other of our colonies (hear, hear). The whole question as affecting the West Indian interest—and on that ground the bill was really opposed, amounted to this, that a small quantity, say 12,000 hhds., of sugar might be thence imported into the English market. But if it did not come here, it would come into the European market, and would have the effect, from its cheapness, of determining the general price. He would also observe to the West Indians, that whenever their supply exceeded the demand in England, its excess, which must go into the European market, would produce the same effect—and destroy the West India monopoly (hear, hear).

Sir R. Fergusson said that he naturally felt a strong interest for a colony which he had himself so long administered. In 1810 he was present at the conquest of the Isle of Bourbon, when proclamations had been distributed to the inhabitants which promised them not only the advantages they enjoyed under France, but the pre-eminent advantages of British colonists. The promises held out to them were free trade and the fullest protection to the produce of the island in the mother country. But how had those promises been fulfilled? They had lost the extensive trade they formerly possessed, and their produce met with no protection. The order of Council issued in the year 1816, giving to those colonies a free trade, was accompanied with so many restrictions, that, coupled with the prohibitions which were placed on it in the ports of France, it was a perfect nullity. The fluctuations which followed therefrom destroyed all the confidence of the merchants; and the inhabitants, being thus deprived of the benefits of free trade, naturally became agriculturists, and, owing to the hurricanes, which destroyed the other plantations of the country, cultivators of sugar. Bourbon being separated from the Mauritius by the treaty of Paris, enjoyed all her ancient advantages, and the contrast of such prosperity with the depression of the Mauritius naturally tended to excite discontent and alienate the affections of the people of the latter island. The Mauritius was thus sacrificed to European and Indian policy, whilst, on the ground of interest, expediency, and justice, it ought to enjoy all the advantages of the British sugar colonies. He contended that no slave trade existed at present in the Mauritius, and the slave trade which had prevailed there some four or five years ago had been carried on by some renegadoes, who had lived by privateering during the war, and not by the respectable inhabitants of the colony. He showed, by reference to different abstracts of the slave population, that it had not increased during the conquest of the island, and inferred, from all these reasons, that there was no ground, save that of sic volo, sic jubeo, for opposing the proposition now suggested in favour of the trade of the Mauritius.

Mr. Gordon would have no objection to vote for the bill, if it were postponed to the year 1828, in order that it might be seen in the interim how far it would affect West Indian interests.

Mr. Plummer moved, as an amendment, that the bill be read this day six months.

Mr. Hume trusted that the house, now that it was only doing an act of justice to the Mauritius, would also take into its consideration the state of the West India colonies.

For the bill, 37—Against it, 14—Majority in favour of it, 23.

MONDAY, JUNE 6.—Mr. Huskisson moved the order of the day for a committee on the Mauritius Trade bill. In answer to a question from Mr. Bernal, with regard to the importation into the Mauritius, of foreign sugars, he observed, that, as an effect of the general Colonial Trade bill such sugars could not be admitted into the Mauritius.

Mr. Bernal (and, subsequently, Mr. Gordon) then observed, that should the Colonial Trade bill not pass, that intention could not be gathered from the present bill. He suggested that a few words should be inserted in it to avoid the possibility of mistake.

Mr. Huskisson said, that the objection was merely technical (hear, hear). The hon. gent. and his friends had themselves demanded the separation of the present measure from the general Colonial Trade bill. They must be aware that it would shortly merge in the provisions of the latter bill.

Mr. Bright was bound to suppose, if the rt. hon. gent. would not put in the few words that had been suggested by his hon. friend, that he was at least prepared with other words to answer the same purpose. But if that rt. hon. gent. was not so prepared, let him at least afford the house some clear and specific grounds for declining to insert those which had been just suggested. As for waiting to determine matters of this kind in one bill, by the terms of another, he should have thought that the house had had reason enough already to regret the time and labour which it cost them to remedy bills that had been passed in a similar manner, without desiring to add this to the list (hear). It seemed as if the object were really to mislead the house.

Mr. Huskisson was almost inclined to say that the hon. gent. who had just spoken, appeared to be inclined wilfully to misstate his words. When the hon. gent. imputed to him a design to mislead the house on this or any other question, the house, he trusted, would do him the justice to believe that he was quite as incapable as the hon. gent. himself, or any other hon. member, of doing any such thing (hear, hear). To him, he confessed, the language of this bill was perfectly explicit and intelligible. If sugars were allowed to be imported into Jamaica, there could be no reason, upon the principle of the present bill, why they should not be allowed to be imported into the Mauritius also; or why, if they were to be excluded from the Mauritius, they should not be equally excluded from the West Indies. The fact was, that as far as depended upon him, no foreign sugars should be imported either into the Mauritius or any of the West India Islands.

Mr. W. Horton said, the language of this bill was very clear. It was to this effect—"That all articles being the produce of the island of Mauritius, or the growth thereof—and all colonial produce, goods, and commodities that shall have been imported into the island of Mauritius (hear, hear), shall be put upon the same footing as all such colonial produce and foreign commodities imported into Jamaica under the existing law." And that existing law prohibited the importation of foreign sugars (hear, hear). Why, then, it did appear to him that the plain intention of this bill was to declare, that the trade of the Mauritius should be put on the same footing with that of Jamaica, or any other of the West India Islands. The hon. gent.'s objection, however, was, that prohibited foreign goods, such as sugars, might, under the present terms of this bill, be imported into the Mauritius, add through the Mauritius, into the United Kingdom, to the great detriment and prejudice of the West India produce. But he must contend, that if that were the fact, then the same observation must apply equally to Jamaica (hear, hear).

Mr. Bernal was sorry that the right hon. gent. (Mr. Huskisson) had taken up his remarks in the light he seemed to have done. He utterly disclaimed mere technical objections. The objections which he had taken tonight, he certainly had understood that right hon. gent. on a former night to have admitted. He still contended that the security he wished to have introduced did not exist in this bill; and that, on the contrary, if the former measure should be lost, the framing of this would be found to be excessively defective. There was in its present condition this real and visible defect—that sugars might be imported from China, or from India, into the Mauritius, and from thence into the United Kingdom.

Mr. Huskisson observed, that the general principle on which Government proposed to act was to open the trade of all the colonies, but to provide at the same time against the introduction of foreign produce, by prohibiting importation through the colonies.

Mr. Gordon thought that, in common fairness and candour, the operation of this specific measure ought to be restrained, until the West Indians had had time to reap some advantage from the effect of the former bill—say for a year and a half.

Mr. Ellice could not concur with his hon. friends near him in their opposition to this bill; and he entreated them not to throw needless impediments in the way of that liberal and enlightened colonial policy which his Majesty's government were now pursuing so honourably to themselves and so beneficially for this country.

Mr. T. Wilson could not concur in the opinion of his hon. friend who had spoken last. The cases of the Mauritius and the West India Islands stood on very different grounds. The sugars from the Mauritius were not sent home by planters, but by merchants and supercargoes who bought them there as return cargoes for ships sent thither with goods for the island trade. When the sugars were bought there, they were bought, therefore, and came to England, under the idea that they would not be allowed to be imported for home consumption.

Sir R. Fergusson knew very well that of late the planters of Mauritius had sent home their own sugars for sale in this country (hear). He must also observe, that the Mauritius had a very powerful claim on this country, in consequence of the expectations that were held out to it during the last year, when the Mauritius Sugar bill was read twice, and subsequently thrown out. Those expectations had been of course disappointed.

Mr. Huskisson, after what his hon. friend had just stated, and considering the great distresses to which this island had been so frequently reduced by natural causes, such as violent storms and hurricanes, could not accede to the proposition of the hon. gent. opposite. Last year he was met with the objection that some restrictions existed in the trade of the West India Islands that did not apply to that of the Mauritius. At the time he did not attach any great weight to the objection, and now he was confirmed in the resolution, not of superadding restrictions on either, but of removing them as much as possible from both (hear).

Mr. Plummer denied that any pledge had been given by this government in favour of the Mauritius. It was fallacious to suppose that the introduction of the sugar of the Mauritius would not be prejudicial to the West Indies, when it was admitted that there was a large surplus produce of those islands on hand.

The house then resumed, and the report was ordered to be received to-morrow.

Sierra-Leone.

TUESDAY, APRIL 14.—Mr. Hume moved for a return of the past and present expense of Sierra-Leone, and the liberated negroes there, when

Mr. W. Horton suggested that as the hon. gent. would, no doubt, make a statement of some length, it would be better for him to move at once for the papers, and bring forward a specific motion at a future day. It could not be proper to introduce the matter in so thin a house, and during the absence of the Sec. for Foreign Affairs.

Mr. Hume was willing to accede to this proposition, provided an early day were appointed for the discussion of this question, which he regarded as very important, since he hoped that some millions might be saved for the time to come, if the line of policy should be adopted which he intended to propose.—On Mr. W. Horton's statement that part of the information sought for was received and the rest speedily expected, Mr. Hume agreed to postpone his motion in the hope of a fuller attendance of members.

THURSDAY, MAY 26.—Mr. W. Horton wished to ask Mr. Hume what course he intended to pursue with respect to his motion on the subject of Sierra-Leone. The information sought comprehended a variety of subjects, and was not at present in possession of Government. They were about to send out a commission to the colony for such further returns as were required to complete the papers moved for. Under these circumstances he wished the hon. gent. not to delay the other business of the house by a fruitless motion, but to suspend the discussion till perfect information had arrived.

Mr. Hume said, that his wish to go into detail on this subject arose from his conviction that neither the house nor the country were well acquainted with the nature of it; nor with the facts which would, he thought, fully establish that the attempts of Government with respect to that colony had failed, and would continue to fail. He feared that every hope which had been held out with regard to the improvement of captured negroes, after an enormous expense, had proved abortive. However, as all the returns which he required could not be produced this session, he would, for the present, content himself with stating the nature of them. They were, we believe, about 30 in number, and embraced—the expense of the civil and military government of that colony since the year 1608—the expense of the vessels employed on that coast for the prevention of the slave trade—the exports and imports to and from the colony in the same period—the revenue derived from the colony, and its application—the births, marriages, and deaths in the colony—a census of the population of various classes; and several other accounts of a similar nature, some of which, as one respecting the state of the captured negroes and Maroons sent thither from Jamaica, he asked for with a view of shewing that the experiment of free labour had failed at Sierra-Leone. He concluded by moving for the returns.

Mr. W. Horton inquired, he allowed, was requisite: but he trusted that the house and the public would suspend their opinions until the information moved for should be afforded. When that was obtained, the house would be qualified to discuss the policy of continuing the colony of Sierra-Leone, and to decide how far the experiment of free labour, which had been tried there, had or had not succeeded.

Mr. Brougham trusted that hon. members, in the absence of information, would not deem any sum which had been expended in support of the colony of Sierra-Leone unreasonable, however large it might appear at first view. He thought no man would conceive any sum unreasonable, who considered all the circumstances under which 90,000 individuals had been maintained for so many years. The question of free labour was not to be decided by the value of it at Sierra-Leone, but by the value of it in Hayti. The government of Hayti had recently declared that they were willing to receive any quantity of free negroes which might be sent thither; and he believed had actually received, within the last year, 6,000 negroes from Carolina, Maryland, and the other slave states in North America.

The returns were then ordered.

Captured Negroes, &c.

FRIDAY, MARCH 11.—Mr. Herries moved (in the committee of supply) that 45,000*l.* be voted for the support of captured negroes, &c. and 17,423*l.* to defray the expence of the commissioners under the treaties with Spain, Portugal, and the Netherlands, for preventing the traffic in slaves.

Mr. Bernal opposed the grants, because he conceived them to produce no practical utility. He complained of the lamentable increase of the slave-trade under foreign flags within the last few years, and contended that the horrors of it were now ten times as great as they were before we had abolished it. He believed that the five years had now expired after which Portugal was to give up the slave-trade south of the line. Slaves were, however, daily pouring into the Brazils, and not only into the Brazils, but also into the Havannah and the other colonies of Spain, which were now thriving at our expence. He trusted that something would be done to check this evil.

Mr. F. Burton complained of the shameful manner in which foreign powers were daily violating the treaties they had made with us on this subject, and called upon the government to take such measures as would release us even from the suspicion of countenancing the horrors which their conduct occasioned.

The grants were then agreed to.

MONDAY, MAY 16.—Mr. Canning laid upon the table the copy of a treaty between Great Britain and the King of Sweden and Norway, for the prevention of illicit dealing in African slaves. The right honourable gentleman said, that Sweden herself was not engaged in this nefarious traffic, but, unfortunately, her flag had been made use of to cover the trade of other nations. The object of government was to extend the power of search in suspected vessels as far as possible; and this request on the part of Sweden had been acceded to. He was sorry that another treaty to the same effect, which had been alluded to in the royal speech—with the United States of America—had not yet been accomplished.

East and West India Sugar.

FRIDAY, MARCH 18.—Mr. Spokes said that before the third reading of the bill (Annual Duties) he wished to make a few observations respecting the sugar trade. The heavy duty that was contended on our East India sugars, was a grievous restraint upon trade, and a burdensome tax upon English consumers of the article. It was perfectly well known that all the countries, almost without an exception, lying within 25 degrees, on either side of the Equator, were by nature adapted for the production of sugar (hear, hear); and yet, such had been the narrow policy of our government, that its imposts might be said to have confined the growth of sugars for our market to a few small and isolated spots of land in the Caribbean sea (hear). Those duties amounted to a prohibition upon the importation of sugar raised in any other countries, excepting indeed, in our vast East India possessions: and our East India sugars were burdened with an extraordinary weight of duty. On what grounds had such a duty been laid upon an important product of our Indian empire, which contained a population of 80,000,000 of souls and more—who were ready to take our manufactures to a very large amount, provided only they could find in our markets a vent for their native produce (hear, hear)? If the object of Government had been to protect the West India interest, the only effect of such a plan was to keep up a cursed and detestable system of slavery, the existence of which every man in that house must join with him in deploring. When he stated that the duty on West India sugars was 27s., while that on East India sugars was about 37s., the house must perceive that such a difference was calculated to keep one of these sugars entirely out of the market; and, by consequence, to diminish the supply. Now abundance of produce is the very sinews of commercial prosperity. It was true, there was a drawback allowed on those duties, amounting to 6s. per cwt.; but that drawback served only to put upwards of 1,000,000l. in the pockets of the West Indians. It was with pain that he felt himself bound on this occasion, strongly to object to the course which his majesty's ministers seemed disposed to take upon the subject. He had with pleasure supported them in reducing the duties on wool, timber, iron, hemp, and wine; and in all the principles upon which they had made these reductions, he cordially concurred. Even upon questions, perhaps, of more doubtful expediency—as when the bounties on our fisheries were withdrawn—he had gone with ministers, because he conceived that trade could only flourish by being free. But why was the duty on East India sugars to be continued—a duty so contrary to those principles of free trade which ministers had advocated with so much energy in other cases (hear, hear)? The East India trade was suffering severely from the inequality of duties; and the public were left without the benefit of a fair competition. To prove that the West Indians themselves considered that they derived no material benefit from the drawback on the exportation of sugars, he would cite the declaration of a gentleman holding a distinguished situation in the West Indies, who was allowed to possess the best information on these subjects, and who was himself the agent for the island of Jamaica—Mr. Hibbert. The hon. gent. here read an extract from a letter of Mr. Hibbert, published in the Royal Gazette of Jamaica, the 1st of May 1824, which admitted that the drawback on refined sugars was little short of a gratuitous bounty of about 6s. per cwt. on the exportation of all West India sugars—and that such was the opinion of the standing committee of the West India islands. The house would observe, that this drawback of 6s. per cwt. would amount, upon the total of sugars imported from the West Indies into this country, which was perhaps 190,000 tons, to about 1,140,000l. Now these facts were admitted by Mr. Hibbert himself; and yet the house, large as it was, would not answer the desires or the necessities of the West Indians (hear, hear). Year after year the West Indians came to this house for farther relief and assistance; to whatever extent that assistance might be afforded, it never proved satisfactory or sufficient. He, however, had a radical objection to bounties of any kind. If a bounty were allowed on sugar or any other article, the only effect was, that the foreign consumer would buy it so much cheaper; and in that case it must be allowed that we ourselves made a present of so much to the foreign consumer. It had been said that a rise of prices in colonial produce was rather beneficial in some respects than otherwise; and thus it was often argued, that such a rise of prices improved the condition of the West India slaves. But he denied this. He had reason to believe that the only effect of such an advance in prices was, that the slave was compelled to work the harder during all the time the improved market was likely to last (hear). The free labourer, indeed, might benefit under such circumstances; but not the slave. In the Bahama Islands, where the slaves were generally better treated than in many parts of the West Indies, and sugar was not cultivated, the average increase of slave population with reference to other of the islands, was about 3 per cent. In Barbadoes, where very little sugar was raised, the increase was about one-and-a-half per cent. In the larger island of Jamaica, where the cultivation of this produce was carried on to a much larger extent, the decrease of human life was about 1 per cent.; but in Demerara, in Guiana, the great mart for sugars, and where the most considerable number of slaves were employed in its cultivation, the decrease of human life was about 3 per cent. He sat down protesting that he should never cease to advocate the cause of free trade all over the world (hear, hear).

Mr. Robertson recommended the abolition of slavery as the only permanent remedy for West Indian distress; but opposed that reduction of duty on the importation of East India sugars which had been just recommended to the house.

Captain Maberly observed, that the protecting duty had been defended on the ground that individuals had thereby been induced to embark their property in the West India colonies; but that he held to be no sufficient reason for keeping up the price of an article which might be denominated a necessary of life. In his opinion, it would tend greatly to the interest of this country, if it were not at all connected with the West India islands. From the time of Adam Smith to the present day, every intelligent writer on political economy had condemned our colonial connexions. The trade to the West India islands was a losing trade to this country. By importing sugar from the East Indies a double advantage would be gained; the article would be cheaper, and the country would be relieved from those heavy military and civil establishments which she, and not the West India colonies, now supported.
